After the last Nebraska harvest in the fall of 1919, the accumulation of 20 years of farming was sold. The men, with the necessary tools, equipment and furniture, some milk cows, some poultry and even a pig or two, moved to their homesteads in Wyoming. The wives and children went to grandma's house in Bern to wait out the school year. In the spring of 1920, the families were united on the homestead that was to be the permanent home for the Meisner family.

Thomas and Anna Meisner were the parents of four daughters: Thelma (Mrs. Darryl Holmes), Lorine (Mrs. Buster Goodrich), Lucille (Mrs. Ralph Scott), and Marcille (Mrs. Paul Strand). All four of the Meisner daughters were born in Nebraska; all four graduated from the Converse County High School; all four attended the University of Wyoming; and all four taught school in Wyoming. Mr. and Mrs. Meisner are also survived by seven grandchildren, 15 great grandchildren and five great, great grandchildren.

The Meisner's were very fortunate in that they had one priceless asset - an inexhaustible water well; in this country, as good as gold. True, as with most of the water north of the Platte, it was awful, full of minerals. At least no one needed to take mineral supplements, and it was icy cold and non-contaminated, and it was plentiful. With wind power or a gasoline pump, it sometimes pumped 24 hours for days at a time. Even in the driest times, the flow did not diminish. It provided house water, watered livestock, irrigated an enormous garden, trees, lawn and Anna's lovely flowers. It is said that the Swiss will grow flowers anywhere - and that must be true, for with a lot of work and that wonderful water, she made a piece of dry Wyoming prairie blossom. Sometimes, distant neighbors came to visit, mostly to see Anna Meisner's yard with its trees and green grass and her beautiful flowers. She made an oasis in that treeless grassland. The cottonwood trees in the yard were started from branches trimmed from trees in Douglas which she gathered up and planted; she definitely had a "green thumb". Anna Meisner was also an excellent cook and homemaker. She always had wonderful food for any hungry soul who wandered by. Many of the surrounding sections were filed on by young World War I veterans, a part of their veterans benefits. Her favorite younger brother had been killed in France and these lonely young men were "soldier boys" as he had been. They would walk over, at least a mile, to visit, eat supper, then walk back, but never empty handed. They would have a loaf of fresh baked bread, some butter, a jug of milk and probably cake or cookies. She would listen to their talk of home and family and about the girl who was waiting. All of these young men sold their land as soon as they "proved up" and went home. Mrs. Meisner sold cream, homemade butter, eggs, fresh vegetables and dressed fowl to the grocery store to help pay for their groceries.

The Blacks and Whittles were discouraged in a few years and those two sections were the first parcels of land added to the original Meisner land; many others also left and more land was acquired, section by section.

In the fall of 1919, Tom purchased 100 prime breeding cows, branding them with his registered brand, the Lazy Diamond, Lazy T.  He was lucky enough to lose only a very few in the terrible April and May blizzards of 1920 and 1921. He also dry farmed several hundred acres. Wheat, oats, barley, rye, cane, millet and corn were raised, some for sale, but most for livestock food. It was all horsepower at first; he was proud of good teams of horses, but when mechanized machinery was available, he bought it. One of his purchases was a threshing machine and he threshed for his neighbors as well as for himself. It was powered by a gasoline driven tractor. One day, when about half of the many stacks had been threshed, a spark from the tractor exhaust flew into a nice, dry stack. Boy, was that a fire!! All that was saved was the grain already threshed. Never again was the ripe grain stacked, it was left in the field in shocks and hauled to the thresher, load by load, the Meisner ranch grew as Tom enlarged and upgraded his cow herd, improved his meadows, built dams and drilled water wells. After the terrible drought and the dust storms, he reseeded most of his farm land to grass, leaving only a little to raise some stock feed. He bought some more parcels of land to increase the grazing capacity of his range.

Anna Meisner died on August 16, 1933. Tom continued to operate the ranch until his retirement in the 1950's at which time he moved to Douglas and lived in his trailer house at the home of his daughter, Lucille Scott, until his death at the age of 89 on November 13, 1969. Mr. and Mrs. Meisner are buried in the family plot at the Douglas cemetery.

Thomas Meisner loved and served his community. He believed that government of the people by the people meant just that; it should begin at home and the people should be involved. He had been identified with both civic and ranching interests in Converse county for more than three decades and his sound and practical business judgement was admired by many. He was county commissioner for six years, was a member of the Converse County School Board from 1924 to 1948, serving as its president during his last term of office, and as "Red" Fenwick once said of him "he walked that extra mile" as the Superintendent of the Beef Barn at the Wyoming State Fair from 1930 to 1964. He was a Mason of Blue Lodge, Douglas Consistory, Cheyenne; a charter member of the Douglas Lodge of the Moose organization.

Tom Mesiner loved the outdoors and was a hunter and fisherman of note. After his retirement, when the weather permitted, he could be found with can and crippled knee following a mountain stream or sitting beside a lake - fishing! He caught a lot of fish, too.

Merritt, A. R. and Mary Family

Wilson Merritt was a shipright. He and his wife, Gretchen, came to Sheboygan Falls, Wisconsin in the mid 1800's, where their son, Anderson Ralph Merritt, was born on July 24, 1864.

It was decided that Anderson Ralph Merritt be sent to Colorado to further his education in pharmaceuticals. Thus, about 1884, he was graduated from the Colorado School of Mines in chemistry. After graduation he found employment in drug stores at Omaha and Fremont. It was while working in a Fremont pharmacy that he met Mary Lee. They were married on July 9, 1888.

Mary Lee's parents came from Cork County Ireland. Her mother, Maggie Cassidy, wore the green and her father, William D. Lee, wore the orange. Orange being Protestant and green being Catholic.

William and Maggie Lee, and a cousin, Commish Lee came together from Ireland, traveling to Omaha, Nebraska, where they hoped to take up homesteads. However, when they arrived they found 60 families already settled in Omaha. They thought this to be too crowded for them so they moved on to Fremont where they could choose their land. William and Maggie Lee picked homestead land where the stockyards were built later in the century.

Mary Lee was born in Fremont, Nebraska on February 17, 1865. She graduated from the Fremont Teacher's College after which she taught school in Valentine, Nebraska. Her talents were many. She was especially gifted in music, piano, violin and voice. She eventually held a doctorate degree from the Sherwin Music School in Chicago.

At one time, Mary and her sister, Elizabeth, were sent to England to further their schooling in piano, voice and violin. It proved a rather eventful trip. To begin with, Mary Lee fell off the wharf and her aunt accompanying the two sisters, dived into the sea and pulled Mary to safety. This was a minor incident in comparison to what followed. After they were far out to sea, for some reason unknown to Mary, the ship split in two. The turbulent waters drifted them far off the main course. After three terror-ridden days, fearing any moment the half-ship may capsize, a rescue boat sent in search of them, heaved into view.

Mary Lee, thinking back on this nightmare thought settling in Valentine, Nebraska to teach school, a safe, solid way of managing a life. Also, taking up a homestead near Valentine furthered her security, even though, later she sold it to her brother, Ed Lee.

After working for other druggists and in other drug stores, A. R. Merritt decided he wanted to be his own boss. For some time he harbored the dream of owning his own drug store. The more he thought about it, the better the idea sounded. He decided on Wyoming to make his dream come true. In 1886, he set out with his newly-founded drug store in a freight wagon, coming to Wyoming and traveling to Ft. Laramie to Ft. Fetterman and on to Antelope. He purchased a lot in Antelope, and here he put up a tent.

After a few years of Wyoming living, his "necessities" multiplied. A herder was hired to take the cows out to the Wyoming prairie to pasture. At night, the herder would bring the cows back to the sheds and barns to milk.

It wasn't long after purchasing the Antelope lot that the railroad announced the new town, Douglas, was to be located about a mile and a half south. A. R. most certainly wanted his store to be in town. However, all his money was in the Antelope lot. Thus, he felt forced to borrow, and borrow he did at 12% interest, which was huge interest for 1886. But, at least, he had his lot and his store in town. This proved to be his final move. He built the store, now called the Higgins Building, Douglas, Wyoming in 1900. Brenning and Clark were the contractors. This new store had everything, "from soup to nuts" as the cliché goes...groceries, medicines, all types of clothing, which included men's work-clothes, shoes, clothing for the entire family and machinery.

However, there came a time when A. R. Merritt quit filling prescriptions. He found the doctors were giving their patients sugar pills and aspirin, and he didn't want to take the people's money for these.

While A. R. Merritt was busy from daylight to dark in his store, Mary Lee Merritt was busy also. When she wasn't busy with her children, which eventually numbered seven, she was teaching music. She was also engrossed in various community activities and numerous charities. She contributed help to nearly all the now-oldest churches in Douglas, by putting on operas and cantatas and letting the proceeds go for the funding of the churches and other organizations. A. Ralph died on May 25, 1937, Mary on May 3, 1964.

Granddaughter, Kathryn Merritt Carrethers, says her Grandma Mary even aided the children of the community with her famous "Fly Campaign." For every ten flies a child caught, Mary Merritt gave that child a penny.

Kathryn also recalls the story: Mary Lee Merritt cried for three days after her twins, Vinson and Gladys, were born. "Everyone will think I'm a pig", she wailed. Multiple births were slightly out of the range of proper decorum in 1890. Being the decorous and gracious lady that she was, it was no consolation to Mary to have it known that her twins were the first set to be born in Wyoming. Wyoming, itself, newly-born into statehood.

Nevertheless, in spite of his mother's fears and tears, Vinson Samuel Merritt grew up hale and hearty. In this year, 1984, one may see him walking down the street... swiftly for a 93 year old, without cane to aid him, a smile on his face and a twinkle in his eyes.

His memory is a store house of almost a century of historical events and amusing happenings around Douglas.

In 1915, he married Hettie Belle Sleight. Hettie was born in Buffalo, Minnesota. The pioneering spirit of that time possessed her as she came west expressly to homestead. Who knows, she may have been also hopeful for western romance? Whether this is true or not, she found it in Vinson Samuel Merritt, and they were married August 15, 1915. To this union were born Kathryn Mae and Ruth Marie.

Hettie died February 26, 1965.

It hardly seems appropriate to leave the Merritt Heritage to Converse County without a few legendary tales from Vinson S. Merritt.

In writing it's hard to portray the chuckle that goes with each story as Vince relates it:

On one of her many trips to Omaha to shop, Mary Lee went to a store to purchase some face powder. (This was in the 1800s.)

The clerk came forward to help her.

"I want some face powder," said Mary Lee.

Clerk: "Do you want Mennen's?"

Mary: "No, I want women's"

Clerk: "Do you want it scented?"

Mary: "No, I'll take it with me."

The "Once-upon-a-time" in the following story happened in the early 1900's when Vince and Ben Campbell were hunting wolf and coyote pups in Harvey Gulch.

On this particular day, Vince was concentrating on his search when he happened to look up to see Ben waving... "Come over here! Come over here!"

"So," relates Vince, "I followed his command and met him where two draws came together."

"I have a bobcat cornered in here," Ben said, "and I want you to stay and keep watch while I go into town and get the fellows to help me smoke him out."

When he came back he had a bunch of fellows with him all lined up in buggies and wagons.

"He didn't come out while I was gone, did he?" Ben asked.

"No, I didn't see him anyway."

"So they proceeded to build a huge bon fire to smoke the cat out while I moseyed on down the draw a little ways to watch. When the fire got to smoking good I noticed a spiral of smoke coming out the other draw. There happened to be a hole leading from one draw to another. So it was that Ben's cat went out the back door to freedom. You should have heard old Ben moan!"

My brother, Auber, and I always had specific chores to do around the store. Dad would buy a whole carload of apples at a time and we had to pick out the rotten ones. Also, he'd buy a lot of potatoes which he put in the basement. It was one of Auber's and my chores to sprout them. This was a boring job for two lively boys and we were always eager in hunting diversions. Let me tell you, it's hard to find an interesting attraction down in a deep cellar. When you're down in a musky hole, you look to the light. The windows in the basement were even with the ground. Our pet pastime was watching legs go by on the walk above, especially those with skirts. Even though the skirts were long, from our particular position we could look right up the skirts of any woman standing outside the basement windows.

Then we discovered another very amusing diversion for a boy... I think it may be one of the first squirt guns ever to be in operation. In the basement there was a lot of stuff dad could never sell. Among this obsolete heap were some old ear-syringes, which we boys discovered made good squirt guns.

One day, from a high seat atop a big pile of boxes, Auber was practicing his aim with one of these special guns, when out the open window above he noticed a pair of beautiful legs going by. He took aim with the ear-syringe full of water. I heard a little shriek and then Auber saying, "Gosh, she's cute!", and then, "She's gone on in the store now."

I was sitting on a tall pile of boxes, too, only in another room. However, we both heard the unmistakable, "Bump! Bump! Bump!" of Dad's heavy feet coming down the basement stairs. There was an onimous sound to that heavy walking. Auber, filled with the urgent need to retreat now before the wrath of an angry father overtook him, made a mad scramble to get down from his seat. As he did so, a nail stuck in his pants, temporarily holding him back. Then suddenly it tore loose, throwing him off balance and hurling the whole bunch of boxes about him. He came tumbling down in their midst.

As for me, I escaped more safely. I scrambled up the freight elevator. The girl Auber had ambushed stood in the store, madder, it's true, than the proverbial wet hen... a speculative 55 year old one at that.

"For goodness sakes, lady," I hastened in defense of my brother, "You have such beautiful legs we had no idea you were this old!"

A smile lit her face like the sun coming from beneath a black cloud. She walked from the store as a woman transformed, uttering not one word.

Messenger, Charlie and Mary

Charles W. "Charlie" Messenger was born in New York on June 16, 1858. When six years old he moved with his father to Iowa. His mother had died in New York. One of his uncles and several cousins also moved to Iowa. These were Walt, Sr. and Walt Hamner, Jr., Archie Hamner and one of their cousins, Elliott Hamner.

Charlie grew up neighbors to the Newells at Cedar Falls, Iowa and later married Harrison and Sarah's daughter, Mary. They were married at Alliance, Iowa in 1882.

Previous to this time, one of Mary's uncles, Jack Newell, had come to Wyoming and was engaged in mining west of Laramie Peak.

When Harrison Newell and family moved to Wyoming, Charlie and Mary also came. Rock Creek was the rail terminal in 1884. Distribution of anything necessary to every day living was freighted out or in to Rock Creek. The settlement of Rock Creek is not to be confused with the present day Rock River, it was a settlement near there. Most of the freighting was done with oxen or "bull teams" and the driver of these wagon trains were known as "Bull Whackers".

Charlie established his own freight line and also did some mining.

While at Rock Creek their daughter, Sarah (but always called Sadie) was born in 1886.

Charlie and Mary moved and built a log house and out buildings about a mile south of Frank Newell.

Their second daughter, Esther, was born at the Harrison Newell home in 1893.

Charlie was an excellent stockman and soon had several head of good horses.

He moved to Douglas and established a freight and dray line there. He also broke and trained driving horses, buggy teams as well as the heavier dray horses.

In 1890 this piece was taken from the paper. "Charlie Messenger of Douglas yesterday sold his sorrel driving team and carriage to C. L. Rowse of Casper. He took in exchange two building lots in Douglas. The team was one of the showiest as well as the best driving team in this section. Mr Rowse will drive them to Casper today. They have been much admired”.

In 1901 this clipping was taken from the paper. “Charlie Messenger has sold his span of chestnuts to Peter George. They are the finest pair of Drivers on the road”.

Charlie built a house in Douglas. A son, Frank was born in 1890. They were known far and wide for their hospitality. Mary was an excellent cook and housekeeper. Every day was open house at the Messengers. They built a house on the lots Charlie had traded for.

The Hamner cousins had established ranches north of Laramie Peak. Frank Newell had a saw mill and Walt and Archie Hamner freighted the lumber in for the house and helped build it.

Mary was very capable when it came to driving. She used to drive a team of small mules. Guy Newell said he would have been afraid to get in the corral with them, but Mary drove them. Guy said they would run when they were hitched up with their ears laid right back along their necks. Guy said Mary never had a wreck that he ever knew of, but she made good time when she traveled.

Guy and Myrtle Newell were married at the Messenger home in 1900 and Frank Newell married his second wife, Maggie Searle there also in 1893.

Charlie sold his dray line to Slonakers and was elected Converse County Sheriff, an office he held for 16 years.

Charlie died on July 16, 1923.

Frank Messenger married Fred Foxton's daughter, Dolly and they had one daughter, Dorothy. They went to California; and he went to work for Metro Goldwyn Mayer Studios. He was assistant director there for several years until his death.

Dorothy married John Haworth and lives at Hawthorne, California.

Sadie Messenger also went to California and worked at the MGM Studios. She was an actress in several movies. She returned to Douglas and married Bill Delahoyd. They ran the Ranger Hotel in Lusk, Wyoming and also the picture show there. They ran The Frontier Hotel in Cheyenne and ran the LaBonte Hotel in Douglas for a number of years until Bill's health began to fail, and he retired.

Esther Messenger married Pax Irvine. They had a ranch north of Douglas. A pair of twin boys was born to them, but they only lived a few weeks. After they were divorced, Esther went to beauty school and became a beauty operator. She married Jerry Calwell and lived a number of years in Arizona. After Jerry's death she returned to Douglas. Mary Messenger died July 23, 1956. Esther and Sadie lived together until Sadie's death in 1966. Esther died just a week and a day after Sadie.

Metcalf, George and Susie

George Metcalf was born in Northfield, Vermont on Jan. 20, 1855, and grew to manhood there. He received his common school education in Vermont, attending both the University of Vermont and Norwich University.

In the spring of 1880, George came west to be employed as quartermaster's agent at Fort Fetterman.

He made the journey as far as Lusk, Wyoming on the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad. Since Lusk was the end of the line at that time, he continued his journey, a distance of some 63 miles, on foot carrying his belongings in a pack on his back. He camped along the way.

George served as agent for two years, opening a mercantile store at the fort in 1885, and remaining until 1888. In the meantime, he established stores in both Douglas and Casper under his own name.

He was married to Susie Webel of Chicago in 1888, and to this union, two daughters were born, Mildred and Catherine. Mildred married C. D. Zimmerman, well-known in the Douglas area.

From 1886 to 1909 he was engaged in the mercantile business in Douglas. In February 1914, he organized the Commercial Bank and Trust Co., and was its first president. He engaged in the livestock business with Charles Neely, and he organized the Metcalf Land and Live Stock Company. Sheep comprised most of the stock.

During the last 20 years of his life, he made his winter home in Los Angeles, California, returning to Douglas to spend the summers for a time. George died in Los Angeles in December of 1938 and was buried there. His wife and one daughter, Catherine, preceded him in death.

Metz, Henry and Tina Family

A new life in the United States was a dream come true in 1881 for Hemrick Wilhelm Metz. Hemrick, his parents, 4 brothers, and 1 sister immigrated to Fulton, Missouri, from Westphalia, Germany (Prussia). In 1884 Hemrick became a United States citizen, at which time he changed his name to Henry William Metz.

Tina Knoble's family also came from Germany. Tina waited in Germany for her family to save enough money to send for her. Tina's passport showed a total cost of $30.00, sailing from Brenner, Germany to Boston, Massachusetts. The family reunited in Fulton, Missouri in the year 1884. There she met and married Henry William Metz in 1887.

A miner by trade, Henry worked the coal mines in Fulton, where he and Tina had settled. They were blessed with twin boys, Fred and Henry, born January 7, 1888. Henry had applied and received a Wyoming Territory land grant, but before they were able to move, a baby girl Emma was born in 1889.

So it was in 1890 Henry and Tina arrived in Wyoming with three babies to start their new life on a homestead bordered by Fort Fetterman and Orpha. Nothing more than a dugout in a hill was to become Tina and Henry's home until the homestead could be completed. Once again, Henry took to mining. He subsequently worked the Green Hope near Gurnsey for gold and copper. It is said Tina tended all the homestead chores alone while Henry was away.

On February 26, 1893, Henry and Tina had their fourth child — a son named Walter Emmett Metz, born at Inez.

An avid reader, Henry taught his children at home until schools were available. The children later attended schools either at Lusk or Inez, depending on where Henry was working at the time. Mary, their fifth child, was born in 1906.

Henry was active in civic affairs and spent several years on the Douglas school board.

Things were good for the Metz family for several years. Henry did well in copper mining and ranching. In 1912 their daughter Emma passed away after a long illness. One year later Tina also passed away.

By 1918 Walter Emmett Metz had met a young lady who had come from Minnesota to Wyoming with her grandparents, Mr. & Mrs. Soper. Gladys Leona Nolan and Walter Emmett Metz were united in marriage August 5, 1918. Soon after, Walter and his two brothers were inducted into the service. World War I had left Henry to raise his daughter Mary and to run his ranch and mining company alone.

Fred and Henry, Jr., both fought on the front lines in France. Both were wounded and spent several months in military hospitals in the states. During this time Fred met and married an army nurse. To them a son was born. Fred and his family made their home in Colorado to mine his own silver mine in Idaho Springs. Henry, Jr., married and was to make his home in California. He passed away in April 1962.

Walter returned to Douglas to homestead his own land west of Henry's while also helping his dad on the ranch.

About 1930 Walter and Gladys opened the Black Diamond Coal Company. They operated it for a number of years. At this time Gladys remained at the ranch while Walter worked the mine. During the depression, Walter saw to it that no one went without coal. Some of those accounts were never paid.

Hard times were soon to hit Henry and Walter's families. The bank crash of 1929 took its toll on the Metz family financially, however both men managed to keep their land. Much of their livestock was sold during the drought of 1929 and the 1930s.

Before he could recover from his financial losses, Henry took a trip to Fulton, Missouri, to visit relatives. There he contracted pneumonia and died December 28, 1936.

Walter and Gladys were blessed with seven children, three sons and four daughters, Walter E. Jr., Casper, Wyoming; William R., Cheyenne, Wyoming; Fred E., Albuquerque, New Mexico; Helen (Werner) Ivester, Douglas, Wyoming; Nellie (Metz) Foster, Casper, Wyoming; Florence (Metz) Septer, Casper, Wyoming; and Betty (Metz) Pavilla, Casper, Wyoming. They remained on the ranch until 1938, at which time they moved to Douglas, later selling the ranch. Walter worked for Converse County as a heavy equipment operator on road construction. Gladys worked in several restaurants in town, becoming known to young and old alike as "Mom."

Gladys passed away December 14, 1956. Walter passed away December 5, 1975.

Middleton, Benjamin and Juan

The Benjamin Elgin Middleton and Juan Jelena Smith union was formed by marriage on June 20, 1899.

Benjamin turned his thoughts westward and traveled to Wyoming in the spring of 1910. Here he made preparations to insure a home for his family. He filed on a 160 acre homestead, built a 12' x 14' log cabin and fenced his land in on the bank of Old Woman Creek, Converse-Niobrara Counties, Wyoming. Benjamin then wired money to his family to finance the trip from Flatrock, Mississippi.

Juan Jelena and her children, Hettie Lee, Benjamin Franklin, James Oscar and Thelma Lanetta left their home in Flatrock and traveled west to a new beginning; a new home in a raw and rugged Wyoming. The family arrived in Edgemont, South Dakota, in the late fall of 1910, traveling by train.

It was bitter cold when the family arrived, and the children wore straw hats and were barefoot. Benjamin's neighbor, Solon Clark, traveled by wagon to Edgemont to collect the family. He bundled them into straw in the back of his wagon and provided blankets for warmth on the long journey to the cabin on Old Woman Creek.

Winnie Estella was born in 1912 on Old Woman Creek at Warren, Wyoming, with a doctor from Edgemont attending. Ethel Virginia was born on March 24, 1916, in Lusk, Wyoming, six weeks after the death of Benjamin, her father. He died of Bright's Disease on February 6, 1916.

Juan Jelena Middleton homesteaded in her own name after B. E. Middleton's death. She filed on a 320 acre place located a couple of miles from the mouth of Dogie Creek. The land is now owned by the Julius Petersons.

Oscar Middleton recalls several stories of his youth. A favorite pastime for Frank, Oscar and Thelma was running the wild steers into water holes and making them swim. Or if it was winter, taking their stick horses and chasing the animals out onto the ice in the creek bottoms and watching the action; sometimes catching the steer's tails and going for a fast ride. Sometimes pranks were pulled, such as dressing out mice, rolling them in green leaves and frying them to feed to the rest of the children.

School in Wyoming was a long, cold walk to the country school house. The children often suffered from frostbite in the winter. In the fall, water for the school was obtained by sinking an apple box into the "dry" creek bed and waiting for the water to seep through and become clear. Oscar remembers feeling lucky if they had lard sandwiches to take along. Benjamins' half sister, Hettie, her husband Fred and six children homesteaded on adjoining land on Old Woman Creek, and the Green children attended school with the Middletons. Later the Middletons attended the Lusk school.

Oscar's formal schooling ended with sixth grade following his father's death. He and his brother, Frank became the "men" of the family.

Oscar started work for Mike Ruffing, herding sheep. With 108 head of sheep to tend, he rolled a "jumbo" Bull Durham cigarette and began making his rounds. He herded sheep for two months and 13 days before he had enough money saved to pay $30.00 for a horse with the "blind staggers". The horse was reportedly nine years old, but must have been twenty.

Oscar rode on the roundup, working for Otto Hitchcock, when he was 12 years old. The country was all open range then and ranchers gathered stock via roundups.

Sometimes Frank and Oscar caught train rides, riding in the freight cars to distant places looking for work. Oscar recalls he and a friend being "caught" once by the engineer and thinking, "Oh, no, we'll be kicked off!", but the men took pity on two young boys and gave them a whole pie. Oscar worked on various ranches in Niobrara and Weston Counties until he was 21 years old and took odd jobs wherever he could find them.

Juan Jelena (Smith) Middleton departed from life July 26, 1926, at the age of 50. After Juan's death, Winnie and Ethel lived with Thelma Middleton Thomas and her husband Albert for a period of two years. Albert and Thelma were married on August 18, 1925. Hettie Lee was the first Middleton to marry. She wed William E. St. John on April 13, 1920. In 1928 Sheridan Burke took Winnie Estella for his wife. Frank Middleton wed Blance in 1940; she died and he later married Dorothy in 1947. Frank Middleton was killed in an underground mining accident at Kellogg, Idaho, in 1952. Hettie and Bill St. John now reside in Casper, Wyoming. Albert Thomas passed away in 1982 and his widow, Thelma, lives at Ft. Laramie, Wyoming. Sheridan Burke died in 1930 and Winnie Burke TouLou is now a resident of Ione, Washington.

The year was 1927 when Oscar met Marie Elizabeth Daniels at a country dance on the Ed Schimek place. Ed played his accordion so vigorously that it pulled in two pieces and was repaired with a safety pin. Oscar claims to have sometimes traveled 100 miles to court Marie, take her to a dance and ride back home himself. He also claims that there were only two girls in the country at that time.

Marie and Oscar were married on February 18, 1929, at Lusk, Wyoming. The new marriage had a sad beginning. Mr. and Mrs. Sheridan Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Thomas and daughter, Rosalee, and the newlyweds were quarantined with Ethel Middleton at the Thomas home at Manville, Wyoming. Ethel died of diptheria the following day. The wedding party had immunization shots and were quarantined there for ten days.

Oscar had homesteaded two miles south of Lance Creek and 45 miles north of Lusk, Wyoming, about 15 miles west of Benjamin Middleton's homestead on Old Woman Creek in present day Niobrara County. The newlyweds moved on horseback with a bedroll, chickens, eggs, cats and supplies, their worldly possessions, to the new home. They entered the cabin for lunch, leaving their horses ground tied. The horses ran off, and Oscar's wasn't located until several days later in the creek bottom amongst thick growths of young trees. Water for home use was hauled by horse-drawn sled; and the wash was hung on barb wire fences to dry.

In the fall of 1929, Joseph Daniels and his wife Ella moved to the Heartenbuch place east of Douglas, and in 1938 sold the Daniels homestead and cattle on Middle Creek to their daughter Marie and her husband, Oscar Middleton.

The Middleton ranch grew with land purchases; the Jess Brooks, Inez Brooks, Earl Goutch, Mrs. Clarence Braize, Leonard Rozengreen, and Harriet Slagle homesteads. Wayne Daniels traded with Oscar and Marie, swapping homestead land for cattle.

Albert Thomas brought the doctor from Lusk, Wyoming, for the birth of Ethel Marie, first born of the Oscar Middleton children, on November 30, 1929. Lois Josephine was born at the Heartenbuch ranch in 1931 with Ella Daniels and Dr. Hylton delivering her. She died of spinal meningitis on March 3, 1940. James Ray was also born at the Heartenbuch place on January 6, 1934, with Ella Daniels delivering. Benny Robert was born southwest of Lusk, Wyoming, at the home of Albert and Thelma Thomas on June 9, 1935. Joseph Melvin was born at the Owens place, five miles north of the home place on October 27, 1936. Oscar and Marie lived there to be close to the combined Miller-Middleton School. Rita Carol was born February 24, 1941, at the White Lily Court in Douglas, Wyoming, with Dr. Shaffer attending. Richard Andrew was born July 8, 1942, in Douglas, Wyoming. Dr. Shaffer arrived at the private home following his birth.

Ethel married James Hoskovec and they now live in Golden, Colorado. James Ray married Peggy Ann Wintermote and they partnership ranch with Oscar and Marie on Middle Creek. Benny and his wife Pauline (Sanford) ranch in Converse County in the Wagonhound Community. Joe and his wife Susan live in Newell, South Dakota. A.V. (Vern) Russell married Rita and they reside in Douglas, Wyoming. Richard Middleton lives in Colorado Springs, Colorado.

There are numerous grandchildren and four great-grandchildren of the Middleton union — Oscar and Marie's — and probably many more future family members to join all the present ones. I wonder if they will ever look back and wonder at the courage of the man Benjamin Elgin Middleton and his wife Juan Jelena to brave the new beginning in Wyoming?

Miles, Ancel and Flora

Sylvester Ancel Miles was born in Ainsworth, Nebraska on February 9, 1893, the eldest child of William Ancel and Ellen Caroline Patterson Miles. Ancel's father had been born in 1851 in LaFayette County, Wisconsin, his mother in Harlan, Iowa in 1869.

The Miles family moved from Ainsworth to Bloomfield, Nebraska in 1900, making the trip into Knox County in a covered wagon. The family settled on a farm north of Bloomfield where Ancel and his brother started school. Three years later the family left the farm and moved into Bloomfield where Ancel grew to manhood.

Ancel's first real employment came in 1905 when he was employed as a "shop boy" by the local printer. His work consisted of folding newspapers, sweeping the floors and cleaning and sorting the "stick type" which was used in those days. He became an apprentice and learned to set type. His first printing job was setting up and printing a batch of handbills. Ancel was so small in stature that he had trouble reaching the foot pedal on the press so he stood on a wooden box.

At the age of 14 Ancel took a job as delivery boy for a general merchandise store. By the time he was 16 he hired out to the railroad as a station helper for the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha line. As time passed, young Ancel decided to apply for a better job and it was then that the company discovered he was under age to work for them so they dismissed him. For the following three years he worked at other jobs which took him into Iowa and South Dakota. He passed through Omaha on Easter Sunday, April 13, 1913, soon after that city was devastated by the worst tornado on record.

On his 21st birthday, Ancel again signed on to work for the CSPM&O railroad as a brakeman. This job, which he held for the next five years, brought him a wealth of experiences including a four-day blizzard. This storm would have claimed the lives of 24 trainmen and passengers had it not been for the pot-bellied stoves at either end of the coach cars. Everyone in the snowbound train carried coal from the coal car to stoke the stoves. Ancel braved the blizzard to walk four miles to a telegraph station to advise Omaha of their situation.

Ancel was married to Flora Maye Lundberg on June 20, 1916 in Sioux City, Iowa. Flora was born March 19, 1893 in Bloomfield, Nebraska, the seventh child of Victor Lundberg, who had been born in Lund, Sweden, December 3, 1854, and Marie Ellen Carlberg, born March 25, 1854 in Carlston, Sweden.

During the 1918 influenza epidemic, Ancel contracted the malady and was in very poor health. Upon the advice of his doctor he decided to seek a higher, drier climate. He took a leave of absence from his job and with his brother-in-law, Felix Lundberg, came to Wyoming to file on a homestead 20 miles northeast of Douglas on Willow Creek which is located between Walker and Lightning Creeks. Completing the preliminary papers, Ancel then returned to Nebraska, coming back later with his wife and William Miles, his father. William had a homestead adjoining that of Ancel.

Ancel and his father spent the rest of the spring and summer grubbing sagebrush and clearing about 20 acres which they then plowed for crops. That fall, Ancel and Flora Maye returned to Bloomfield where Ancel once more worked for the railroad. Flora Jean, their first child, was born in Bloomfield on September 11, 1919.

The family returned to Wyoming to make their home in the spring of 1920. They had shipped their furniture and other possessions ahead. They made the trip in a Ford car with an open trunk in which they put Flora Jean's baby carriage and their Boston Terrier, "Tige."

Since they had no source of water on their homestead, it seemed that the first priority was to try to find water near their homestead shack. Ancel dug a hole twelve feet deep near a spring below the house using a post hole digger with extensions on the handles. After casing the hole, Ancel installed a hand pump. This well furnished enough water for household use, but water for the cattle was provided by a flowing spring on William's homestead.

Ancel built a few sheds and then began construction of a cement house to replace the homestead shack. Relatives and neighbors came to help. Coarse sand for the cement was taken from Ancel's land, but the fine sand was hauled eight miles by team and wagon from Walker Creek. The cement was mixed in a flat wooden trough with sloped ends. Water, sand and dry cement were blended by using a wide-bladed hoe. Since William Miles was a stone mason by trade, helping to build the first railroad bridges between Chadron and the Black Hills, his knowledge was invaluable.

The walls were built by using forms which were filled with cement, allowed to harden, then the forms raised to a higher level and the process was repeated until the walls were of the desired height. When the house was completed it was snug in the wintertime and cool in the summer.

For the next few years, Ancel, Wilbert Oak, Fatty Johnson and some of the Lundberg uncles drove by team and wagon to and from Gurley, Nebraska to work in the harvest fields. This work provided the income needed to live during the winter.

A second child, Rex Ancel, was born on March 20,

L. to r. Ancel Miles and W. A. Miles in 1919 building their homestead shack.

1924 in the cement house on the homestead. Dr. J. R. Hylton drove out from Douglas to attend Flora and with the help of a neighbor, Loretta Walker (Wileman), he delivered the baby boy.

That fall Ancel went to work as manager of "Art's Lunch," a cafe owned by Art Page located on Second Street in Douglas. He worked the night shift and hardly a night went by that there was not a free-for-all. The cafe was popular, being patronized by a rough and tough clientele. In addition to his work as manager, Ancel delivered dinners to a group of local gamblers who played cards at various places around town, finally taking up residence in the basement of the LaBonte Hotel. For this service Ancel was paid four or five dollars, more than he made working an entire shift at the cafe.

A frequent visitor to the cafe was Johnny Hartman, a widower with three children. He made a living breaking and training horses for roping and cutting and in addition worked at ranches in the area. Hartman had a mare named "Bessie." He would ride her down to the cafe and park her in the alley. If he dropped the reins she would stand there until he returned, but if he tied the reins to the saddle she would wander off to the south end of town to graze in the vacant lots, sometimes going off to run with a bunch of wild horses which hung around the outskirts. However, she would always show up at the Hartman's house at six o'clock sharp the next morning.

On one occasion a couple of fellows at a local saloon mentioned that they would like to get hold of a live badger. Johnny overheard the conversation and a little later on he roped a badger off his mare, Bessie. Using his sheepskin coat for protection, he jumped on the animal, wrapped it up, and brought the badger back to town. The men who wanted the badger paid Hartman $25.00 for his trouble.

Ancel had rented a dairy farm located south of Douglas near the old airport in 1924. The farm was owned by Henry Miller, postmaster in Douglas at that time. Henry's daughter, June, lived with the Miles family and attended high school. Also living with the family was a niece of the Mileses, Ellen Marie Lundberg. Her father was confined to a hospital after he suffered a nervous breakdown when his wife died. Ellen Marie was only two years old at the time of her mother's death.

Flora, William Miles, June and Ellen did the dairy work and the chores, milking, separating and bottling the milk and cream. They delivered their products to Douglas as well as selling it to customers who called at the dairy.

In the early spring of 1927 Ancel moved his family back to the homestead. Using all horse-drawn equipment, Ancel broke up some additional land for crops. He raised potatoes to sell and also for seed, as well as corn, alfalfa, cane, wheat, barley, white and pinto beans and oats.

The work in the potato field was all done by hand, with even the children helping. In springtime the potato pieces were carefully planted, in summer the potato bugs controlled, and when harvest time arrived the crop was dug by hand using a potato fork. The yield was then sorted with the small potatoes being used for food by the family and the larger ones being stored in a cellar. During the winter months the potatoes sometimes sprouted and then the family all helped remove the sprouts to keep the potatoes firm. In the spring, the potatoes must be de-sprouted once more and cut into pieces for planting, with an "eye" in each piece. These pieces were dipped into a solution of formaldehyde and water to preserve and disinfect them.

The Miles family outgrew the cement house so Ancel purchased the houses of two homesteaders which he moved together in an "L" shape. He invested in a new 100' deep water well which was drilled by Tom Robinson, Sr. It furnished abundant water so he erected a windmill over it and piped the water into an underground tank. From this tank the water was piped into two stock water tanks, near one of which was a shut-off valve. Over the valve Ancel built a box-like building. Water for house use was carried from this building to the house. In winter the pipes often froze. Then a fire would be built in the house to thaw the pipes. Soon Flora was using this building as a smokehouse for hams, bacon and the hard salami which she made.

Flora raised a big garden, canned vegetables and meats and made cheese and sauerkraut. She made her own soap, using pork fat and lye. Printed flour sacks were made into dresses and shirts, the plain ones into pillow cases and dish towels.

The timber east of Walker Creek furnished wood for the fires. Coal, available at the Flattop Mine southeast of Walker Creek, was hauled with team and wagon. Later it was hauled by truck from the Dry Creek area. Ancel, Paul LeBar and August Swanson put up ice together in the winter, packing it in straw and storing it in a cave for summer use.

Threshing time was a big event, especially if the crops were bountiful. It meant going from one place to another, helping each other with the harvest. The men and older boys worked in the fields. The women and older girls provided the vast amounts of food for the threshing crew. It was a time of hard work and long hours but it was also a time to visit and enjoy the companionship of one's neighbors.

Rex and (Flora) Jean Miles attended the Happy Hollow School which was located about three miles east of Highway 59 on the Walker Creek Road. The community held box socials to help pay for playground equipment. Among the teachers who taught there were Lucille Crelly, Peggy Joss, Mr. Dolan, Alice McCoubrey and Mrs. Tinsey Wilson.

There were many other social activities, such as card parties, oyster suppers, church at the Walker Creek School and dances held in homes large enough to handle that sort of gathering. There were pie and box socials held to raise money for a community hall which was built later next to the Walker Creek School. After its completion, most of the gatherings were held there. The Lundbergs had an orchestra, Carl played the piano, Fred and Felix played fiddles. On Sundays baseball teams from the various communities gathered at one place or another to play ball.

The Miles family moved to Douglas to live in 1940. Ancel sold his land to Thomas Meisner. To earn a living he contracted carpentry work on rural school houses during the next two years. With the outbreak of World War II Ancel was associated with Morrison-Knudson in the building of the Casper Airbase, later helping with the construction of the Prisoner of War Camp west of Douglas. There he held the position of superintendent of the camp's carpentry and paint shop, a job which lasted until the camp was closed in 1946. After that Ancel opened his own carpentry shop.

Warren Garst, a prominent wildlife photographer, enlisted Ancel's help to film some prairie animals for the Walt Disney movie, "The Vanishing Prairie." Ancel built a "mock up" of underground passageways to facilitate the filming procedure.

Flora Maye Miles died in Cody in 1962 but was buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery. After his wife's death, Ancel remained in Cody for about three years, returning to Douglas in 1965. He then engaged in business with the Kirby Vacuum Cleaner Company, operating his business in his home on Fifth and Cedar. Although he is no longer active socially, Miles is a 65-year Mason with membership in Bloomfield Lodge No. 218 in Bloomfield, Nebraska. He is a lifelong Methodist and a life member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association.

A kindly gentleman, immaculate in attire, Ancel is seldom caught without a smile for everyone he meets.

Miles, Jack and Myrtle Family

John Thomas (Jack) and Myrtle Sylvester Miles (1894-1978 and 1896-1960 respectively) moved from Trumbull County, Ohio to Converse County in 1927 with their five children: Joan, Myrtle "Myrt", Dan, Nedra and Dudley. Jack was badly wounded in World War I and came to Wyoming for his health. His closest war buddy, Lance Rose, worked on the Hawley place just above LaPrele Dam; and Jack stayed with the Roses for a year before bringing his family west. His first job was working at a sawmill run by Pete Dawes on Cross land at Cold Springs. The family spent several summers in the mountains, moving to town for school. In the early 1930's Jack took the contract to deliver mail on the rural route from Douglas to Cold Springs, which he carried for about ten years. In the meantime the family farmed several small places near Douglas.

Joan Miles married Glenn Lore in 1937; they have one son, Jack William. Joan worked for over 20 years in the Clerk of Court's office before being elected Clerk of Court in November 1978. Jack Lore married Sara Crane, daughter of Tom and Velma Gunstrum Crane; they have two children and live in Casper.

Myrtle "Myrt" Miles is one of our local characters. She should be eligible for Reader's Digest Most Unforgettable Character. During World War II she taught band in the local schools. About 1940 she took over the same rural mail route carried by her father. Myrt will be remembered as a talented western singer and she always dressed in men's western clothes. She still carries the same mail route to practically the same people, and she is still "Uncle Myrt" to all the kids. She lives on a small ranch just west of town.

Dan S. Miles served in the Army Air Corps as a fighter pilot in World War II and returned to Douglas after the war. He married Jeanne Volin, they have three children: Cathy, Mary and Danny.

Dan was an engineer in the Wyoming Highway Department for about 20 years and at the present time is in the engineering department for Exxon. Jeanne works at the Converse Land and Title Company.

Nedra Miles married Percy Hawkins of Abilene, Texas, they have one daughter, Lori. Nedra lived all her married life in Texas, returning to Douglas after her husband's death in 1975. She lives on the ranch with Myrt and is active in the out-reach activities under the Senior Citizens programs.

Dudley D. Miles (1925-1977):

I quote from the Congressional Record, April 7, 1977. (Mr. President refers to the President of the Senate).

"Senator Hansen of Wyoming: 'Mr. President, a co-worker and close friend to many of us, Dudley Miles, died suddenly Tuesday evening of a heart attack. We are saddened by this tragedy, and we join today with his many friends and colleagues to extend heartfelt sympathy to his widow, Rayma, his children, Julie, Daniel and Dudley, Jr. and to others in his family.

"As most senators know, Dudley served for a number of years with former Senator Gale McGee. More recently, he had served as chief clerk of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture. He was an uncommonly dedicated and knowledgeable man, and he will be sorely missed.

"Dudley Miles lived much of his life in Wyoming, where he attended public schools and earned his law degree from the University of Wyoming. He embarked on a distinguished career of public service, having served in the Army Air Corps and as county attorney in Carbon County, Wyoming as a top assistant to a U.S. Senator from Wyoming, and as the chief adviser to the members of the Senate Subcommittee charged with deciding how much money the government should spend for a broad range of federal programs and functions.

"He was a devoted husband and father and a faithful friend. I was honored to have known him, and I mourn his passing."

The record contains additional tributes from Senator Eagleton of Missouri, Senator Hatfield of Oregon, Senator Stennis of Mississippi, Ambassador Gale McGee and Secretary of Agriculture, Robert Bergland.

Miller, Carlos E. and Agnes

Carlos E. Miller came to Wyoming right after the 1st World War, after being discharged from the army. He was born in Sparta, Illinois in 1893. He filed on a homestead just south of the Walker Creek area about 5 miles.

He worked at the Carbon Black Plant at Lance Creek for sometime. He and Agnes H. Amsden were married in June 1921. He worked in various oil fields to make a living for Agnes and me. At that time I was about 3½ or 4 years old.

Agnes and I had come to Wyoming in 1919 with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Amsden from Marion, Indiana, to file on a homestead which was a short distance from where Carlos had settled.

Carlos had a brother, Bernelle Miller, who filed at the same time as he did on land right next to Carlos. They lived on it for a while, and they moved to Casper. Then we moved into their "Tar Paper Shack" we called home.

We continued to live there all the time I was at home; I left home in 1932. Sometime after that they built a house on Carlos' land. That house was moved to Douglas in 1950 and remodeled. I'm now living in it at 728 South 5th Street.

After they went through a lot of hardships like most everyone else, Carlos decided he was going to pursue another occupation. He had had some experience as a steamfitter when he worked in the Carbon Black Plant. He took a refresher course, and they moved to Seattle in 1940. He worked in the shipyards for awhile and finally went to work for an independent company and retired from there in 1957, when they moved to Encino, California where they lived until his death in April 1963.

Mrs. Miller moved back to Douglas the same year and lived with me until her death in August 1977.

Miller, Henry and Ruth Family

Henry's story began in Puppino, Schleswig-Holstein Province, Germany where he was born on May 14, 1870. His mother and father worked at the hunting lodge of the Kaiser, and could see no future in the country. There was no land to be had and no place to raise a family so they decided to join the ever increasing band of immigrants leaving for the United States.

In the late 1870s, they and three of their children left Germany to come to America. They settled in Rock Island, Illinois where his father worked on the Rock Island Railroad. As a young man, Henry worked on the railroad and soon found himself in Colorado. He found work as a ranch-hand near Sterling. It was here he met Ruth Viola Dean.

Ruth Dean was born in Mendota, Illinois on October 14, 1870 and was left an orphan at the age of twelve. She had lived with an aunt until she had passed away, and then she went to work in other people's homes wherever she was needed. It was then that she met Henry. They were later married at Omaha, Nebraska.

To this union two sons were born. The eldest, Harry Clifford was born at Letts, Iowa on June 18, 1900 and Ray Dexter was born at Topeka, Kansas on January 18, 1910.

Hearing of the "free land" to be had in Wyoming, the Millers left Kansas on the train, to move to Douglas, Wyoming where they were going to homestead in Converse County. Expansive and promising, Wyoming seemed to answer their need, for here were acres of virgin grassland for the taking.

They arrived in the early fall of 1916, and set about looking for a site to build their home. In locating a prime homestead site, the family sought to find good soil for farming and water. The Millers found sparse vegetation, few streams and rolling land, but knew that this would prove easier to cultivate since there were no forests to clear, no marshes to drain and the soil was sandy. They settled on 320 acres of land in Township 34 N, Range 70 W. They immediately built a one room house to live in. They also constructed a shed to keep their team of horses out of the weather. Their mode of transportation was a wagon and a team of horses, thus they must be cared for carefully.

It wasn't long till winter set in and as money was of short supply, Henry and Harry went to Glenrock to work in the oilfields in and around there. They needed the money to pay their expenses and build up their homestead. Mrs. Miller and Ray moved into Douglas where she worked on a dairy farm until spring. When spring came, Henry, Ruth and Ray moved back to the homestead, but Harry continued to work at Glenrock that year. At last they had their own home and the attraction of the prairie had gotten into their blood and they knew they would be dissatisfied away from it.

Methods of farming and farm tools were different from what Henry had used so these had to be mastered. In testing the fertility of their land, Henry and Harry experimented with different crops but finally settled on wheat and oats. These crops seemed to do well in this soil.

As well as farming, they had to haul firewood and coal from a long distance away by team and wagon. This could take one or two days to make the round trip. Day in and day out, they worked to produce the necessities of life.

As more settlers arrived with their families, a school was built and since the Millers had added onto their house, they "boarded" the school teachers in their home to earn a little extra money.

In the fall of 1924 Rebecca Chandler came from Neosho, Missouri to teach school. As she was assigned a school near the Millers' home, she stayed at their house. She had left Missouri because the salary for teachers was very low and the schools in Wyoming had offered considerably more money. Rebecca found the life a bit daunting at first, but came to love the prairie.

On May 29, 1926, Harry and Rebecca were married. Theirs was an unusual wedding, as it took place on the prairie on horseback. Their attendants were Harry's brother, Ray and Rebecca's best friend, Anna Thatcher.

Harry and Rebecca, Becky as she was known, filed for a homestead of their own on Township 34 N, Range 70 W, Section 21 NE<sup>4</sup> and NW<sup>4</sup>. They built their three room house so that it looked down upon a small creek that ran in front of the house.

When Harry was 18 years old he had joined the National Guard in Douglas and had become a Sergeant of F Troop and was a member of the famous Black Horse Troop that performed at fairs and rodeos over the country. After his marriage he continued to belong to the Guard.

As they needed water, Harry and Ray dug a well on Harry's place. They had to dig 23 feet to get water, but water they got.

During Harry and Rebecca's life on the homestead, two sons and one daughter were born. Gene Clifford was born on March 18, 1927, Norman Louis was born on February 10, 1930 and Betty Joan on October 22, 1933. Gene and Norman attended the Happy Hollow School along with the other children in the area, and rode the school bus with them. Several years later another daughter was born, Sharon Lee on May 29, 1938.

The Miller's second son, Ray, continued to farm with Harry and his dad. He also married a school teacher, Mary Keenan, who had come from Colorado to teach in the school near his home. They were married on December 2, 1927. To this couple were born one son, John H. on September 20, 1928 and one daughter, Mary Catherine on June 20, 1938.

As the weather pattern seemed to change and fields that were once productive became barren, the Millers sold their homesteads and moved into Douglas. Harry and his family moved to Thermopolis where he worked as an engineer and helped build the highways of the state.

After moving to Douglas, Ruth developed cancer and passed away on December 22, 1935. Henry continued to live at Douglas where he became a builder. He passed away September 28, 1956 at Cheyenne.

Harry had moved to Kansas in 1950 and he died there of cancer on January 11, 1967.

While employed by the Boeing Missile Co., Ray was killed in a car crash in Colorado on May 22, 1967.

Although the original members of the family are gone, many grandchildren and great grandchildren remain.

Miller, Paul "Blinky" H. and Bessie L. Family

Paul H. "Blinky" Miller was born in Sageeyah, Indian Territory (now Claremore, Oklahoma), July 14, 1897. He was the tenth child of Henry Massey Miller and Mary Jane Orr Miller. His parents moved to the southern part of Indian Territory when he was four years old. His mother died in May 1902 and his father died in 1909. His sister Mary and her husband, Sam Smith, returned to the family home to care for her brothers and sisters.

My father told me that times were very hard and his brother-in-law believed a good flogging never hurt anyone. The schoolmaster would also flog all the boys every morning just to make sure they got what was coming to them that day. When my father was 13 and in the fifth grade, he decided he had had enough and he would take steps to alleviate part of the beatings he was getting every day. Before going to school one morning he stole his brother-in-law's six shooter and waited until the schoolmaster went to the outdoor privy and he emptied all six bullets into the privy. Thinking he had probably killed the school master he left for parts unknown.

Paul's father, Henry Massey Miller, had been a farmer and a stockman. He had made nine trips from the Mexico border up the Chisholm trail, first as a hired hand and then as a foreman. His sons, Paul and Hinton, took turns going with him on the trail drives. Therefore, Paul was an experienced cowboy and he worked as a "wangler" for various ranches in Oklahoma, Texas and New Mexico after he left home. When he reached Denver, Colorado he worked on a poultry farm for three years and came to Wyoming on a coal train in 1914. He worked in Lost Springs in an underground coal mine for about a year before going to work for Harry Pollard. When he reached Wyoming he let the folks back home know where he was. His brother, Hinton, came to Wyoming in 1916 and told him at that time that not one of those bullets had hit the schoolmaster.

Paul worked for several area ranchers in the next few years, Harry Pollard, Bert Emery, Bill Dorr and Vic DeMott. He worked for the Dorr's for the longest period of time and Bill's sons, Percy, Dutch and Paul, were very close and could tell many a wild tale. Blinky broke horses for the army while working at the Fiddleback Ranch for Vic DeMott in 1917. His brother, Hinton, was drafted in WWI and was killed in France. Blinky was one of the best bronc riders in his day and never missed a good rodeo. He always said every horse had his own rhythm, all you had to do was find it. He was a contestant in the American Legion's Fourth of July Rodeo at Gillette in 1921. Never in the history of Gillette had a bucking contest been represented by so many good riders and horses. Paul was picked as the winner, receiving as first prize a beautiful one hundred dollar Furstnow saddle.

Blinky homesteaded in the Cow Creek Buttes near the old Burning Coal Mine in 1921.

Bessie Leola Russ was born in McLean, Nebraska, November 22, 1904. Her parents later moved to Chambers, Nebraska where they were engaged in the farming business. After she graduated from high school, she enrolled in the Teachers Normal Training School in Peru, Nebraska. She came to Wyoming in the fall of 1922 and taught two years at the Rounds School in the Cow Creek Buttes.

Paul H. (Blinky) Miller and Bessie L. Russ were married in 1923. Bessie also filed on a homestead and that is where the ranch was built. Roy Wampler was hired to build a log house. The logs were cut, peeled and hauled by team and wagon to the ranch site from the Cow Creek Buttes. Wood and coal were also hauled from the buttes for fuel. A neighbor, Bert Good, drilled the water well and the water was so hard and had so much iron in it that visitors were advised to bring their own drinking water or take their chances with a bout of diarrhea. The wind mill and cistern were on a hill from the house and in later years water was piped inside the house. Instead of electric lights we had carbide lights.

There were eight children born to this union: Betty, Bob, Billy, Mary, Raymond, Joan, Max and Karen, who was ten years younger than Max. Our neighbors, Bert and Ela Good used to take care of the older children when mother went to Douglas to have the next one. When Billy was born their daughter, Rua, said, "Oh, Mother, now they've got Blinky, Bess, Betty, Bob and Billy at the Millers!"

The ranch was located 65 miles northeast of Douglas and trips into Douglas were infrequent. My parents bought enough groceries every fall to carry them through the winter. They always raised a big garden and my mother spent all summer canning food for winter. The older children went to the Crater Basin School which was a quarter of a mile from the ranch. In addition to their own ranching operation, my dad continued to break horses, run livestock and rode for area ranches. Dad was away from home a lot and mother took the reins in hand doing the inside and outside work with the help of the older children.

Due to the drought in 1934 they leased and moved to the Johnny Thompson place on Lighting Creek. They lived there one year before moving back to the ranch on Cow Creek. My mother hunted and shot about 300 Cotton-tail rabbits that winter with a 410 shot gun and sold them for 35 cents a piece.

A range of hills in Converse County have been named the Miller Hills. This seems an appropriate tribute to two people who struggled through some arduous years raising eight children and accumulating enough land to support their family.

Their oldest daughter, Betty, had a tonsillectomy when she was three years old. During surgery the doctor severed her left vocal cord and she was unable to talk out loud the rest of her life. Ensuing medical problems required numerous surgeries and she was hospitalized at the Children's Hospital in Denver, Colorado for long periods of time. A tracheotomy was performed when she was three years old. When she was able to be at home my father was the only one who could change the tube in her throat. If he had to go riding he would take Betty with him in order to care for her. Her handicap did not hinder her accomplishments. My mother had to work outside a great deal of the time and Betty would care for her brothers and sisters, was an excellent cook, did the housework and was an accomplished seamstress. And through it all she had a terrific sense of humor. She attended school in the elementary grades in the Children's Hospital in Denver and high school at Dry Creek, Lusk and Douglas. She was awarded a four year scholarship to Laramie which she forfeited as she elected to stay in Douglas and work at the Converse County Library and later at the Prisoner of War Camp.

My parents went into the sheep business in 1937 and at one time had around 3000 head. At that time, sheep management was very different compared to sheep ranchers today. We had sheep tight fences and a herder with the sheep at all times (usually a little Miller). At the end of the year we knew where and what happened to every lost animal and a loss of 20 or more was bad news.

Paul and Bessie were divorced in 1953. My mother later remarried and moved to Jerome, Idaho where she lived until her death in 1973.

Dad sold the ranch to Victor and Mary Nachtman in 1958. He moved to Newcastle in 1960 and lived on a small place north of town until his death in 1967.

Bob served in the Navy in WWII and Billy and Raymond served in the Korean War. Bob was killed in a light plane crash in 1947, Billy died in 1975 and Betty in 1981. At this writing, Billy's wife, Elsie, and son, Dennis, still operate their ranch near Guernsey. Mary, Raymond and Joan live in Casper, Max is in Douglas and Karen is in Jerome, Idaho.

Mitchell, Harry and Margaret

Thomas Harte Benton Mitchell, of German descent, was born in Florence, Missouri and grew to manhood there. At the beginning of the Civil War, Thomas bought a second-lieutenancy in the Union Army. A man enlisting in the army at that time could become an officer simply by buying the position. T. B. fought against a brother and several half-brothers who had enlisted in the Confederate Army in the battle of Pea Ridge, Arkansas. Thomas was wounded in this battle, taking a mini-ball in his hip. He was taken to the hospital in Sedalia, Missouri. The doctors decided it would be wisest not to try to remove the lead so Thomas carried the rifle ball for the rest of his life.

Barbara Ann Yankee, born and raised in Missouri had volunteered to help care for the wounded in the hospital in Sedalia. It was there that she met T. B. They were married in 1860. Thomas withdrew from the army and they moved to a 40 acre farm near Florence to make their home.

Harry, their eldest son, was born in Florence in 1879. He had three sisters and two brothers. He received his education in the rural schools near his home.

The family moved to Colorado when Harry was in his early 20's. Thomas took a claim of 160 acres, south of

Otis. Thomas thought that there he would be able to provide a better living for his family. Harry found employment with the railroad in Akron, Colorado. He was put in charge of a work train tending the line between Galesburg, Illinois and Sheridan, Wyoming.

Harry married Margaret Dolly Helbig in Denver, Colorado in 1911. She was born in 1888 in Burwell, Nebraska. Her parents were full-blooded Germans; they had immigrated from the old country and were married in Chicago, Illinois. Margaret grew up in the farming community near North Loup, Nebraska and was educated in the schools there. She was the youngest child in a family of seven - three boys and four girls. Her older sister, Dena, had married and moved to Akron, Colorado. Dena became seriously ill in 1910 and Margaret was sent to Colorado by her parents to help care for Dena and her family. It was there that she met Harry Mitchell.

After his marriage, Harry gave up his job as foreman on the work train to work as a laborer in the coal chutes at the railroad yards located in Brush, Colorado. It was dirty, strenuous work, for less money, but it enabled him to live at home with his wife. Soon after the birth of their first son in 1912, it was feared that Margaret might be developing tuberculosis, the illness from which her sister, Dena, had suffered. Harry decided to investigate the possibility of homesteading in Wyoming, hoping that the higher altitude might prove beneficial to his wife. He made the trip to Douglas in a Model "T" Ford. It was springtime. At Chugwater he was delayed for three days because Chugwater Creek was flooding. There was no bridge across the creek so Harry was forced to wait until the water receded before he could ford the creek.

Douglas was a rowdy town in 1916, composed of numerous saloons, a livery stable and various small business establishments. Upon his arrival there, Harry was told that there was open land in the vicinity of Glenrock. He filed on a claim to the north of the town. A short time later he was told that a pioneer resident of Douglas by the name of Tony Logan was acting as a "locater". Evidently, Harry was not completely satisfied with his claim since he went back to Douglas to engage Mr. Logan to find some land closer to Douglas. The service which Logan rendered the prospective homesteaders was simply that of pointing out various unclaimed tracts in the vicinity. For this he charged according to the amount of time he spent searching for a location satisfactory to his client. On one such trip, Harry and Mr. Logan stopped to visit with a homesteader whose claim was located about eleven miles northeast of Douglas. The homesteader was thoroughly disgusted with his claim and with Wyoming. He wanted nothing more than to return to the east. All he wished was that he could find someone to compensate him for the improvements he had made. If he could find such a person then he would relinquish his claim and vacate the premises. A price of $50.00 was the sum agreed upon. The deal was closed. Harry relinquished his rights to the claim near Glenrock and immediately filed on the claim near Douglas. Having completed the paper work, Harry accompanied the departing homesteader to the depot to catch a train. The man was carrying a .32 caliber Winchester. The conductor refused to allow the man to board with the rifle so the homesteader asked Harry if he would buy it. Harry, with little money to spare, could not afford the purchase. Just as the train was pulling out, the homesteader thrust the rifle into Harry's hands, and jumped aboard the train.

Harry returned to Colorado to gather his belongings. He rented an emigrant car to transport his livestock and equipment, this being the most economical method. He loaded his team, wagon, walking plow, tools and his household furnishings into the car. He made a bed for himself so that he could care for his livestock during the trip.

In the spring of 1917, Margaret and five year old Leland came to Douglas on the train. Harry met them and took them to the 12'x16' shack, which resembled a black boxcar. A "water witch" named Axxe was hired to locate water. A well was drilled about a quarter mile to the east. With the help of neighbors, Harry moved the shack next to the well.

One day in early fall, a great herd of cattle numbering 3000 head appeared on the south horizon. They were being driven from Texas to the Rosebud Indian Reservation in South Dakota. It was an awesome sight.

There were few schools in the rural areas. Harry's eldest son, Leland, received his elementary education in one which was located about two miles from this home. The school term lasted six months. A rural teacher earned $21.00 per month then, of which she must pay $7.00 for room and board.

In 1919 Dorothy Ruth was born to Harry and Margaret; she, too, attended the rural school until the mid 1920's when she became ill with a heart condition. Thomas Harry, the second son, was born in 1923, and Phyllis Margaret was born in 1925. All of the children, except Leland, were born in Douglas in a "lying-in" home.

The health of the eldest daughter steadily worsened. Harry moved his family into Douglas so that Dorothy Ruth could have better medical help. She died in 1929. During this time, Harry lived at the homestead, spending as much time as he possibly could with his family in town. Leland was attending high school then and Tom had just started elementary school. The family remained in Douglas until the spring of 1930, after which they returned to the homestead.

It was very difficult to make a decent living during the decade which followed - a decade of drought, depression and despair. The future of those homesteaders with small herds of cattle and sheep looked very bleak. There was no market for livestock, no feed for them, and thus, no income. Many of the families were forced to give up their homes and move away; those that remained existed with only the bare necessities of life. Harry and his family belonged to the latter group.

In the late 1930's, Harry was doing some repair work on his Ford. He had blocked up the rear axle and removed one wheel. His teenaged son, Tom, was helping with the work. Harry was lying beneath the vehicle when suddenly the blocks slipped. The car fell, pinning Harry beneath the frame. He was barely able to breath. Tom, faced with this terrible crisis, found the strength to lift the car just high enough so that his father could wiggle from under it. Miraculously, Harry suffered no broken bones, but from that time until his death in 1943, his health gradually declined.

In 1942, Harry sold his original homestead and some other land which he had accumulated and bought the McColl place which laid about three miles to the east. It was about twice the size of the original place. He had built his cattle numbers to about 80 head since 1934 when the government bought and slaughtered so many cattle and sheep.

Leland, who had been employed in various jobs, joined the Air Force in 1940. His outfit was sent to Mindinao in the Phillipine Islands. He was captured by the Japanese and spent 44 months in prison camps located in both the Phillipine Islands and in Japan.

Owing to his father's infirm condition, Tom had been charged with the responsibility of the ranch work since he was 16 years old. After his father's death in 1943 he managed the ranch, cared for his widowed mother and in addition he somehow completed his high school education.

In 1945, Tom married Ruth Lindmier in Douglas, Wyoming. They lived on the Mitchell property until the spring of 1949 when they moved to the Harney Creek Ranch north of Lost Springs. Margaret lived for a time in the Douglas area. Later, she moved to Nebraska to live with her sister, and later still, she was employed as a housekeeper for a family in Denver, Colorado. Her surviving daughter, Phyllis, had married and made her home in Riverton, Wyoming. Margaret took an apartment, and lived there for several years. Finally, she returned to Douglas in 1974 to make her home at Irwin Towers. About two years later, she moved into Michael Manor rest home, due to the fact that she was almost blind. It was there that she passed away at the age of 91.

Tom and Ruth pastured cattle for Margaret so she might have income on which to live. They used the Mitchell property in return for caring for Margaret's livestock. In 1959 Tom bought his mother's land and the land belonging to his father-in-law. Since Tom and Ruth had no natural children, they adopted two. The girl Ruth Anne, was born in 1954 in Sheridan, Wyoming. John Arthur, their son, was born in 1956 in Sheridan. Tom died in 1979 of cancer. Ruth has since remarried and lives with her husband, Elmer Grant, on Harney Creek.

Anne, who has two children, a boy and a girl; and John who has one son, John Dalton, live in Douglas.

Leland married Clara Gerdtz, and Phyllis married Clinton Holtz in a double wedding in 1948. Leland and Clara live in Kearney, Nebraska. Phyllis and Clint had two son, Patrick Earl, born in 1948, and Robert Clinton, born in 1956. Phyllis lost her husband in 1973 and married Robert G. Davis; they live in Colorado Springs, Colorado where Phyllis works at the Air Force Academy.

Harry Mitchell jokingly said that he came to Wyoming to make his fortune in just five years, but he never made enough money to buy a train ticket to leave. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and served several terms on the local school board.

Mohr, George and Nell Family

George Mohr was born in Bergen, Norway on November 3, 1869, the son of Carl and Hagelsteen Mohr. He came to the United States as a young man and worked on ranches in New Mexico and Colorado until his arrival in Wyoming.

Nell Shonerd became George's wife on June 23, 1898. She was born in Olney, Illinois on April 10, 1878. They had two boys, Carroll (born in Pinneo, Washington County, Colorado on April 2, 1900) and David. David lives in Rosarita Beach, Baja, California.

Carroll married Julia Loser in Denver, Colorado on September 22, 1920. Julia was born on May 13, 1899 in Denver, Colorado. Two sons, Wesley and Carroll Jr., were born to them. Wesley died in 1975.

Carroll worked at the new Midwest Refinery in Laramie, Wyoming after their marriage and when it was finished he moved back to Denver. Shortly after George Mohr took the position of manager of the Fiddleback Ranch succeeding Mr. Gleason. When George became seriously ill Carroll and Julia moved to the ranch on Box Creek north of Douglas to help out.

George died on April 5, 1923. Nell taught school after George's death, first at the Clayton Tank Farm and then at the South Grade School in Douglas. Julia Mohr wrote in her story the following about Nell, "I remember that she (Nell) used to tell us of the antics of Eddie Moore. My wish is that she could have lived to know what a fine man he has turned out to be. I know he would say he was "one of the Moore tids". Nell spent her retirement years in California and passed away on September 7, 1963.

In 1944 Carroll and Julia purchased the Box Creek division of the Fiddleback Ranch. Shortly after they sold it to Jake Johnson and his family. The Mohrs then moved to Laramie where they owned and operated a motel for several years before moving to California.

Carroll died on October 20, 1981. Julia lives in a retirement home in Irvine, California.

Moore, Earl and Mary Family

Earl Moore was born at Laramie, Wyoming on March 23, 1893, the son of Harry and Genevieve Moore. Harry was Postmaster at French, Wyoming which no longer exists. Genevieve died when Earl was two years old and he was sent to live with his aunt and uncle, the William Huxtfords at Central City, Nebraska. Earl attended school at Central City, working at available jobs before entering the service in WWI in July of 1917 for a short duration.

Mary Barta was born November 11, 1896 at Linwood, Nebraska to John and Anna Barta. She grew up on a farm seven miles from Central City, attending school in a one room school house on her parents' place.

Earl and Mary were married at North Platte, Nebraska in September 1918 at which time Earl was working for the Bureau of Reclamation at Bayard, Nebraska. At the same time a friend of the Moores, Louis Buckridge, worked on the same job as a blacksmith. "Buck", as he was nicknamed, suffered from asthma and was told by his doctor to move to a higher, dryer climate. In 1917 Buck filed on a homestead north of Douglas, Wyoming in Converse County. In 1918 Buck built a one room house and settled down.

In the spring of 1918 Earl quit his job with the reclamation service, went to Douglas and filed on a homestead of his own. Violet was born on December 11, 1919 at Bayard and on March 20, 1920 Earl and Mary loaded their worldly goods into their Model T Ford and headed for Wyoming.

Dad, Mom and I, Violet, lived with Buck while our 12 x 16 foot house was being built with lumber purchased from a brother of John Wohlford who decided homesteading was not for him after he'd hauled the lumber to a site south of the Cheyenne River. Dad and Buck moved to Casper where Buck worked at the round house and Dad sold coal for $1.00 a sack or larger amounts which was delivered in his Model T Ford. He sold mostly to the Sand Bar District which at that time was the red light district; another fellow delivered coal with a team and wagon. Jobs were scarce and any job was most welcome.

Mom and I were left to live on the homestead until Dad could provide a place for us to live. Somewhere along the way things got pretty hectic, and we (Mom and I) moved to the Dilts Ranch with Mr. and Mrs. "Bud" Logan who was the foreman at that time.

In time, Dad found work in Casper with the building trades and was able to move us up with him. On January 23, 1921 another daughter, Genevieve, was born. On July 7, 1923 another daughter, Ruth, was born. After we moved back north of Douglas the little house was torn down and another house was built on a real cement foundation so we had a basement for storage.

Dad bought his first cow from William Powell, then more cattle from Mr. Thompson. He also bought three cattle in Casper where he rode horseback from Douglas to drive them home. In those days there were no fences and the cattle could travel for miles.

A start in the sheep business was from bum lambs, lambs who lost their mothers or by mothers who disowned them, from the Dilts ranch and bottle fed until they could eat grass. Later on, Dad bought 100 head of yearlings from Wade Fowler; Jacob Riehle also bought sheep from Mr. Fowler, and together they trailed their sheep to their respective ranches. In the summer when we three girls were old enough, we would herd the sheep while Dad would plant and tend his fields. Mom raised chickens, turkeys and a garden.

On June 10, 1930 Dad sent we three girls to visit our aunt, Sophia Barta, who lived several miles north of us, when we returned that evening we were greeted with the news that we had a baby brother named Ronald.

Since we had no school or teacher, my first two years of school were spent living with Grandma Barta, Aunt Sophia, Aunt Rosie and Uncle Ed, going to the same little school where Mom, her brothers and sisters went. Gen, when she was old enough, also attended school there. Our first years of school in Wyoming were held in the home of "Bill" Dillon, who herded sheep and was never home in the winter. Our teacher was Doris Partridge, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Robertson. Students were Kenneth Robertson, Robert House who roomed and boarded with the Robertsons, Gen, Ruth and myself. We girls rode about four miles on horseback for several years until the Patterson school house was moved by Dad and his tractor from the Dry Creek community to a site north and west of where we lived. Doris was still our teacher with several more students as more people had moved into the community. Clara and Mary Ellen Martin along with the same ones from the Dillon school.

In the winter time the men would get together to put up ice, armed with a saw, ice tongs and team and wagon, they would saw blocks of ice that were hauled to a cellar where it was packed with coal dust or saw dust for use during the summer. Also, the men would help one another if any butchering was to be done, and we could look forward to fresh meat for supper.

In the early 1930's dad built us a sod house. It had one large room, a kitchen, a bedroom, too cold to sleep in in the winter time and a room to hold coal so we wouldn't have to leave the house for fuel. It was great in the winter but rattlesnakes found a cool place to live in the summer time. Ticks were something else we were always on the look out for every spring.

School was consolidated at Verse with students bused from south and north of the Cheyenne River by Jim Stevens, first using a car as a bus then later a school bus to gather kids along the route. Melvin Shadel was the bus driver for kids north and south of the Antelope Creek. Gladys Hanlin was our teacher for all grades one - eight. School was held in the community hall during the week, the hall was used for dances on Saturday night and Sunday school and church on Sundays. The hall had a kitchen where sandwiches and coffee (that was made in a washboiler) were served at dances. On Sunday we girls would tie our Sunday school clothes in a flour sack, ride horseback to Sunday school then change our clothes in the outhouse and attend Sunday school. After services which were lead by Ralph Haefele the first three Sundays of the month and lead by a minister Rev. Noyce from Wheatland, Wyoming on the fourth Sunday.

Mom made our underclothes from flour sacks that she soaked in lye water to take the lettering out but that didn't always do the trick so it was nothing to see "Pride of the West" or "Lily White" stamped across our bottoms when we stooped over.

Dad proved up on the homestead in 1932, sold his sheep and place in 1935-36, then moved to the Crouse place near Dry Creek, then moved to Sheridan in March 1937. He moved to Wyarno for two years, moved to Ulm then to Clearmont and into Sheridan in 1948.

Mary passed away in July 1968. Earl is at the V.A. Hospital in Sheridan at this time.

Violet lives in Anchorage, Alaska; Gen in Bridal Veil, Oregon; Ruth in Preston, Idaho and Ronald in Tacoma, Washington.

Some things that I didn't add are Dad playing baseball with games played at Verse or Dry Creek. The 4th of July was a big day for us as we all went to Dry Creek for a big celebration, baseball games, pop if we could work enough dimes from folks and dance at night.

Dad bought a Model A and taught Mom to drive. One day she went to visit the Oskins family and on the way home the car wouldn't stop when she hollered "whoa" at a gate and naturally she went right through. Dad laughed but Mom never drove again.

The folks went to Casper and left the three of us with Mr. Robert Ireton as he was drilling a well on our place at the time. While the folks were gone we each took a bottle of beer and since we didn't know how to open the bottles we used a nail and hammer to make a hole in the top. After a couple of swallows each we didn't want any more but where to put the bottles so they wouldn't be found? Down the outhouse they went but not far enough not to be seen. We got a box of matches and proceeded to light them trying to build a fire in the cow barn. When the folks came home they had a black baby doll and a pair of beads for each of us, which we were very proud of, until Dad made a trip - the back house where the beer bottles were staring at him and another trip through the cow shed where the matches popped up with each step. Needless to say the dolls and beads were taken from us as punishment. In order to make the folks feel bad for what they did, we went down the road a little way and laid down by a gate separating our place from Buck's and we decided we'd die, that would show them. We didn't realize it took so long to die and since hunger came before death, we went home again.

Moore, Lee and Amanda Family

As with many of the pioneer families of Wyoming, the Moore family had its origins in Texas. Lee Moore was born at Round Rock, Texas, January 1, 1856, the son of John and Emily Elliott Moore. John Moore served in the Mexican War and the Civil War, serving some time as a prisoner of war at Ft. Delaware after being wounded, being released at the close of the War, then he returned to Texas where he lived until his death in 1920.

Lee Moore was the oldest child. He spent his childhood around Williamson County, Texas. He describes his early life there in a letter to the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association in 1914, from which we quote:

"In 1861, my uncle Jack Elliott started to the War of the Rebellion, he gave me an old cow and a little calf, and my father gave me a pony and a bridle and sheep skin hickory shirt, so at five years of age I was a cattle owner, fully equipped for the business, but that winter the old cow died or went to war. As I thought in those days everything went to war but women, children and negroes, and as my calf was not a heifer, and owing to my age, my herd did not increase during the war, but when the cruel war was over and my father came home, I owned a work steer. My father, knowing my weakness for little calves, gave me a calf for my steer, and he continued to give me a little calf for my yearling every year until I was about sixteen.

"In 1866 my father added to my uniform a saddle, overalls, a wool hat, a pair of shoes and started me out 'reping'. Reping in 1866 was quite different from 'reping' in Wyoming in 1914. We didn't call it roundup in those days, we called it cow-hunting and every man went to see what he had left and to brand what had not been branded during the war."

So, Lee Moore, at the age of 10, was already a cowboy. He worked for I. P. Olive and the Snyders, and in 1877 hired out as a "common waddie to go down to the coast and help drive a herd of cattle to old Cheyenne". At Hillsdale, below Cheyenne, Snyder delivered cattle to Alex Swan, John Sparks, and others, and Snyder then took his "waddies" into Cheyenne, where he paid them off. Lee Moore then found a job with Tom Brandson's outfit "with Dave Knight as foreman. John Sparks was interested in the outfit — that is we had a lot of 4J cattle. We branded the cattle at ex-Governor Carey's ranch on Little Horse Creek and then drove them to where Douglas now stands. We camped overnight at what now is the State Fairgrounds. The next morning we turned about half the cattle across the river. We turned the balance loose on the north side."

In 1879 Lee Moore was on the roundup which started April 1 at Ft. Fetterman, with Joe Hazen as foreman. They worked the north side of the river first, swimming the cattle across the river each night as they would work the south side last.

After the roundup, Lee Moore returned to Texas, and came up the trail again in 1880, and when the herd was disposed of at Ogallala, Nebraska, he went to work for the 0-0 outfit, Hanner and McKauley as owners and Joe Stratton as foreman. They drove the herd to Antelope Springs (located on land now owned by Lee Moore's great grandson, Billy Moore) and turned the herd loose. He then "reped" at several roundups — 1881 on the Powder River, and in 1882 he ran a wagon on the roundup on Powder River. In 1882 he drove beef to the railroad to ship to market, one bunch to Pine Bluffs, two to Thatcher, Nebraska, which was the terminus of the Northwestern Railroad. Following these drives, he returned to Texas, where on January 4, 1883, he married Amanda Thomas. They returned to Wyoming shortly after that, where he was put in charge of the 0-0 outfit. In 1884 he was foreman of the roundup from the mouth of Black Thunder to Fetterman. Quoting from his letter again: "I received ten percent of all the maverick money. This was the first year the mavericks were ever sold and the proceeds went to the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association. The foreman was required to give the bond and sell all mavericks every ten days and send the proceeds with the ten percent to Tom Sturgis, who was Secretary of the Association. Our old friend, Luke Voorhees and Charles Campbell were my bondsmen. My first sale was to Metcalf and Williams. Mr. Campbell instructed me to buy them for him if I could get them at $15.00 a head. As I could pay only $15.00 and John T. Williams gave more, I sold them to him. When I put in my report, Mr. Sturgis wrote back that it was not the intention of the Association to sell those yearlings to men like Metcalf and Williams, but Mr. Campbell said I was inside the law and to go ahead and sell them to the highest bidder."

In 1887, Lee Moore bought a few cattle; in the spring of 1888, he found himself without a job, so he ran the general roundup from Lance Creek west. In 1889 and 1890, he worked for the Ogallala Ranch, of which William C. Irvine was manager.

In 1891, Lee Moore established his first ranch on the head of the Belle Fourche; it was about this time that he was blackballed as a "rustler." As he wrote: "The laws of Wyoming required a man to brand his calves before they were a year old and, as a great many of the cowmen violated that law by not branding them before they were a year old, I adopted some of these neglected yearlings and put my brand on them so that the cowboys would know whose they were, and also to increase my herd. I followed the industry until 1899 when I discovered that the legal talent necessary was so expensive that my profit was not sufficient to carry on the business and eat regularly, so I sold out and left Weston County with some regrets, a lot of good friends and no bad debts, and came to Converse County and bought Royston's Ranch on Lightning Creek (now owned by Lee Moore's great grandson, Jack).

"I didn't have stock enough to make ranching pay so in 1902 I went into the First National Bank at Douglas with my breath stronger than my intellect and after knocking down a couple of clerks and getting by the cashier, I found Mr. J. DeForest Richards in his office and after making my X and a lot of promises, I borrowed money to buy cattle with. I bought some two-year-old southern steers and ran them two years. I shipped them to Omaha and when I had them all shipped out, I found that I had lost the interest and my labor, but consoled myself that I was a cowman and could borrow money, that I had the use of those steers for two years and that I would never buy any more until I could fatten them. Here I am (in 1914) still borrowing money and buying cattle, and if I ever die, which I think is doubtful, I will still have a little calf to hand down to my grandson, little Lee

About 1908 Lee Moore sold the ranch on Lightning Creek to his son, Leroy, and moved to the Diamond Ranch at Chugwater. He served there as one of the first members of the Platte County Board of Commissioners, and later served in Cheyenne as Commissioner of Brands.

Lee and Amanda Moore had seven children: Leroy, the oldest, was born in 1883 at the Ogalalla Ranch; Robert Floyd (Jib); Frank; Nealy; Cecil; Carrie; and Villa. Cecil and Carrie died young; Frank drowned at the Lightning Creek Ranch in the lake formed by the natural spring there. Villa married William Paxton Irvine; she died in Buffalo, Wyoming in 1984.

Lee Moore, like the others who were involved in the Johnson County War, said little about his part in that infamous affair. He was listed as one of the "rustlers" the Invaders set out to eradicate; in 1891, because he feared not only for his life but for that of his family, he sent his wife and children to Texas and took to hiding out. He told his grandson, Lee, that they would move camp at night, hiding out by day, never staying two days at the same place. His companions changed constantly, and they were wary of any newcomers they ran into. He was present at the TA Ranch where the Invaders were surrounded, and it was here that he took the rifle which belonged to Nate Champion from the Invader's wagon. He gave this rifle to Nate's brother, Dudley, who later gave it to Lee Moore to keep, who later gave it to his grandson, Lee, who has placed it in the Pioneer Museum at Douglas. Dudley Champion was later killed by Mike Shonsey.

The winter of 1886-1887 was one of the worst in history, and many, many cattle were lost. It is thought that because of the heavy losses, eastern and foreign owners of the large ranches blamed their losses not on the winter but on the rustlers. The weather was not only hard for the cattle but for the men. That winter Lee Moore and Ollie Chambers spent at the Ogalalla Ranch and had to use the poles in the corrals for fuel. When spring came it was necessary to cut and haul replacement poles from the Pine Ridge. The remaining horses were thin and weak, so Lee and Ollie had to supplement their teams with saddle horses. They would work a string, then bob their tails so they knew which ones had been used, and catch another bunch and hitch them up.

About this time, while Lee Moore was foreman of the Ogalalla, he was called on to testify against horse thieves who had stolen horses from the outfit. He had to appear in Sundance one day, and be in Douglas the next morning. He left Sundance, on horseback, about three o'clock in the afternoon, rode to an Ogalalla line camp on Spring Creek 65 miles north of Douglas, where he caught a fresh horse, and made it into Douglas in time for the opening of court that morning.

Another interesting incident was one time when he was on roundup, he befriended a young tenderfoot lawyer fresh from the East. This young man had signed up to work on the roundup and was fired by the foreman at Lance Creek and set afoot. That was a long ways from town. Lee Moore lent the lad a horse to come to Douglas. When the boy showed up in Douglas, the marshal recognized the horse and thought it had been stolen, so he held the boy in custody until Lee Moore could get to town and explain the circumstances. This young man later became a well-known citizen of Wyoming, and his son, Milward Simpson, became governor as well as senator; and his grandson is presently serving Wyoming in the U.S. Senate. Mr. Simpson never forgot this kindness and always regarded Lee Moore as a friend.

Lee Moore was the first marshal of the first state fair to be held in Douglas. He and his wife were among the first members of the Wyoming Pioneer Association and their descendants are still ranching and serving Wyoming.

Amanda Thomas Moore, wife of Lee Moore, was born in Alabama, November 9, 1862. Her parents both died when she was very little, and she and her three sisters were raised by her mother's parents, C. B. and Elizabeth Todd Grice. C. B. Grice died while the girls were still quite young, and the grandmother took them to Texas in 1872 to live with one of her sons. The trip to Texas was made by wagon, and boat from Selma, Alabama to Mobile, and train from Mobile to New Orleans, ferry across the river, and again the train to McDade. From there they took a wagon, walking a good part of the distance until they reached Salty, Texas. Not much is known of Amanda's life from this point on until her marriage in 1883 and her move to Wyoming.

Her experiences as a young woman on the raw frontier were varied. She gave an account of some of these experiences for the "Douglas Enterprise" issue of June 26, 1936, in which she recounted the stage robbery at Antelope Springs, the Indian scare when her husband was gone and she was alone with five children, some experiences at Ft. Fetterman, etc. While much is written about the men who made the history of the West, not much is written about the women who shared the hardships and made a home. It isn't hard to feel the anguish Amanda must have felt when one little girl was burned to death, another died of diphtheria, and a son was drowned. Of such strength the West was made.

Lee Moore died at the Ogalalla Ranch on February 7, 1928, after having ridden all morning. Amanda died in March 1937, in California where she had been visiting her son, Nealy.

Moore, Leroy, Edna and Helen

Leroy Moore was born at the Ogalalla Ranch on Nov. 23, 1883, the son of Lee and Amanda Thomas Moore. His father was foreman of the ranch at that time. At the time of his birth, Lee Moore and an old family friend, Robert Baker, had gone to Rock River for the winter's supply of groceries and necessities, and had been delayed in returning. On their return, they found Mrs. Moore with the baby, both well and doing fine.<sup>1</sup>

Leroy lived at the Ogalalla Ranch and at Antelope Springs State Station until about 1887-1888. At that time his father, who had been blackballed by the Stockgrowers Association for starting his own cattle herd, had established a ranch on the Belle Fourche known as the O-K, just north of the Converse County line in Campbell County. However, their stay there was very short, as events leading up to the Johnson County War in 1892 forced Lee Moore to go "underground" for several years. He sent his wife and family to Texas as he feared for their lives as well as his own, and he was on the move constantly, making camp by day and moving to another place each night.

It was in Texas that Leroy started his formal education, going to school with his cousins at the Stiles School. That he was a quick and apt student is shown by the fact he won the gold medal for excellence that year, an award his cousin, Lois Stiles, had tried so hard to win. She told me shortly before her death about this and remarked that Leroy was quick to grasp all subjects, but that he also tried very hard and worked diligently to achieve the honor.

Following the Johnson County War, the Moores moved to Newcastle to ranch, but the Stockgrowers Association and Joe LeFors, in particular, made it so rough for Lee Moore there that he was forced to leave, after spending what finances he had to clear his name of rustling. Wes Wiker said, during this time, calves would deliberately be branded with another man's brand in an effort to get rid of the small cattleman. Lee Moore was branding with the Seven Cross at that time and Wikers bought the cattle and brand from Moore, but had to quit using the brand.

So they left Newcastle and Lee Moore then purchased the Royston Ranch on Lightning Creek, close to the mouth of Box Creek in 1899. While they were at Newcastle, Leroy attended school there and one of his classmates was Wesley Wiker. The Wikers moved to Converse County about the same time and ranched where the Justin Werner Ranch is now, close to the old Royston place.

(Wes Wiker said the place they lived on Lightning Creek was known as the "Old Battleground".) During an early round-up, the cook and the nighthawk had a fight there, which must have been quite a fight, even for those days.

The Moores and Wikers remained friends, and when Mrs. Moore moved to town to put her younger children in school, the Wiker children stayed with her to attend school. Leroy never got to finish school but he always carried books in his saddlebags, not only text books but a wide variety of others from law journals to business and fiction. Later in his life it was conceded that he was a very well educated man.

Leroy helped his father ranch and took out a homestead at the mouth of Box Creek. In 1907, he went to South America with Roake Burbank, who had a neighboring ranch on Walker Creek (later known as the Mike Williams Ranch), and with Roake's brother, Henry of Massachusetts. His diary of that trip shows how enthusiastic they were at first about the ranching prospects down there, but as they progressed and saw what ranching was really like, the enthusiasm wore off. Leroy returned to Wyoming in the early fall of 1908, to return to ranching with his father.

While at the ranch, Leroy Moore was a member of the posse which caught up with the Indians during their last raid in the county. They had killed the sheriff from Newcastle, as well as Louie Falkenburg, a resident of this county. The fight which ensued was called the Battle on Lightning Creek.

In January 1909, Leroy Moore married Edna Irvine, the only daughter of William C. Irvine. They lived at his homestead on Box Creek until he bought the ranch from his father about 1910. They then moved to the ranch headquarters at Skeleton Springs where his parents had lived in the old log house Royston had built. Here he and Edna built a modern addition onto the log house, complete with bathroom and electric power, and as at all places where Leroy lived, a telephone line to Douglas was built.

In 1915, Leroy and Eddie (as Edna was always known) bought the Ogalalla Ranch, where Eddie had grown up, from her father and John T. Williams, her father's partner in the ranch. It had always been a lifelong ambition of Leroy's to own that ranch. He told me once that as a very little boy he had stood on the hill between Antelope Creek and Wind River and vowed to himself he would someday own all the country there as far as he could see in every direction, a vow which he made come true.

At the time they moved to the Ogalalla, the Moores had three children, Lee, Jane, and Bill. Bob was born shortly after their move and in 1917 their last child, John, was born at the ranch.

Eddie died in November of 1918, and Leroy was left with five children to raise. That winter he sent them to California where they lived with their grandmother, Amanda Moore, and a lifelong friend of Eddie's, Bonnie Jane Murphy. The children remained there until 1920, during which time Leroy had remarried. He married Helen Slonaker.

Helen and Leroy lived at the Ogalalla, except for a short period when they lived at Tensleep. The children attended school there until it was time for high school, when they moved to the B. J. Erwin place west of town (now the Busch place). In 1927 they purchased the house in Douglas, where they lived until they retired to California; however, Leroy spent most of his time at the ranch. Helen and the children would go out to the ranch weekends and summers to help out.

Times were tough about 1919 on through the great depression years. The May 11, 1921 blizzard killed a great many animals, the Ogalalla losing one herd of 3,000 yearling sheep alone, not to mention other losses. Despite these losses and the tough times which followed, Leroy Moore, with the help of his devoted wife, Helen, and lots of hard work, started enlarging his holdings and adding to his deeded lands. In those tough times, people were moving out and ready to sell their homesteads; and Leroy Moore bought all he could of this offered land, doubling, tripling and even more the original acreage of the Ogalalla. This was not accomplished without a great deal of sacrifice on the part of himself and his family.

Leroy and Helen had five sons, Tye, Frank, Eddie, Dick, and Tom. This made a family of ten children to educate and provide for, during those years of depression, but they hung on and raised all ten children to adulthood.

In 1946, the old Royston Ranch was up for sale, as well as the former Burbank Ranch. The Moores decided to buy these ranches back into the family, and Leroy's son, Lee took them over, and owned and operated them.

(Wes Wiker told me the old Burbank Ranch in the early days had been a post for the Hudson Bay Co. Later on Bill Henry owned it and he sold it to the Burbank Brothers about 1900. Burbanks sold it to DeForest Richards and Leroy Moore; when Richards left about 1909, he sold his share to Leroy and Wes Wiker; and when Leroy Moore bought the Ogalalla, it was sold to John T. Williams, with Wiker taking shares in the Ogalalla.)

About 1950 the famous Buzzard Ranch on the Sweetwater was for sale and the Moores purchased it, almost doubling their land holdings in the state.

In 1949 Helen and Leroy lost one son, Frank, who was killed in an automobile accident. Dick was killed the same way in 1960.

With the sons taking over active management of the various ranches, Leroy and Helen retired to California in the 50s, although he kept active supervision over the various places for the remainder of his life. He was always available for advice and suggestions and always interested in his family's activities, there to give a hand, if needed.

Helen died in August, 1961. Leroy died in California in March 1963. Their son, Tom, was killed in 1965. Jane died in 1969, John in 1976, and Lee in 1984. The remaining four children are still actively engaged in the ranching business in Wyoming, or have children carrying on the tradition on the ranches Leroy built up during his lifetime, including John's children.

Leroy Moore was active in many organizations during his lifetime. He served as one of the first Committeemen for the AAA (the predecessor to the present ASCS), was an early director of the Wyoming Production Credit Association, was on the Converse County Hospital Board, took active interest in the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association, the Wyoming Wool Growers Association, was a director of the Wyoming Wool Cooperative Association, and many other jobs which benefitted his state and community. He was always ready to lend a hand to those who needed help. He provided a home for many of the old cowboys and ranch hands who had worked for the Moores in the past, and saw that when their time came, they had a proper burial.

Leroy Moore always liked to travel, but only did so when he had somewhere to go connected with business. One time when he went to Boston, he decided to get off the train at the town in Massachusetts he knew Roake Burbank had come from, hoping to find out something about his old friend, whom he hadn't heard from since he left him in South America in 1908. He found the name in the directory, called, and they spent several days talking about the past. Roake was interested in knowing about all the old-timers of his days in Wyoming. Roake died in 1961.

While Leroy Moore's father was truly a pioneer of Wyoming, he himself was a driving force in the state's history, and will be remembered for years for his contributions.

Robert Baker, I've been told, was a former Texas Ranger, who had been a close friend of Amanda's grandparents, who had raised her. He was devoted to Amanda and lived with the Moores in Wyoming until his death in the early 1900's. He is buried in the Douglas Cemetery next to the George W. Pike grave. (He was a very old man with a long white beard, but he almost lost his life when he tried to save the first Frank Moore from drowning in the lake at the Skeleton Springs Ranch. Frank, Ed Wright (the nephew of Mrs. Turner who ran the Valley House), and George Reid had gone swimming in the lake and were using logs as rafts. A log from the raft tilted up and hit Frank and knocked him out. No one was able to rescue him. Billy Marchand showed up, took Mrs. Moore's pet horse, Buck, hitched him to a hayrake, and by dragging it through the lake found the body.)

(Lee Moore had bought the lots at the cemetery when Pike died. Another old time cowboy who had come up the trail from Texas is also buried there — C. C. Beard, known as "Panther". Panther had spent his last years at the Ogalalla Ranch where he worked as a cowboy in the early days.)

Moore, Omer "Stub" and Zadah

Omer Edward Moore and wife, Zadah Alice Omen Moore, of Argos, Indiana came to their homestead three miles southeast of Lost Springs, Wyoming in 1910. Omer, known to everyone as "Stub", farmed his land, raised some cattle and worked for area ranchers and also as a butcher in the meat market at Lost Springs; and at one time the Moores ran a restaurant in the Freeland building at Lost Springs.

In the early 1920's they rented out their land and moved to California for a number of years to be close to Stub's sisters and where he worked as a carpenter and Zadah in a factory.

Returning to Wyoming in the spring of 1928, Stub and Zadah again made their home on the homestead and later purchased land from neighboring homesteaders to add to their holdings where they again farmed and raised cattle. Stub purchased one of the first combines in the area and did custom combining for neighbors.

In 1950 they sold their land to Mr. Goerts of the Wheatland, Wyoming area and Mr. Otto Bible and retired to a home in Douglas where they enjoyed their remaining years. Stub died in 1958 and Zadah in 1961 and are buried at Douglas. They had no known relatives.

Moran, James and Beatrice Family

Orin Junction was the birthplace of James Moran in October 1891, the youngest of three children born to Addie and James Moran, Sr. He lived at Orin until he was 14 at which time his parents bought the ranch headquarters on Horseshoe Creek from John Moran. James married Beatrice McCrillis, a Douglas girl, in November of 1914. The following spring in May, James Sr. died leaving the young couple the entire responsibility of the ranch.

Beatrice was born in Cheyenne in October 1893, the fourth child of Dr. and Emma McCrillis. Beatrice attended her entire schooling in Douglas. She was barely 21 when she moved to participate in a completely different lifestyle on the ranch on Horseshoe Creek, nine miles out of Glendo. She left the comforts of indoor plumbing, central coal fired furnace, and friends galore for the isolation of a cold winter in a salt-box style house with no basement and only wood stoves and a small house at the end of a path. Groceries were no longer just a block away.

Their first child, Margaret, was born three years after Bea came to the ranch. It was nearly five more years before the second daughter, Mildred, joined the family. Doris was born nearly four years later and then Barbara a year and a half after Doris. Beatrice boarded a school teacher in early years as she welcomed the female companionship for herself and for the adult help in getting Margaret the two and a half miles to school by horseback.

During the depression, Jim helped out with family expense by inspecting for the Regional Agricultural Credit Corp. Later, he was an inspector for the Production Credit Assn. Jim organized the Platte County Stockgrowers Assn. of which he was the first president.

Finally electricity was installed in the form of a 32 Volt Jacobs Wind Electric plant in 1938 so ranch life became easier with lights and a water pressure system. Their move to Glendo in 1959 into a new home was probably the highlight of her life.

Beatrice has been president of the Glendo Benefit Club, the first president of the Platte County Cow-Belles.

Bea died August 23, 1983.

Morgan, John and Mary

John Morgan was born in Swansea, Wales in England in 1864. His parents came to the United States settling first in Illinois where the men worked in the coal mines in the area.

John married Mary Samuel on July 30, 1890 in St. Clair, Illinois. A son, David S., was born to the couple in Troy, Illinois on April 27, 1892.

The family moved to Lafayette, Colorado to find work in the mines there. A daughter, Mayme (Born August 1, 1894) and a son, Elmer (born August 5, 1898) were born at Lafayette.

The mines in Glenrock, Wyoming beckoned John and his family to Wyoming around 1900.

The remainder of John and Mary's children were born in Glenrock. They were: Thomas J. (born October 26, 1902), Dorothy E. (born August 19, 1905), Ruth (born October 27, 1908) and Milton J. (born December 19, 1911).

After working in the mines for a while John went into the saloon business with Jasper Sumner as a partner.

John died on January 5, 1912 and Mary on March 9, 1942 in Glenrock.

Clint Morrison 1883

Morrison, Amos and Amanda

Amos C. "Clint" Morrison, Clint as he was known to his friends, came from Virginia. After completing his schooling, he pursued a farming profession; in 1886 he went to Iowa where he established a residence. It was here that he became acquainted with John Newell and his brother William, whom Clint was to later be neighbors of in Wyoming.

Becoming ill, the doctor told Clint to seek a higher and dryer climate in which to live. Knowing the Newells, he followed them to Wyoming where they had homesteaded in the Laramie Peak area.

Before taking up a homestead on lands now owned by Charles Pexton, which is now called the "Morrison Valley" or "Platte Valley Park", Clint worked on the "Two Bar" and Sam Moore ranches.

It was here he built a two room log house. He was known to all who knew him as an excellent cook, making mouth watering biscuits.

Shortly after Clint had settled down on his new property, he met his future wife, Amanda Warner. Amanda had come west to visit the Newells with her mother, Mrs. Melvin Warner, and son, Emmett. Amanda, having her teaching certificate, was offered and accepted a teaching position, teaching the Newell children.

They were married February 10, 1891. A following narrative, from Hattie Newell's diary, is given of their marriage; "The wedding was to be at Frank Newell's big house at Springhill with William W. Newell as Justice of the Peace, officiating at the ceremony. As it was winter-time and the snow was very deep, a bobsled, belonging to Harrison Newell, was used to bring as many guests to the wedding as possible. After the arrival at the bridal scene at Springhill, the daughters of John Newell, Lizzie, Caddie and Hattie, the oldest eleven years old, were told to sit down, but they sneaked in to look at the bride. They were awed at the beauty, black hair and black eyes. Her bridal gown was a long cream cashmere.

"Frank Newell's wife, Eliza, escorted Amanda to the big bay window where Clint and Amanda were married.

"Taking the John Newell family home after the wedding, the bobsled hit a rock and overturned, breaking a single tree. The family had to walk the rest of the way home. Young Caddie kept worrying all the way home about Amanda not having a place to sleep because Clint only had one bed. She knew that Amanda wouldn't go hungry, however, as Clint made the best biscuits in the country."

The newlyweds lived on the ranch in the mountains until 1898 when they moved to Mitchell, Nebraska to a farm under the Farmers Canal.

They had five children; Melvie, wife of Robert Fuller, Dessie, wife of Frank Allison, Clinton, Ralph and Mildred.

Morsch, William and Esther Family

LaSalle County, Illinois was the birthplace of William J. "Billie" Morsch. He was born on December 16, 1863, a member of a family of four boys and two girls. He received his common school education in Illinois.

Esther Beitel and William were married in Dekalb County, Illinois in 1886. To this union, three children were born: a son, Jesse, and two daughters.

In 1892 he migrated to Wyoming with his family where he was engaged in the sheep business until 1894, at which time he sold his holdings to the Keeline outfit. He moved to Montana in 1897, and once again went into the sheep business.

In 1909 the family returned to Douglas, Wyoming. From 1909 until 1929, William Morsch was in the automobile business. In 1910 his son, Jesse, entered the business with his father and together they operated the firm under the name of W. J. Morsch and Son. Morsch had the Buick dealership which he sold in 1930 to Nolan Chevrolet of Casper, Wyoming.

Sometime after disposing of his automobile business, Billie and his son developed the Morsch Coal Mine located some 60 miles north of Douglas.

He was president of an organization called the "Good Roads Committee" from 1911 to 1913 and was instrumental in improving the quality of the roads within the county. He also served as County Commissioner for four years.

William Morsch died in 1936 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Morton, Alexander and Jennie

Alexander "Dad" Morton was born on June 5, 1858 in Jamestown, New York, the son of John Morton, who was born in Scotland.

Dad Morton married Jennie Brandon in Cheyenne on August 4, 1886.

Their children were: Pearl (Bennedict), Claud (b. August 3, 1890 - d. December 29, 1924), Ethel (b. September 3, 1894 - d. June 24, 1940), Myrtle, Howard, Ruth (b. November 1898) and Bill (b. August 3, 1901).

Dad moved his family, with the exception of Pearl, to Converse County in 1909 from LaPorte, Colorado. He homesteaded on a piece of land located one mile south of the confluence of West Fork LaBonte and LaBonte Creeks.

He earned a living for his family during the time they lived on LaBonte by driving a string team freighting supplies to the Pathfinder Dam during its construction and leasing the Scott Hamilton place on Upper LaBonte Creek for five years.

Alexander died on March 25, 1933.

Claud married Beulah Braae, daughter of Andrew and Hattie Braae. Their children were: Claud, Huston, Stanley and Winnifred. They lived for a time on the north side of LaBonte Creek across from where the Lloyd Nunn ranch is in 1985.

Claud died from injuries incurred in a horse and buggy accident after which Beulah moved her family to Rutherford Creek to be nearer her mother. She homesteaded there and later married a man by the name of Bricker. Later, when her mother moved to Sandpoint, Idaho, she also moved with her family there.

Ethel married Ray Cooper, the son of Lyman and Jennie Cooper in December 1912. They became the parents of one son, LeRoy.

Myrtle moved to the edge of the Laramie Plains after her marriage to Henry Mathison.

Ruth married Joe Whalen and moved to Colorado. After his death she married John Gunning and lives today in Fort Collins.

Bill married Mary Patricia Kenyon, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Kenyon, in 1934. Their children are:

Bill Morton 1929

Patricia (Berdahl), Katherine (Robinson), Robert and Virginia "Ginger" (McGuire).

Bill operated a sawmill for many years in the Esterbrook area and lived in a house located in Mill Creek Canyon near Elk Mountain. In 1948 he purchased the Willis Spracklen ranch on North Horseshoe Creek. Selling it in 1952 to Fred Dilts, he bought "Ben's Tavern" in Glendo. He and Mary "Bunte" operated the tavern and the hotel next to the tavern until Bill's retirement in 1971.

Bunte died in 1972; Bill on November 13, 1984.

Morton, John and Sarah Family

John Morton, Sr. was born in Germany on September 3, 1862, and came to the United States when he was three years of age. He lived at Hinckley, Illinois and in Missouri as a youth. When he was quite young he ran off and joined the U.S. Army at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. Later he went to Cripple Creek, Colorado to get work in the mines. He had not eaten for three days and asked for a job but was told that he had to belong to a union. He did not have any money to pay the three dollar union fee but told them he would give them the first three dollars he earned. They told him no money, no union card, so he left.

He came to Wyoming in 1881 and to Converse County in 1891 with a band of sheep. At that time the land was open range and there were few fences. As other settlers came in, more and more land was fenced and Mr. Morton began buying land.

In the early 1900s Mr. Morton bought what is now known as the Morton Home Ranch from John T. Williams and associates. The Mortons acquired the Boot Ranch on LaPrele Creek and land on Sand Creek, east of Douglas, in 1912 after the disastrous blizzard of that year had disseminated the flocks of sheep owned by the owners of the land.

John had two policies which have been handed down to the present management of Mortons Inc., "take care of the sheep and they will take care of you," and "when you sell anything, get what it is worth, but don't be greedy."

John was married to the former Sarah McDermott, the daughter of Peter and Bridget McDermott, on February 7, 1894. Sarah was born on August 11, 1874 at Willsville, New York and came to Wyoming when she was 14 years of age. The family arrived at the Horseshoe Stage Station near Glendo, Wyoming in 1888.

Sarah Morton

John and Sarah became the parents of five children: John R. "Jack" (b. October 14, 1895 - d. November 29, 1978), William (b. November 2, 1897 - d. November 21, 1918), Margaret I. (b. December 31, 1899 - d. November 18, 1918), Edward J. (b. March 3, 1903 - d. January 3, 1937), and James (b. November 27, 1908 - d. October 18, 1964).

John Sr. died on May 13, 1916.

Upon her husband's death Sarah and her son, Jack, took over the management of the Morton Estate. They continued operations along the lines established by John Morton, buying range lands when they were for sale and increasing their livestock herds. One of the biggest acquisition of lands was the Fiddleback Ranch on Cheyenne River in 1944.

Jack Morton

Mrs. Morton, or "Granny" as she was affectionately known, died on December 22, 1952.

Jack attended schools in Concord, New Hampshire and Fort Collins, Colorado. He became active in the management of his parents' properties upon the death of his father and continued in that capacity until his death. Jack recalled the severe winter of 1919 when Mortons entered the winter with 2,800 Hereford cattle and 27,000 sheep. When spring arrived their loss amounted to 5,700 sheep and 800 cattle.

Jack was an enthusiastic golfer and trapshooter. He was especially proud of his Wyoming State Trapshoot championships. He was responsible for the establishment of the "Morton Foundation" which made it possible for more than 20 local high school students to further their education in college. He helped with funds to build the tennis courts in Washington Park and the second nine holes of the Converse County-Douglas Golf Course. He had an expression which seemed to solve many problems, "The hell with it."

James "Jim" married Edith Clayton, the daughter of Ernest and Mayme Clayton, in 1934. Two sons, James Jr. and John Edward, and two daughters, Margaret and Sarah, were born to them. Jim was an enthusiastic pilot and was involved with the operation of the Morton ranch for a period of time until his retirement when he moved to Dubois, Wyoming.

Nachtman, Harvey and Goldie

Harvey J. Nachtman was born at Chelsea, Nebraska, the son of Joseph J. and Olive (Hunt) Nachtman. Goldie A. Nachtman was born at Wakefield, Nebraska, the daughter of Claus I. and Carrie (Miner) Blake. Harvey Nachtman and Goldie Blake were married at Emmett, Nebraska October 28, 1918.

Harvey spent four months in the army during World War I. He spent his army time at Camp Funston, Kansas and received a medical discharge. We had planned to be married in the fall. In the summer of 1918, he and my brother, Lee Blake, decided to take a trip to Wyoming as it was too rainy to make hay. They came to Wyoming as some of Harvey's friends from Chambers, Nebraska were here. They were Clare and Jim Grimes and Ray and Charlie Dailey. When they arrived in Douglas, they were met by Charlie Dailey, who was settling homesteaders. He took them to the Cheyenne River and showed them three homestead relinquishments that were for sale. Since Harvey had sold most of his livestock before going to the army he decided he might just as well try it in Wyoming as any place, so they bought the two homestead relinquishments. On returning to Nebraska he sent his brother Fred out to buy the third one. This was the start of the home ranch, where our son, Lawrence lives.

Fred stayed just long enough to prove up on his homestead and sold it to us. Lee stayed and eventually married Rose Rothleutner. They stayed in Wyoming until 1934 when it turned dry, then shipped their cattle to Nebraska and sold their homestead to us.

We shipped our cattle, a team of horses and two saddle horses (we had 31 head of cows) and arrived in Douglas April 1, 1919. Harvey, Lee and Fred had spent the winter at the homestead, cutting posts and logs for the house we built. I spent the winter at home in Nebraska and in Wakefield, Nebraska taking care of my oldest sister, who was sick with cancer.

When I came to Wyoming, we lived in the school house at the Walter Dull place, and Lee and Fred had a tent that summer. They were building the house and fencing the land. I cooked for them and took dinner to them on horseback and spent the afternoons helping where I could.

We moved onto our homestead that fall. We had built a three room log house with a dirt roof. We spent many happy years in the log house. I loved it. We had lots of neighbors, as there was someone on nearly every section. We had real good times, mostly of our own making.

There was lots of open range and range cattle. In the hot summer days, the Longhorns would come from the Cow Buttes to the Cheyenne River for water, stay at the river until around four o'clock and return to the hills. They trailed close by the house. At first I was afraid of them, but soon learned they were not interested in me.

That first winter, Lee worked for the Fiddleback Ranch and hauled cake from the ranch to the sheep camp with horses.

I well remember my first Thanksgiving in Wyoming. Lee and Harvey were out riding someplace. I prepared a Thanksgiving dinner and waited until 3 p.m. When they came home, they said they had stopped at a sheep wagon down on the river, the herder had asked them to eat with him and they did. There wasn't much thanksgiving in me that day.

I think Victor was the first baby of the homesteaders in our neighborhood. All the ranchers ran cattle on the open range. Lots of riders stopped to get warm and something to eat. They all enjoyed Vic and played with him.

Roundups were in the fall at shipping time and in the spring at branding time. The ranchers camped on the river and worked their cattle. The men loved to watch them. The second year we were in Wyoming they rounded up the Longhorns and shipped them out.

The Fiddleback Ranch was a big help to the people as they had a telephone line to Douglas we could use in case of need.

We missed not getting our mail. Everyone who went to town, brought mail and groceries for others. We tried to establish a post office. In 1920 the government told us if we could carry the mail six months free, they would take it over. Harvey and Bert Good carried the mail the first three months. Harvey furnished the team and buggy and Bert drove it. Then all the people donated, and Bill Tramer carried the mail until the government took it over. Here are the names of the people and what they gave: Perry Welch - $7.50; Wm. Corbett - $7.50; L. K. Hough - $3.75; Jack Keller - $3.75; Emma Moody - $3.75; George Frey - $3.75; Perry Burden - $3.75; Lewis Arnold - $3.75; J. E. Grimes - $3.75; R. M. Ownes - $3.75; W. O. Scott - $3.75; Lucille Young - $7.50; F. S. Dull - $3.75; E. K. Haas - $3.75; Oscar Dorothy - $3.75. Paid to order Wm. Tramer. Secretary, Rose Rothleutner; Treasurer, J. A. Rothleutner; Chairman, Fred J. Nachtman.

Walter Dull was the first Postmaster and the post office was in their house. The post office was named for them, "Dull Center." The Dulls later moved to town and the post office was moved to Lee Blake's place and Rose Black was Postmaster. The Blakes sold out in 1934; the post office was moved to our ranch, and I became Postmaster until 1952 when we moved to Douglas. The post office was discontinued in 1953 and a circle route to Bill was established. I enjoyed running the post office as I saw some of our neighbors and friends twice a week.

We were very lucky for school as Dulls had children in school and so did Goods. We lived halfway between and they built a school house halfway between. That put it about a quarter mile from our home. This school was later named the Bethany School.

Nineteen-thirty-four was a very dry year and by shipping time we couldn't sell cattle. We couldn't even give them away. The government bought what could walk to town and the others were shot. They shot around 50 or 60 head of ours. The calves that were fairly fat were given to the welfare people from Douglas. Most of the people shipped their cattle out. We decided to try to keep what we had left at home. We bought what feed we could get and burned the thorns off cactus and fed them. It was a real big job but we got by very well.

In 1939 and 1940 we built a new three bedroom house. As is the way in most families, when we were able to build the new house, the kids were leaving to make homes for themselves. Victor had joined the army where he spent five years, and Alice was working at the courthouse in Douglas. That doesn't mean the new house didn't come in handy. Vic was sent overseas with the Army of Occupation in Japan. Mary and her two boys came home to live with us. Logan, Alice's husband, was sent to the east coast and ready to go overseas. Alice and her two babies came home too. They stayed with us until the boys came home from the army and the war was over.

I have always loved the ranch and enjoyed my life there. I still love to go out and spend time there. In a way, it will always be home to me, for the best part of my life was spent there.

Harvey was active in the Soil Conservation Service, Cheyenne River Compact, and Polled Hereford Association. Harvey died December 12, 1957.

Our children are: Victor J. (b. July 27, 1919, m. Mary Pellatz, d. May 26, 1974); their children are Russell, Jack, Jerry and Lona. Victor and his son, Jack, died in a tragic airplane crash on May 26, 1974. The crash occurred while they were hunting coyotes.

Alice M. (b. May 10, 1921 m. Logan Bush); their children are Barbara and Theodore "Ted."

Lawrence L. (b. December 20, 1925, m. Sara M. Fackler); their children are Patricia, Linda, Susan and James.

Nauman, Ernest and Julia Family

Frank Ernest Nauman was born in Marshalltown, Iowa on December 12, 1872. His family moved to Frankfort, Kansas where Ernest grew to early manhood. He was married to Julia Belle Johnson, daughter of Peter Edward Johnson, on January 7, 1897. Julia was born on July 2, 1876.

A daughter, Ruth, (b. May 20, 1898) and a son, Vernon, (b. June 4, 1900) were born in Kansas to the Naumans.

Ernest and his family moved to LaSalle, Illinois where he found employment with the Mathiessen and Hegeler Zinc Company.

Laurence was born in Illinois on June 8, 1905.

Pages in Ernest's old account book of that time list daily expenses, e.g. rent at $7; Christmas shopping, $2.08; Ruth, a dress, $1.80; Ernest, gloves, $.10, etc. Total cash receipts for the year 1906, $701.48, not a magnificent sum for a family of five, you will agree.

So the family returned to farming, living on rented land near Frankfort, Kansas, for a few years.

In the meantime, Peter Edward Johnson, father of Julia Nauman, in business in LaSalle, Illinois, during the early 1900s as Land and Immigration Agent, had migrated to Wyoming with his wife and had settled on a homestead acreage about six miles south of Douglas. He wrote to the Ernest Nauman family urging them to take advantage of the opportunity to become owners of good dry-farm land. Peter already had his patent on 160 acres and a comfortable (for that time) homestead house to live in. He and his wife (step-mother to Julia) would share their home with the new family until they could build.

The invitation was accepted and, in the spring of 1915, the Ernest Nauman family (now including son, Alvin, born on June 10, 1911, while they were living in Kansas) made the move from Frankfort. They homesteaded on land next to the Johnson homestead.

Ernest was a well driller and soon was engaged in water-well drilling, perhaps the only well driller in the area in those days. His old account book has pages listing costs and charges made: top 100 feet of drilling at 75¢ per foot, deeper footage at $1.00 per foot and drilling through rock at $2.50 per foot. Sometimes no water was found at any depth, and for a dry hole the charge was only half price, although costs to the driller were no less for a dry hole. The account book lists many, many wells drilled for neighbors nearby and throughout the county, through years 1916-1940.

Income listed in Ernest's ledger in 1916 in addition to that from farming and from the well-drilling were checks received for work on the deep cut the Burlington Railroad was making for the course of their track at the point where it was crossing Nauman/Johnson homestead land. Checks listed monthly for Vernon, 16 years old, varied in amount month by month; May $38.90, June $32.90, September $42.20, November $59.50 and December $23.62. These became part of family finances; they were reflected on the tithing account page. Thus on the September date for check $42.20 there was an entry, of the same date, on the tithing page for $4.22. Lesser amounts from sales were also carefully entered, two pounds of butter for 80¢ produced an eight cent tithing entry.

During the year 1924, total income from drilling of water wells amounted to $544.60. In that area water was not the only product flowing from those wells. In many of them gas was present. I really didn't like the taste of their water at the Nauman home because of the gas, but they were used to it and didn't mind. At one of the farms there was so much gas that it was being piped into the house for fuel.

Most memorable was the happening at a later date, 1932, on the Trethewey place (the original T. D. Williams homestead). In April, Ernest was drilling for water, down 183 feet by April 9; slow progress all the next week; on April 15 "220 feet today, looks like water sand," the old journal reported. Time out for crop work, then slow progress on well and "much more gas" until it "blowed the hole clean of water and mud, went over the top of the derrick," on April 23! Time out for rain and snow, then on April 25 "back to work on well." Water came with gas until it pretty well drowned out the gas. At this point the well casing was put in. More bad weather. Then on April 29, more drilling, total depth at 278 feet, and the pump was finally put in; "finished about 4:15." Within a half hour, gas was pushing out from under and around the pump. At nine o'clock that night it caught fire, possibly from lamps in the house or from a cigarette. The house and most of the furniture burned. The well rig was badly damaged, ropes and belts burned, and there was other damage. Dad suffered broken ribs in his attempt to save the machine. Next day, people, "must have been 1000," came to see the "gas well" burning. Again the next day "the same thing," and on May 3 "fire still going," and ribs hurt pretty bad." No journal entry tells of the outcome and I don't remember now who or what extinguished the blaze; and ribs mended slowly.

Later, the well drill was rebuilt and continued in use through 1940.

In 1924 when we first came to Wyoming there was a test well being made on the Edmond Leet place, and people had high hopes, but the effort was given up. In later years, occasionally an oil company would lease lands for drilling for oil. Some reported showings of oil, but none has thus far been developed.

Ernest was also a clock man. Most any old clock, in his hands, might again become a reliable timepiece, even though it had been picked up from the scrap heap of a place where he might be drilling. One such clock hung in my rural school room at a later time, and it faithfully bonged the hours and half hours for us at home for many years after those school days ended.

Ruth had been working in a missionary home in Kansas City where she had met Joe Ridenour and they had returned to Douglas to be married in January 1917. Joe was a skilled lather and plasterer and his services were employed by one and another of the families pioneering in the Irvine community in those early years.

For a time during the 1930s the Ridenour family made their home in Granddad Johnson's house. In later years their home was in Denver, Colorado.

Mable Wigent, 19 years of age, had a term of college at Butler University in Indianapolis, also a summer term at Winona Lake extension from Indiana University. She also had teaching experience at a rural school near their hometown, Columbia City, during the previous year. I, Mary Wigent, had completed one year in rural school education at Manchester College, North Manchester, Indiana, but there seemed to be no opening for a 17-year-old, inexperienced candidate for rural school teacher in that area. Learning of teaching vacancies in Converse County, Wyoming, we applied to Supt. R. L. Markley of School District 17 for a job. He answered, "Come on out. There are vacancies. We can place you."

So it happened that early on Friday morning, August 15, 1924, we set out in Mable's new Model T touring car on a journey to far away Wyoming. A journey unprecedented at that time and utterly foreign to our limited experience. We had driven to nearby towns, lake resorts and the like but never more than 20 miles or so from home. To this day, we wonder how our parents permitted the undertaking.

We girls drove westward from our hometown, along the old Lincoln Highway across northern Indiana. Skirting the south part of Chicago, we drove on across Illinois, as far as the Mississippi River, 300 miles, that first day. We stayed that night at a YWCA, for in those days there were no convenient motels.

On August 19, just five days from leaving home, we were faced with the reality of a new life in the west. It was hot that day, 100° in the shade. We were surely disappointed, for I think we had pictured the land more as it actually is in the Esterbrook area. We would gladly have turned around and gone back home but there wasn't any money for such a course. So it was, "on with the new undertaking!"

We contacted Supt. Markley and received our assignments, I to the Irvine School about six miles south of Douglas and Mable to the Leet School a few miles farther along County Road 1, on toward Orin. In those days it was the main highway.

A few days before the first day of school, we had gone out from our temporary White House Hotel room in Douglas to our schools to make them ready for opening day. As we worked, a topless Model T roadster, driven by Vernon Nauman, chugged into the school yard bringing Mrs. Nauman with an invitation to have fried chicken supper at the Nauman home that evening. (Mrs. Nauman was renowned for her cooking ability.)

Another invitation that first day enabled us to live in the then unoccupied house that had been Peter Johnson's homestead house. We then lived in an unused shack at the railroad section house, home of the Leo Eddy family. Mr. Eddy was section foreman for track maintenance. The section house was about half-way between our schools. We would each walk the railroad right-of-way to and from school, sometimes catching a ride on the section crew's hand car, if it was going our way. Wyoming winters then, as now, can be very cold with temperatures falling far below zero, especially early in the day. On one of the coldest days that year, Mable froze the calves of her legs as she walked to school along the railroad track. The era of slacks for girls had not yet arrived and she was not dressed for protection from that sub-zero weather.

My school had six students, one each in third, seventh and eighth grades and three in the fourth grade. There were three children from the Roy Dorothy family, two from the Brock family and Alvin Nauman was my eighth grader.

There were more students at the Leet School; included were the children of the George Durans, Leo Eddys, Edmond Leets and Stocks, also Harold Schellinger and Wendell Clay, but Irvine School was the larger building. It became the center for community activities for the whole area. A Sunday school was organized early in the fall, meeting on Sunday afternoons. Mable was elected as Sunday School superintendent and I as teacher.

Other community gatherings were known as Literary Society which also met in the school or even in the section house. Individuals or groups of varying numbers and ages entertained with readings, songs, plays or musical numbers. I was elected president of the Literary.

Sometimes there were visits in various homes of the community. One well remembered visit was at the home of Frank and Violet Stewart. To get there you had to cross the river, the North Platte. When the river was low you could splash across on horseback, but our crossing was by ferry. Attached to a pulley which ran on a cable across the river, the ferry was powered by river current plus muscle power of persons being ferried.

Most frequent were our visits in the Nauman home, for we depended upon them for supplies such as milk, butter and eggs. In addition, Mrs. Nauman was very generous with delicious contributions such as fresh baked bread. I remember evenings when we first listened to the radio over a homemade instrument which Vernon had put together. We had to take turns listening as the ear-phones were passed from one to another.

For me, a special privilege was playing hymns on the reed organ. Made in Ottawa, Illinois, it had been with the family since their residence in LaSalle, and in those days occupied a place of honor in their living room. Incidentally, years later, after many vicissitudes and much needed repairs made by Vernon Nauman in the early 1970s, the organ, now restored to its original beauty, stands in our living room.

Through many varied school, community and family activities, boy and girl friendships developed, one of which culminated into a wedding at the Nauman home on April 5, 1925, when Mable Wigent became the bride of Laurence Nauman, shortly before the end of the school term. Peter Johnson's house became their honeymoon cottage. In the spring of the following year, 1926, they made arrangements to buy the Thurmond Day place about seven or eight miles south of Douglas, and they entered enthusiastically into the business of dry farming.

With expanded acreage, Laurence invested in a combine for harvesting and our brother, Ralph Wigent, came from Indiana to work with Laurence, a two-man crew replacing the neighborhood teams for the harvesting. They even did a lot of custom harvesting for other farmers.

Unusual incidents sometimes added excitement to the rather ordinary farm days, like the story Mable tells of the ram and the gun. Laurence was away; there was an altercation with a big buck sheep. He belonged to one of the neighbors but he ran around to suit himself this morning and had chosen to ramble in their yard where the children were at play. Irritated by their attempts to share with him, the ram took after them and the children ran for the house, slamming the door in his face. The angry buck used his head as a battering ram and continued his assault on the door in spite of Mable's attempts to discourage him by aiming flat irons at him. Fearing for the safety of the children, Mable resorted to extreme measures. She recalled that people sometimes persuaded unruly cattle to leave an unauthorized area by a shot aimed at their hind parts. What she didn't know was that this was done with a light load in a shot gun. She just grabbed Laurence's gun, which happened to be a 30-06 and let the old battering buck have it in his hind quarters. To her horror, instead of running, he just crumpled up and layed there. How she dreaded reporting the episode to the ram's owner, Mr. Wade Fowler! But the very next time she met Mr. Fowler, he came right up to shake hands, saying, "Mrs. Nauman, I want to congratulate you on the courageous job you did! That old buck should have been taken care of long ago."

There were good times, during those early years, with abundant crops, but they didn't last. There came times when hail struck just a few days before the grain was ready for the combine. In the year 1933, crops were even more wonderful; wheat was nearly ready for harvest; and Laurence was cultivating his 100-acre bean field. A terrible hail storm came up so fast he was caught there and was fiercely beaten by the hail. The only beans left of a crop so beautiful a few minutes earlier were a few beans under the tractor.

That year Mable was raising several hundred young chickens. They were housed in a building several hundred feet from the house. The storm brought a raging stream of water down through the yard. With no one at hand to help, she waded through the nearly waist-deep torrent to get to the chicken house and try to protect the chickens; a terrifying experience!

There followed a year of drought and grasshoppers. They decided to try an alternate course, a move to Indiana where they would find employment in an overall factory. With a few belongings packed in a four-wheel trailer, the family, Laurence, Mable, six year old son, Lornie, and two year old daughter, Helen, made the trip to Indiana. But plans did not work out and in less than two months they were back in their little dry-farm home.

Two cows and several dozen hens had been left with Mother and Dad Nauman. These were reclaimed and became a source for butter and egg money to exchange for groceries. After many, many hardships, Laurence secured work as a government trapper and Mable was hired to teach in a WPA kindergarten. Gradually they got on their feet again. In 1936 or 1937 they bought their home in south Douglas at the point where Fourth and Fifth Streets meet.

An opportunity came for Mable to teach the Dickau School and the family could live near Laurence's trapping area. Their home away from home for six years was the small teacherage with its limited accommodations. The washing for the family of four persons was done on an old washboard; the water was heated in the old boiler on top of their oil stove. One day they suffered a near tragedy when the stove blew up and started a fire. Men from the pumping station across the road helped put out the blaze before there was much damage. But, oh! the mess to clean up. Nevertheless, school kept on without even an hour's lost time.

The next four years Laurence continued trapping and they lived at Bill where Mable taught the four lower grades of the two-teacher school. That fourth year I was teaching the upper grades, six students in seventh and eighth grades and six students in a high school class.

The next year, the family moved back to town where son, Laurence, Jr., and daughter, Helen, could attend the Douglas High School. Mable became first grade teacher at North Grade School and Laurence began a very successful gunsmith business. He became a very well-known maker of fine guns and precision loaded ammunition, and his guns were cherished by proud owners in almost every state in the union. Laurence died on May 19, 1970.

At the end of that 1924-25 school term, I returned to Indiana but not before the older Nauman brother, Vernon, had expressed a desire for a continuing friendship. During that summer of 1925, his faithful old Model T roadster carried him back to Columbia City, Indiana, and he took employment as an electrician's helper at General Electric Company in Ft. Wayne about 20 miles east from our home.

No longer inexperienced and all of 18 years old, I was hired to teach at a nearby rural school. To make a long story short, let's just say that the anticipated friendship did continue, and Vernon and I were married on January 17, 1926. I finished the school year and then we moved to an apartment in Ft. Wayne as Vernon continued employment there.

On December 12 of that year, David was born and I assumed we would continue to make our home in Ft. Wayne where Vernon was already advancing from electrician's helper to a higher bracket. Not so! When summer came, it was Vernon's plan to return to Wyoming.

Vernon's first regular employment in Douglas was as night attendant at the LeBar Motor Company, the Ford garage. After a short period of renting, we bought the little house at 431 South Fourth Street. It had no indoor plumbing; washing was done with no more than a stomp-er and a washboard and tub to serve as laundry tools.

On February 2, 1929, Carolyn was born and still later, on September 10, 1931, Miriam was born.

Julia died on July 21, 1943, Ernest on June 7, 1951.

In the spring of 1938, there came a request for me, a parttime teacher, to complete the last two months of a rural school teacher's term; and there followed a whole new program of work and study. Little did I anticipate continuing college work including a BA degree and beyond and a total of 36 rewarding years as a teacher, but it happened. And in the spring of 1943, Vernon changed from night garage attendant to working at the oil pipeline pumping station near Walker Creek. There followed a period of employment as an electrician, then to self-employment as Nauman's Electric and for many years his quality work was much in demand. In 1939 we had moved from 431 South Fourth Street to 629 South Sixth Street and there followed many years of improving house and grounds largely by ourselves. Vernon died on November 30, 1979.

Earlier, I mentioned that Alvin Nauman was an eighth grader in my school in 1924-25. He graduated from high school in Douglas. His early employment was as parts man at the Ford garage. On November 9, 1930 there was another Nauman wedding. Alvin Nauman and Ralphine Bimson were married and their first home was on South Third Street.

Their first child, Jeanette, was born in October 1931. A son, Alan Arthur, was born on August 13, 1933. Two more daughters were born, Sandra (b. February 2, 1939) and Reva Belle (b. September 9, 1943.)

Alvin became well known as an expert marksman and he won many trophies including top honors at the National Hi Power Civilian Matches at Camp Perry, Ohio. In later years he was employed by a Casper Ford dealership where he excelled as a car salesman. Alvin died in 1976.

Neilson, Chris

Chris Neilson came from Winterset, Iowa, maybe Denmark first. He was never married. He passed away in Des Moines, Iowa.

Chris did live on the Bob Edie place two years. When he proved up on his own homestead he bought the Raymond Law place just east of him. The Steinles bought and own his place now.

At Chris' sale in 1946 or 1947 the Dry Creek Homemakers had made a quilt, probably with the idea of selling it; but Chris opened the box and was so pleased they just gave it to him.

After his sale, Chris' house was moved to the north side of Douglas and became part of Osborn's Wrecking Yard.

Chris helped build the road from Dry Creek to Douglas. The people who helped used horses.

He was a great favorite with everybody. Was always jolly and loved to tease and play with the kids. He had a gray horse named Buster. He used to ride down to the Dry Creek Store to pick up tobacco and supplies.

There were several bachelors in the community and they would get together and cook up a nice dinner and play cards. Some of them were Bob Hall, Fred Burk, Jim Bowers, Olaf Hanson, Roy Harnan and Frank Bowers.

Nelms, Jack and Anna

Berthel Clyde (Jack) Nelms was born May 12, 1881 at Walnut Hill, Illinois, to James Eugene Nelms and Cora Ann O'Brian.

He came west at about age 19 at the urging of his cousin, Jess O'Brian, who was employed in or around Casper.

Jack settled at the CY Ranch at Careyhurst owned by Robert D. Carey, U.S. Senator and Wyoming Governor. He cowboyed for a short time and his knowledge of mechanics and love of fine cars landed him the job of chauffeur for Mr. Carey.

A few years later, Jack met Anna Elizabeth Leibouich of Deep River, Connecticut. Anna, the oldest girl of twelve children. She had left home in her middle teens landing first in Cheyenne. There, due to her lack of experience in the outside world, she almost landed in one of the city's brothels. She made her way to Careyhurst where she was employed as governess for the young Carey children, Sarah and Joe.

Jack and Anna were married November 19, 1919 at Ft. Collins, Colorado. They then settled in the booming oil field of Parkerton. They lived in the "tar-paper shack" community of Lambs Camp. Jack worked as a roustabout on the wooden derricks; twelve hour days, seven days a week.

Elizabeth Anne was born to them May 10, 1922 during one of the biggest snow storms remembered by the old timers. Jack, trying to reach Casper to see his family, became stranded and spent the night in an abandoned cabin with another traveler, a pregnant young woman.

Another daughter, Rosalie Cora, was born in 1926 but died shortly after birth.

The family stayed in Parkerton until 1928, going back to Careyhurst for Jack to be Postmaster and to run the country store.

Elizabeth Anne went to the rural school there at the CY. The most able teachers at that time being Leona Wagner, Bea (Burks) Philbrick and Cora E. Grant.

The store burned to the ground in March 1936, a terribly windy day. Due to the changing times, Carey decided not to rebuild it. Jack and his family moved back to Parkerton where he was gauger for the new South Glenrock Field. Two years later he purchased a home in Glenrock, continuing his work in the oil patch. He died from a heart attack in September 1955. Anna continued to live in Glenrock until her death in 1970.

Elizabeth Anne graduated from Glenrock-Parkerton High School in 1939. In 1941 she went to work at the courthouse in Douglas for County Treasurer Fred Smith. When Lloyd Froggatt became county clerk she worked for him and became his deputy. Marriage in December 1947 to Melvin E. (Stub) Iames prompted a move back to Glenrock. The Iames family owned and operated the Iames Supply, bulk petroleum products, for eight years. Two sons had been born in the 1950s, Richard Hugh Iames, May 3, 1952 and Ronald Clyde Iames July 28, 1953.

Rick lives in Glenrock, and Ron lives with his wife and two sons in Dayton, Wyoming.

Stub suffered a stroke and died in 1977 after six years of disability.

Elizabeth continues to live at the family home in Glenrock.

Nelson, Franklin and Eva Family

The Nelson family came to the United States from England in 1816 and settled in the woods near Mt. Clemens, Michigan. The family then consisted of six children including Thomas Nelson who was four years old at the time. Thomas was married twice and raised a family of ten, six boys and four girls, including Ira Nelson who, with his brother, Fred, moved to Nebraska.

Ira married and had three children, all boys, born at Ceresco, Nebraska; Franklin Josiah, Earnie and Earl.

Eva Adaline Sprague was the seventh of ten children born to Edwin A. Sprague and Juliaetta Smith, all named with the same E. A. initials of their father. Edwin Sprague served in Company 1, 3rd Regiment of the Wisconsin Cavalry from May 1862 to May 1865. So far as has been determined, he is a distant descendant of one of two brothers, either Ralph or William Sprague, who immigrated from England to the Massachusetts Colony about 1628.

I, Marvin Lee Nelson, was five months of age when my parents, Franklin Josiah Nelson and Eva Adaline Sprague Nelson, with my sister, Mary Lucille, and brothers, Edwin Franklin and Horace Richard, moved from Ceresco, Nebraska to Converse County, Wyoming in May 1913. Travel was in a 1910 Regal touring car with portions of the journey using a cattle trail for a road.

John Edwin Sinn, a nephew of my mother, had homesteaded in Converse County earlier and my father had made a trip by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad early in the spring of 1913 to look over the land situation in that area. Stories from a cousin of my father, Steph Nelson, who had homesteaded in Humboldt County, California, sounded so good that my father prepared for a sale and planned to move to California. However, the morning of the sale a telegram from Ed Sinn changed his mind. He withdrew a team of big gray horses and two cows from the sale for shipment by rail to Wyoming and took up a homestead which consisted of the SW<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> Section 28 and the NW<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> Section 33, T32N, R68W.

A well was drilled and a two room building with attic and combined garage covered with corrugated sheet iron was constructed for temporary housing. A large barn was also built and naturally far outclassed the temporary quarters, which was to become a shop when a suitable house could be constructed. Time passed and the house never materialized. A log building was soon added but served mostly for storage, a bunkhouse, wash house and for an engine which provided power to pump water and for the washing machine. Later, a windmill was erected and a water storage tank was installed to provide running water in the house for stock tanks and irrigation of the garden. Two cellars were excavated at a 90 degree angle with a common entrance. With the good earth covering, an even cool temperature was maintained the year around. One was used for milk, eggs, canned fruits and vegetables, etc., and the other for potatoes and the winter's supply of coal to feed the cast iron range that served for both heating and cooking in the house.

The Nelsons also soon acquired the NE<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> of Section 33 and the NW<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> of Section 34 which had been homesteaded by an Englishman, Ernest Hart, who became homesick for the old country and sold out.

My father had grown up in eastern Nebraska in the vicinity of Germantown, Swedeburg, etc., so of course learned to play the fiddle quite well and the folk music of that time. Among my early memories, the chores being done early and all of us going to some farm house or country school where my father played the violin and Horace accompanied on the guitar for a night of dancing. I spent the night on a pile of coats in a corner or at best on a kind host's bed. Also there were fall trips to the LaPrele Dam-Ayres Natural Bridge area to gather chokecherries, hops and wild grapes. It was on a family outing to the Platte River Gorge south of the homestead that my brother Horace chiseled a fossil fish head from the rock. He had located it on a previous trip to the area.

Lost Springs was the early Post Office for the area. I don't remember much about it but do recall that "Cheap John's" little shop was always a regular stop on those early visits. Soon, Shawnee became a close rival and, with my brothers Edwin and Horace big enough to take over much of the farming, my father built a machine and blacksmith shop there in about 1915. Ed Sinn put in a hardware store and lumber yard, the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad established an agent in a boxcar station and the Post Office, with Harry Haas Postmaster, was set up in his grocery store. Soon followed a hotel, bank, weekly newspaper and then the Blair Building with dance hall, doctors' offices and apartments on the second floor and two stores on the ground floor.

We continued to live on the farm with my father driving the three miles to town where he operated the machine shop and leased out the operation of the blacksmithing. Business was quite brisk as he had the biggest lathe in eastern Wyoming and did much of the machine work for the developing Glenrock and Lance Creek oil fields.

While Shawnee was thriving, mother picked up pin-money by using her power washing machine to do laundry for many of the town's people. She also made switches for those who saved their hair and wanted hairpieces. The stores in town were also happy to buy her surplus butter, eggs and lard.

During the flu epidemic of 1918 I passed out. How my mother managed, I don't know, but she somehow dragged me under fences and carried me the half mile plus to the main north-south county road. There she happened to meet a Mr. Wormwood on his way home. He left us in the shade of his wagon while he rode one of his horses back to town and had my father come for us in the car. I came to days later in the doctor's home in Lost Springs but believe I still suffer the consequences of that illness.

About this time a covered excavation was made for storage of ice cut and hauled from a reservoir on Lost Creek about two miles east of the homestead. Packed in and covered with straw, it kept very well and during the summer, hand cranking a three gallon ice cream freezer became a Friday evening ritual. Apparently the real cream and fresh egg mixture was very popular with everyone around for it seemed that by Sunday evening we would be scraping the bottom of the can for the last visitors.

Harvest time was always an exciting time with all the neighbors following the steam thresher from farm to farm and the women also gathering to help feed the crew. It was also a thrill to go out after the evening chores were finished and be held up to pull the whistle cord on the last remnants of the days steam. It was also a time for butchering, curing the meat, canning vegetables and making mincemeat and sauerkraut.

Attendance at the state fair in Douglas was always exciting but probably few will remember that Shawnee also had a local fair for a few years with exhibits of farm produce, handcrafts, baking, etc. with ribbons awarded for best showings.

The banker in Shawnee had built a nice two bedroom home with living, dining and music rooms, kitchen, a bath without fixtures, and partial basement. A fire developed during a time he was out of town but neighbors saw the smoke and were able to extinguish the blaze before more than some charring and considerable smoke damage occurred. During World War I, many homesteads who had borrowed money to prove up on their places went to work at good wages in the oil fields and let their homesteads go to the banks and money lenders. Apparently the Shawnee banker saw the decline of the area and sold the house to my mother and father. They cleaned it up and moved off the farm in about 1923.

My sister, Mary, had married Lewis Koleno in 1914 and he had passed away in 1919. She, Edwin and Horace then homesteaded in the Bear Creek area north of Douglas. The farm was rented out for a time, lay idle for a few years and then about 1932 Horace returned and farmed until the property was sold to settle the estate in 1964.

I don't remember the exact year but one evening my father took my mother and me to Lost Springs where a man from Douglas was demonstrating a radio he had made. We had always enjoyed our phonograph with the cylinder records but this new gadget intrigued me. My father was hesitant about getting one made; but when I proposed selling my flock of ducks and turning over my entire bank account, he weakened and the Nelsons soon possessed a radio. It had some five knobs for selecting stations and required one six volt storage battery for the radio and another one for the big horn type speaker.

In the early 1920's my father sold the shop and equipment to a Fred Daw. Mr. Daw neglected the business and lost the lucrative oil field work. In final settlement, the building and what was left of the equipment was returned to my father with 320 acres of land in T32N R69W. Since the oil fields had put in their own shops, about all the work available was occasional mechanical and blacksmith work. I was then able to swing a sledge hammer and also help shrink wagon tires on rebuilt wheels. Gasoline pumps were installed and a small candy and tobacco shop added. This shop was operated by a Jack E. Wright for a number of years mostly as something to do.

During the 1929-30 school term my father organized the busing of the district children to the Shawnee Schools. He drove a bus from the south, Horace one from the north and I picked up children on two short routes to the west and east and also attended school.

With my graduation from the Shawnee High School in 1932 and leaving home for other work, my father pretty much retired. He had installed a pressure water system in the Shawnee home, completed the bathroom, wired the house for electric lights and put a generator in the basement. He then sat back to take it easy. The shop building was moved to the homestead property in about 1948, remodeled and became a semblance of the house planned back in 1913.

My sister, Mary, had been living in Roseburg, Oregon for a number of years and, in 1949, persuaded Mother and Dad to move to that area. The house in Shawnee was sold and moved to Manville. They lived in Roseburg until my father passed away in April 1953, at which time mother moved back to the homestead place south of Shawnee with son, Horace. She passed away in July 1953. They both are interred in Rock Creek Cemetery, Ceresco, Nebraska along with the two babies left there when they moved to Wyoming.

My brother, Horace, passed away in 1973 and is in the cemetery in Douglas, Wyoming. Edwin passed away in 1980 and is in the cemetery at Oroville, Washington.

Newell, Andrew Jackson and Sally

Andrew Jackson "Jack" Newell was born on April 24, 1834, the son of James II and Elizabeth Koder Newell in Jeromesville, Ohio.

Raised as a child in the wilderness of Iowa among the Indians gave Jackson a lifestyle which he chose to follow for the remainder of his life.

Serving in the Civil War under Sherman in his "march to the sea", Jackson won a medal which is still in the family.

Sarah "Sally" Ann Arnold, the daughter of John and Obie Arnold (a relative of Benedict Arnold) and Jackson were married in 1857.

They had five children: Marietta, June 8, 1860-1945; Gus, April 29, 1864-October 26, 1934; Phillip; Fred "Ted", May 27, 1871-February 15, 1922; and Elsie.

In 1876 Jackson came to Wyoming to trap and prospect. Upon finding a vein of ore close to Bear Creek and Eagle Peak, Jackson and his brother James, who had come out to be with Jackson, built an ore house and tramway. They called their mine "Silver Tip". Their cabin is located close to where David Prager lives today. Sending for his brother, Harrison, to help in the mine, Harrison came in 1879. The families of Jackson and Harrison came shortly after. The mine played out so Harrison went north four miles and took up a pre-emption claim until the land was surveyed so that a homestead could be filed on.

Jackson continued to trap for a living in the Laramie Peak area. His family moved to Sheridan after living for a brief time in Virginia Dale, Colorado.

Jackson's nephew, Guy Newell, Sr., tells the following story about Jackson. "I remember once when my uncle Jackson was trapping wolves and beaver. He had traps set on Horseshoe Creek, he also had long chin whiskers; in setting a trap, it sprung and caught his whiskers. He could not release himself; he was about six miles from home, and he had to walk back home carrying the gun in one hand and the trap in the other. The snow melted early that year on his path; his language melted it."

Ted married Roxanne Howard. They lived in various parts of the state including Hartville where he was a gambler and musician. He played the violin and Roxanne the mandolin for dances. Later they homesteaded on Horseshoe Creek close to the mouth of Soldier Creek. Their home was renowned for the dances that were held there. In 1921 he and his wife opened up the Newell Rooming House in Glendo. The house was later on the Wilson Cash Store. Ted died February 15, 1922, Roxanne on March 14, 1928.

Marietta married "Buck" Chapman. They had one son (Claude) and three daughters (Maude, Mabel, and Myrtle). Her second husband was Riley Smith, and her third husband was Pete Gressman.

Jackson died at his miners cabin July 10, 1889.

Newell, George and Adelia Family

George, the son of James II and Elizabeth Newell, was born on January 18, 1833 in Jeromesville, Ohio. When he was 13 years old, his family moved to Black Hawk, Iowa.

Adelia Hackett, born April 19, 1834 in Ashtabula, Ohio, the daughter of John and Mary Lent Hackett, became George's wife on February 12, 1856. Their children were:

Alonzo H. - May 7, 1858

Marion - December 10, 1859 - December 20, 1859

Mary E. "Mame" - May 17, 1863 - March 18, 1943

Jennie E. - November 3, 1865 - June 13, 1952

Clara Belle - May 19, 1868 - October 29, 1941

George E. - August 2, 1871 - June 4, 1872

Ernest - May 9, 1873 - July 13, 1957

Luetta "Etta" - August 13, 1875 - February 19, 1940

Luella "Ella" - August 13, 1875 - June 11, 1953

Hearing of the west and the opportunity that it offered from his brothers, Jackson and Harrison, George brought his family, with the exception of Alonzo, to Wyoming in 1881. He, along with his wife and children homesteaded on Mary Cooper Creek near Springhill. Their lands are owned by John Pexton and his sons in 1985.

A two story log house was built. This same house stands today and is still in use. A big lone Ponderosa pine tree, which still stands below the house, served as a courting place for the five Newell sisters whenever their beaux came to court them.

Mary or "Mame" married Archie Hamner who had a ranch nearby.

Jennie married Lyman Cooper on April 13, 1892. A son, Ray, was born. Ray married Ethel Morton in 1912. They had a son, LeRoy. Ray later married Freda Newell. He and LeRoy owned the George Newell place when Jim Moran bought it in 1953.

Jennie later married Wesley Boyden of New York State having been born there August 19, 1877. Wesley came to Wyoming where he worked in his cousin Tim French's sawmill along with George Newell. Wesley and Jennie later acquired the Newell place and owned it up to the time of their deaths. Wesley died on June 14, 1950.

Clara Belle married Milt Hammond and raised her family on Wagonhound Creek.

Ernest never married. He was a partner with the Boydens. Elliott Hamner sold him his homestead at the mouth of Roaring Fork. Later, Ernie was to sell this to Art Fawcett. Ernie, along with his sisters, went to school in the George Newell home for the first two years. Lizzie Newell Cushman and her son, Frank, also taught for a couple of years. A school house was built in Schoolhouse Draw where school was held for all the Newell children in the area.

Luetta married Glen Williamson on April 20, 1906. Glen was born in New York and had come out west seeking his fortune. Lake Luetta, now called Dry Lake, was named after Luetta. Glen homesteaded west of Springhill. It is now owned by Richard Pexton. The Williamsons moved back to New York shortly after and lived out their lives there. Two daughters and one son were born to them: Alforetta Adelia, Wilma (Baitsell), and Wayne.

Luella married Barrett Cole in Toltec, Wyoming and lived in that area on the Cole ranch. Their sons were Ernest and Burnice.

George died November 19, 1897 and Adelia August 30, 1915. They are buried at Springhill.

Newell, Gus and Elsie Family

Gus, the son of Jackson and Sally Newell was born in Cedar Falls, Iowa, April 30, 1864. He, along with his parents, came to Wyoming around 1879. He married Elsie Alyes in Sheridan in 1884. They had five children:

Robert Andrew, March 28, 1890 - October 15, 1918

Ruby, d. March 17, 1953

Nellie, April 21, 1897 - July 24, 1967

After living for a while in Sheridan, the family moved to Thermopolis in 1898 where Gus freighted to Bridger, Montana.

After Elsie's death in 1902, Gus came back to the Esterbrook area where he had a homestead.

Gus' second wife was LaVina Barnes Stewart. LaVina's husband was killed with Gus doing some time in the Wyoming Penitentiary for the crime. LaVina, on her deathbed on October 6, 1946, admitted having committed the murder.

Robert Andrew married Hattie Newell, daughter of John and Cassie Newell, in 1914 at Toltec, Wyoming. Hattie came back to Wyoming from Nebraska to teach in local schools in the Esterbrook area. Shortly after their marriage, Robert and Hattie took up a homestead at the foot of Windy Peak.

They had a son, John Robert, in 1915. On July 23, 1918, Robert enlisted in the army. He contracted the flu that was sweeping the country while stationed at Fort Snelling, Minnesota and died on October 15, 1918.

Hattie and her son then moved to her homestead on Section 31, Township 28, Range 72 where they lived until her health failed. They moved to Nebraska to be with her parents. She died November 22, 1924. John, or Jack as he was known, lived with his grandmother until his death April 8, 1927 from an ear infection.

Ruby married Frank Spracklen. She died March 17, 1953. Nellie married George Hammond. She died July 24, 1967. Gus died October 26, 1934.

Newell, Guy and Myrtle Family

Guy H. Newell was born October 19, 1875 to Harrison and Sarah Newell. He came to Wyoming in 1879 with his parents and older brother Emmett. His father laid claim to his land two miles north of the present Horseshoe Creek Bridge at the foot of Laramie Peak.

In May 1881 his older brother Frank and wife Eliza, his older sister, Mary, and husband, Charles Messenger, also came to Wyoming.

There were no fences in those days, so at age five it was Guy's job to herd the stock, on foot. All through his life he was known to win many foot races, because as stockherder he raced the jack rabbits just for fun.

The only hay these pioneers had was from the native meadows, cut with a scythe and raked by hand. The first fall they put up four tons. Later, after ditches were built to drain and irrigate and fences built, these same meadows would yield 110 tons of hay.

When Guy was six years old, they were allowed to establish a school in Frank's shop. Guy's first teacher was Lizzie Anne Newell Cushman. They had three McGuffey Readers; First, Second and Third, for three pupils, Guy and Frank Newell and Charlie Gushins. Besides Lizzie Cushman, Guy's teachers were; Mary Cooper, Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Studly.

After Guy completed the eighth grade he went to Douglas and stayed with his sister and brother-in-law, Mary and Charlie Messenger, for two years of high school, then returned to his father's ranch to help out.

Guy's brother gave him a book, "The Hills Manual" that Guy studied; and in 1968 a college professor looked at the book and remarked, "What a world of knowledge it contains." The book is still in the family. Guy read and studied anything he could find, including law books. He had a great desire for education.

At age 21 he became Justice of the Peace. He was, by appointment, Field Assessor eight years, Deputy Sheriff under Carl Jackson eight years. He was appointed U.S. Land Commissioner and held this post as well as Postmaster for 17 years until he left Esterbrook in 1929 to return to ranching.

On July 10, 1900 Guy married Myrtle Laura Chapman, daughter of Marietta and Oscar Chapman.

Gus Newell

Myrtle Chapman Newell: receiving second place award at 1905 Wyoming State Fair in the women's horse race.

Myrtle was born October 16, 1885 on Tongue River near Sheridan; Wyoming. They were married in Douglas at the home of Charlie and Mary Messenger.

Guy and Myrtle established a ranch five miles west and a little north of Springhill, Wyoming. They ran white faced cattle, a few roan Durhams and a dark red breed, possibly Kerry.

Their horses were mostly Cleveland Bays, but through trading with Myrtle's great-aunt who lived in Colorado and raised Arabians, they were able to add this blood line to their own and had several of this breed as late as 1914.

In 1906 Guy, Emmett and Frank filed on mining claims at Esterbrook and along with working in the mines, Guy established a store there and freighted supplies in from Glendo and Douglas with team and wagon. By 1909 he had built an eight room house that set where the Esterbrook Club House now sits. His store was a little west of his home.

Emmett and Clara Newell had built the Rustic Inn, which still stands. Frank Newell had a home in Esterbrook; in fact, the whole town was Newells or relatives thereof.

In 1929 a gasoline explosion, caused by fumes collected in the basement of the store from a nearby storage tank, burned Guy badly and destroyed his store.

Guy and Myrtle took their stock and went back to ranching about six miles west of Esterbrook, where their grandson, Dennis Newell, still ranches.

Guy H. and Myrtle L. Newell had four children, Sarah Anne "Sadie", born July 22, 1901, married Leonard Watson and had four children. Later, she married Jack Jones of Glendo and had one son.

Vera Maud, born September 20, 1908, married Peyton R. "Slim" Dunham. They had four children, Merle, Juanita, Don and Harry.

Bertha Mae, born May 5, 1913, was killed in 1918 when a run away team threw her out of the wagon.

Guy H. Newell, Jr., born August 28, 1919 married Opal "Mickey" Leder and had two children. Guy Jr. died in December 1971. When Guy and Myrtle went back to ranching in 1929 they built a large log house that had hardwood floors, running water and electric lights powered by batteries and a wind charger. In March 1936 this house burned down and they had to rebuild. In 1940 Guy Jr. joined the National Guard and in 1941 went off to war. With the help of their daughter-in-law, Opal, they ran the ranch until 1945 when Guy Jr. returned. He didn't want to be a rancher and went to work for the Forest Service, where he worked until the time of his death in 1971.

In 1945 Guy and Myrtle sold off their cattle except for a couple of milk cows and of course their faithful old horses.

They stayed on the ranch until 1969 when Guy's poor health forced them to move into a mobile home near their daughter, Sadie, on the Jack Jones Ranch at Glendo.

Guy H. Newell, Sr. died in January 1970 seven months short of their 70th wedding anniversary. Myrtle lived an active life and was mentally alert until the day of her death, March 11, 1980.

Dennis Newell, the son of Guy Newell Jr. is the only descendant with the Newell name to still live in Converse County. He and his wife live at Springhill.

Newell, Harrison and Sarah Family

The son of James II and Elizabeth Koder Newell, Harrison was born October 12, 1831 in Jeromesville, Ohio.

He was married to Sarah Benham. They were the parents of Mary, Francis "Frank", Emmett and Guy.

Coming to Wyoming from Iowa in 1879 to help his brothers, James and Jackson, in their mining venture at "Silver Tip", Harrison soon saw that this life wasn't for him so he explored the country and decided to settle on a piece of land to the northeast near what was to be later called Springhill.

Harrison built a two-story house which was later destroyed by fire. The meadow on his place is still called the Harrison Newell Meadow.

Harrison was a big man — over six feet — weighing over two hundred pounds. He died July 10, 1915 and Sarah on May 7, 1923.

Frank, the oldest son, was born September 24, 1862. His first marriage was to Eliza Stanton and second marriage to Maggie Silver, born January 23, 1858 in Ireland to Patrick and Catherine Maroony Silver.

Frank's ranch, at Springhill, was one of the finest in the area. A modern clapboard two-story house and a big barn were built. The house was the scene of many of the areas social events at the turn of the century. The barn was later moved to the Jim Moran Ranch on Horseshoe Creek, section by section. Frank died September 5, 1929 and Maggie on December 18, 1925. They didn't have any children.

Mary married Frank Messenger and lived her life in Douglas after homesteading near her parents on Pool Creek.

Emmett was born in Cedar Falls, Iowa, December 2, 1869.

After working as a cowhand for several of the area's ranches including Guthrie and Oskamp, Emmett married Clara L. Searl of LeSeur, Minnesota on November 21, 1899.

Clara was born October 20, 1879. She came to stay with an uncle and aunt in 1897 near Esterbrook.

Emmett took out a homestead, in the valley west of his fathers, in 1900, near his brother Guy, later selling to Frank Spracklen.

Clara and Emmett had two children. Mary Evelyn, who married George Gazlay, son of Herbert Gazlay, who was a sawmiller in the area. A son, Harrison, died in infancy. Mary Evelyn, "Boots" and George had one son, George Emmett. "Boots" was born February 13, 1901 and died November 13, 1937 in Douglas. George Emmett died March 12, 1961 in St. Louis, Missouri.

In 1906 Emmett and Clara moved to Esterbrook where they built the "Rustic Inn". It was a hotel and boarding house. After the mines closed in 1908 the area became popular as a summer resort. Clara became post-master of Esterbrook on December 17, 1925, holding that position until December 11, 1946.

Upon selling their house and store in Esterbrook to Dale and Wilma Ballard in 1946, Emmett and Clara moved to Douglas. Emmett died in June 1951 and Clara on March 27, 1952.

Newell, John and Cassie Family

John Newell was born April 8, 1856 on a farm near the town of Fredonia, Iowa, the son of Robert and Christina Newell. He was an Irishman through and through with sandy hair and a red beard.

He married Catherine "Cassie" Neeley on July 3, 1879 in Fredonia. Cassie came from a small Dutch community in Pennsylvania called Johnstown, having been born there October 18, 1857 to Robert and Rebecca Neeley. Cassie had come to work for John's parents when she was 16 years old; and it was during this time she acquired the nickname "Cassie". In fact, her marriage certificate states her name as Miss Cassie Neeley instead of Catherine.

They lived on John's parents place and helped them for six years. During this period, four daughters were born: Elizabeth "Lizzie" on March 8, 1880, Rebecca on September 2, 1881, died August 2, 1882, Carolyn "Caddie" on May 23, 1883, and Hattie Mae on May 21, 1885.

In 1886 John, along with his brother, Will, decided to venture westward. They loaded their possessions in an emigrant car at Fredonia, Iowa and went as far as Stromberg, Nebraska on the railroad. It was here that their sister, Elizabeth, lived with her family, Dr Henry Cushman and sons, Ed and Frank.

Along with Ed and Frank Cushman, the two Newell brothers loaded their belongings in wagons and headed for Wyoming where relatives, Jackson and Harrison Newell had settled in the Laramie mountains near Laramie Peak.

John and Will sent for their wives as soon as possible. They came by railroad as far as Rock Creek (now Rock River.) They then traveled by wagon across the Laramie Plains to Bear Creek where they stayed until John found a place to live permanently.

A squatter, Mr. Baker, had settled on a place called the "Beer Keg Ranch" (now owned by Dick Pexton). He later abandoned it. It was here that John, Cassie and family settled. After fixing up the house that Mr. Baker had built, the family moved in. A spring, which still runs water, was fixed up using three huge slabs of rocks as sides.

The brand AP was acquired with the Baker ranch; it was used to mark their cattle.

The nearest town was Douglas which took three days to go and shop and go home. One time while going home over Dugway Hill the wind overturned the wagon. The horses ran away and groceries, including a barrel of apples, were scattered all over.

A daughter, Mary Allas, was born December 14, 1887.

A son, Robert Flaherty, was born February 28, 1889. He and a cousin Maggie (Wm. Newell's daughter) became very ill in 1891, and after being wrapped in blankets dampened with the cold spring water to keep the fever down, Maggie died but Robert lived. "Rob" as he was later known, married Marie Ferguson and homesteaded south of Lusk, Wyoming near Rawhide Buttes.

The only time Cassie ever went to town while living on the Beer Keg Ranch was when John went to Laramie to prove up on the homestead in 1890.

In 1892 while on a trip to Laramie to get a new wagon, John took his daughter Caddie with him. Caddie related the incident in a story she wrote in 1968. Excerpts from the story are as follows: "After a lay over of a day, we started early the next morning for the Peak and from Laramie City. Mr. and Mrs. Centre were with us. The roads were muddy and there was a strong northwest wind blowing. We hadn't got far until our troubles started, Centres were in the lead and they had a balkie horse. Every time we came to a sticky place she would balk. Papa and Mr. Centre would get out and get something to beat her with. Then they would start in and beat her till they got tired, then go back of Mr. Centre's wagon and get out a big brown jug and take a drink of something. Maybe it was vinegar, I don't know. Then they would go back and beat her some more. Finally, she started with a lunge and away they went. About noon, it started snowing but we kept going till dark. Then we stopped and made camp. We were almost froze and wet besides. Papa and Mr. Centre had an awful time trying to get a fire started. Papa finally got an idea. He got upon the load and dug out a case of tomatoes and emptied them out in the wagon box and used the box for kindling." Caddie relates that they got home the next day after breaking the reach in the new wagon.

Another daughter, Maudie, was born January 7, 1893.

In about 1892 or 1893 the children started to school at home with Mary Cooper as their teacher. They went three months in the summer. The next year, Ruby Studley was the teacher. The girls rode double on their horse, coming home each evening. Fred Newell, a cousin and son of Will Newell, went to school with them next year with Frank Cushman being their teacher.

By 1897, school was a problem so the family moved to Mitchell, Nebraska where the children could get a better education.

Caddie returned to teach school near Esterbrook in 1901 teaching eight pupils including the French children. She was paid $40.00 a month that year. The next year she taught a school on Wagonhound Creek, boarding at Harry Pollards receiving $45.00 a month and paying $15.00 a month for board and room. After teaching in Mitchell for several years she was married in 1912 to William G. Howard. She died February 6, 1978.

Elizabeth "Lizzie" married Frank Adney in Nebraska. They later moved to Eugene, Oregon where she passed away November 10, 1935.

Mary also returned to teach in Wyoming. Later she married Walter Nunn and moved to Lander. She died June 23, 1970.

Hattie married Robert Andrew Newell in 1914 after teaching school in the Esterbrook area. She died November 22, 1924.

Maudie married Norval Vincent Labertew and homesteaded in the Crescent Basin area near Rawhide Buttes. They had four children; Wilma, Audrey (Bayne), John and Zoeralda. In 1947 she moved back to the Esterbrook area, buying a cabin from Bill and Bunte Morton at the foot of Elk Mountain on Mill Creek. She lived here until 1968 taking care of elderly and sick people. In 1968 she moved to Cheyenne where she lived until her death December 21, 1973.

In 1903 the family visited the mountains they loved so well, staying three and one half months.

The Fourth of July always brought a big celebration. An excerpt from Hattie's diary is as follows: June 28, 1906, "Archie (Hamner) and I started back to Esterbrook from Glendo, he promised Mama that he would have everyone there on the Fourth. We picked up six kegs of beer, four gallons of whiskey, lemons and oranges."

Archie Hamner sold the Hoffman ranch on lower Horseshoe Creek where it joins the North Platte River, to John in July 1903 after purchasing it in April 1903. John would trail his cattle from Mitchell in the summer to the 3,000 acre Horseshoe Creek place and take them back in the fall. Haufs bought the place in 1906.

John died April 23, 1920 and Cassie, December 18, 1938.

Newell, Perry and Maggie

A half-brother to Harrison, George, Jackson, Thomas and James III Newell, Perry was born on December 23, 1842 in Black Hawk County, Iowa to James II and Mariett Darling Newell. His mother died June 6, 1847 at the age of twenty-seven years.

After being married in Iowa to Maggie, Perry and his wife came out West and settled on a small ranch on upper North Laramie River. A daughter, Perrie, was born while they were living here.

Seeing no future in the ranching business, Perry moved to Esterbrook when the Esterbrook Mining Company opened its copper mine there in 1898.

Being a carpenter, Perry built several of the houses in Esterbrook. Many of these still stand today.

Perry went to California in his later years and died there.

Newell, William and Sarah Family

William W. Newell was born in Concord Township, Louisa County, Iowa to Robert F. and Christina Newell on June 7, 1858.

Along with his brother, John, and nephews, Frank and Ed Cushman, William came to Wyoming in 1886. He brought 23 head of Shorthorn heifers and a Shorthorn bull, a team of horses, a wagon and household goods.

After settling in Jackson Newell's cabin near Laramie Peak, he sent for his wife, Sarah (Parkins) whom he had married two or three years before. It was while living here that a son, Fred, was born on August 27, 1886.

After about a year, Will and his family moved to the "Fordy" Newhart place which is west of Springhill and in 1985 is now owned by Richard Pexton. About 1887 or 1888 a homestead was established close to where Guy Newell (later Frank Spracklen) had his homestead on the east fork of Reid Creek.

A daughter, Maggie, was born in 1888 and died in 1891 and is buried in the Springhill Cemetery. Vinnie, the second daughter was born soon after. Louie, the second son was born in 1895. He later married Beth Read from the LaPrele community. Edith came into the world three months before the family moved to Mitchell, Nebraska in 1897. Nellie, the last daughter, was born in Nebraska.

In Fred Newell's memoirs he recalled an incident that happened to his father, Will. "Along about the summer of 1894 he (Will) had his cattle out southwest of Horseshoe Creek near Windy Mountain. When they came in to water, a bear would sometimes jump out of the brush and chase them. This summer a bear caught and killed one of them so Dad decided to set a trap for him. He borrowed a big bear trap and baited the trap with the remains of the dead cow. Well, he didn't have much faith in his ability of trapping so didn't go back to check on the trap for about a week. When he did go, I went with him, and lo and behold he had caught the bear. I was left to hold the horses while Clint Morrison and Dad skinned the bear and it kept me pretty busy as the horses were scared to death of even the smell of the bear. They rolled the hide up and tied it on behind Dad's saddle which the horse didn't like a bit, but we mounted and took off.

"Soon after we were mounted, the middle of the green hide slipped out and fell to the ground. One paw caught in the saddle strings and hung on. That hide stretched out to about ten or twelve feet long. The horse stampeded and it looked to me like he was kicking that hide about twice every jump. Well, Dad just couldn't quiet the horse as he went down the side of the mountain jumping over the rocks, fallen trees, etc., and all this time I was doing my best trying to keep in sight of him. When he got to the foot of the mountain he was headed for a little creek; just on the other side of the creek there was a fence corner where three barbed wire fences came together. Well, Dad wasn't about to ride him over those wire fences so he came to some willows in the creek and reached down and got a good short hold on one bridle rein with both hands, then just as the horse jumped into the willows, Dad jerked the horse's nose right up in his lap and threw the horse on his side while he jumped off.

"All this time the hide was still hanging on. The horse got up, crossed the creek and went through two of those fences and went on his way. After going through two more fences the hide came off and the horse took off towards home."

From Fred Newell's story is the following account of where he went to school. "Aunt Liz Cushman had a real nice log house on her land near Springhill. Several years after she left Wyoming, John Newell's wife (Aunt Cassie) and her children and myself lived in this house and we kids walked about a mile east to a log school house for a three months term of school. This was my second term. The winters were so long and hard that the only schooling we got were those three month summer terms.

"For my first term I rode horseback two miles to John Newell's house. My third term was at Aunt Liz's house but I rode part way to John Newell's house and joined two of his girls, who both rode on horse - an old hump backed horse named Pete. We used to laugh about one of them riding on one side of that hump and one on the other. My fourth term was in the same log school house where I took my second year but this time I stayed at George Newell's place.

"For my fifth term I boarded at a sawmill near where Esterbrook is now. A man named Austin owned the mill. The teacher boarded there also. She and myself and a few other kids walked to this same log school house. On those long summer days I would have some time before and after school to play around the sawmill.

"A young man by the name of Percy Brockway had the job of moving the lumber away from the saw on a little flat car and he would let me ride on this car.

"One day when we were at school we heard a big explosion and when we got back to the sawmill after school we found the big steam engine that furnished the power had blown up while the crew was eating dinner."

In 1896 Will moved his family to the Kelly place near Esterbrook. One year later, in 1897, the family moved to Nebraska, three and one quarter miles southwest of Mitchell.

Nichols, Etta A. Hart

Etta A. Plotner was born on September 5, 1893 near Phillipsburg, Kansas, the daughter of Oliver S. and Martha Catherine Keller Plotner. She received her education in the grade and high schools of Platteville, Colorado. She carried the mail by horseback or by buggy for three years at Meade, Colorado, meeting the train halfway between Longmont and Berthoud, picking up the mail bound for Meade and putting the out-going mail on the train.

At the age of 16 she came to Cheyenne from Meade, making the trip on horseback. She was employed by the Warren Livestock Company of Cheyenne for four years.

Before she came to the Douglas area in 1914 she was married to Arthur Angell at Boulder, Colorado. Etta and her husband made the trip from Cheyenne to Douglas on horseback where Etta took employment. Later she rented the Edwards place where she engaged in the dairy business, operating under the name of Angell Dairy.

In 1924 Etta was united in marriage to Henry B. Hart, son of Ben C. and Addie Hart of Douglas. Etta married her third husband, Blake E. Nichols, in 1954.

In 1925 Etta started her ranch with the purchase of 400 acres from Thomas Pexton. In the following years she acquired a ranch property consisting of 8,000 acres built up by additional land purchases. She raised commercial Angus cattle, sheep and hogs. She also had dairy cattle until 1948, milking 100 cows.

Mrs. Nichols' hobby was horses. She raised some of the finest in Converse County. She drove the champion team at the Wyoming State Fair both in 1951 and 1952.

Though she had no children of her own, Mrs. Nichols reared a nephew, Eugene Alaux, who was a student both in Glenrock and Douglas school.

Mrs. Nichols is among the prominent pioneer women of Wyoming. She succeeded in the ranching industry through her own efforts and with the high courage that carried her through the trials of pioneer life.

Etta Nichols sold her ranch in 1967 after the death of her husband, Blake, in 1965. She retired and moved to Douglas to make her home. She spent the last months of her life confined to the nursing home there, passing away September 7, 1980. She is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Nielsen, Andrew and Ingeborg

Anders Peter Nielsen (paternal father), son of Niels Thomsen and Kristen (Katrine) Pederson Nielsen, was born in Skovby, Denmark on March 12, 1853. Andrew (English pronunciation of Anders) Peter Nielsen took Ingeborg Peterson as his wife on October 14, 1878. Ingeborg Peterson was born April 21, 1855 in Denmark. To this union were born seven children. Four boys and three girls; Kristine Anna, Anna Kristine, Thomas Niels, Niels Thomas, Sigfred Englebrecht, Johannes Christopher, and Abeline "Leona."

Hearing that the United States was "the land of opportunity" he came to the states, landing in New York in 1885 and immediately moved his family to Omaha, Nebraska where they lived until the "Big Tornado" of 1913. His son, Johannes Christopher, having learned surveying, ventured to Douglas, Wyoming to survey homesteaders lands. Having access to the records in the land office in Douglas, he discovered lands adjoining that could be filed on by homesteaders. He immediately wrote and told his father. His father, Andrew P. Nielsen, a painter by trade, felt this was a good opportunity to file on the land in Wyoming and in the fall of 1913, he and his son, Sigfred and daughter Leona came to Douglas, Wyoming and each one filed on a homestead nine miles northeast of the town in the area of Sec. 29; Township 33; Range 70.

Johannes "Chris" Christopher lived a bachelor all his life. Leona married twice and had one child by the first marriage who passed away at age seven and another daughter, Vera Andersen (Schmalenberger), was born of her second marriage who still lives in Denver, Colorado. Sigfred married and lived on his homestead all his life.

Andrew's wife, Ingeborg Nielsen, passed away from a disease in 1902 in Omaha, Nebraska and was buried there. Andrew P. Nielsen passed away November 6, 1939 in Douglas, Wyoming and was buried in the family plot in Omaha, Nebraska. Johannes Christopher Nielsen passed away November 1, 1966. Abelone "Leona" Nielsen Andersen passed away in March 1972.

Frank Fiala (maternal father), son of Vaclav Fiala and wife, was born in Prague, Bohemia in 1843. At the age of six he started to a village school which was conducted and directed under the management of the Catholic Church. At the age of twelve he was sent to the city of Prague where he lived with a relative and attended school, taking up the study of the German language and other advanced studies.

In 1859 war broke out between Austria and Italy. Prague was a university city and center of learning; and at the beginning of the war there was great enthusiasm among the students and 800 of them enlisted under the Austrian flag, Mr. Fiala being one of that number. He was in the service eight months receiving six cents per day and rations which consisted of a daily allowance of 2½ pounds of black bread. At the close of the war he was discharged from service and returned to his native village (Horelice) taking a position as an accountant and timekeeper in an iron mine, a position he held until the age of 21.

During his service with the mining company, he walked to Prague every Sunday and it was then that he formed the acquaintance of Vojte Naprstek who had considerable reputation over two continents as a writer and champion of the people's rights and had spent a few years in the United States and had established Bohemian and German papers in St. Louis and Milwaukee. He was one of the chief agitators leading up to the Revolution of 1848 and was so active in this work that the Austrian Government placed a price on his head, but he succeeded in getting out of the country and fled to the United States where he remained until friends secured a pardon from the government and he was permitted to return to his native land. Naprstek, in later years, became a very eminent man and was greatly beloved by the Bohemian people of the world.

It was Naprstek who fired Mr. Fiala's ambition to come to America. Naprstek had copies of the U.S. homestead laws printed in Bohemian which he entrusted to his lieutenant and Mr. Fiala took up the work of promoting immigration among people at Horelice. Many people, including Mr. Fiala's mother and stepfather, Joseph Horak, (Mr. Fiala's father had died and his mother had remarried) had gone and Mr. Fiala was getting ready to leave when the government called him to enter upon eight years of military duty, as was required of all men of the empire when they became of age.

Fiala entered the army in 1863 and was attached to the Seventh Regiment of Cuirassiers, later becoming a lieutenant. He fought in the Austrian-Prussian War which lasted three days and was wounded twice, receiving a sabre cut across his left cheek and another across his forearm. He had two horses killed under him and the third horse had his ear cut off by the sweep of a sabre directed at Mr. Fiala.

At the expiration of five of his eight years, Mr. Fiala asked for a furlough of 30 days, which was granted, and instead of returning to his military duties he left for the United States landing in New York on February 20, 1869 in company with one of his comrades who had relatives in Ravenna, Nebraska. He left immediately for Chicago where he took a job of running an immigrant hotel. He could speak four languages; German; Bohemian; Hungarian and Italian. When he accumulated enough money to pay his fare, he moved to Iowa where his mother lived.

On April 18, 1870 he married Anna Bratnsovaky, who had only recently moved from New York with her parents. It was love at first sight and they were married the same day they met.

He and his wife established a cigar factory in Iowa City, Iowa in 1873. In 1878 their factory burnt down. They then filed and settled upon land in Sherman County, near Ravenna, Nebraska where they lived in a home made of sod.

To this union were born 14 children of which twelve were raised to maturity. The children's names were: Antoinette, Anna, Frank, Amos, Charles, Emma, Joseph, Clara, William, Libby, James and Vlasta.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fiala celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary on April 18, 1920. Ten of their children and their families attended.

Mr. Fiala passed away August 8, 1930 at the age of 87 years. His wife, Anna, passed away November 11, 1932 at the age of 82 years. Their immediate family have all passed on since.

Sigfred Englebrecht Nielsen (father) was born on August 11, 1883 in Copenhagen, Denmark and was two years old when his father and mother moved to the United States. He lived with his father until the age of 24. On November 28, 1907 he married Clara A. Fiala in Omaha, Nebraska.

Clara A. Fiala (mother) was born on August 12, 1882 in Ravenna, Nebraska living with her parents until she took a job in Omaha, Nebraska working in a cigar factory there. At age 22 Clara met Sigfred Nielsen and they married three years later. At that time, Sigfred (Fred, as he was known) was working in a can factory when he met Clara.

To this union were born eight children. Four boys and four girls. They are named; Fredrick Allen, Lewis Ivan, Lloyd Earl, Annabell Ruth, Doris Ellen, Dorothy Esther, (Doris and Dorothy were twins), Arthur Pierre and Lenora Lorraine. The first three children were born in Nebraska and the last five were born in Douglas, Wyoming, except Annabell who was born at home on the homestead.

Father and Mother filed on a homestead in the fall of 1913 and moved to settle it in the spring of 1914. The homestead was located nine miles northeast of the town of Douglas, Wyoming in Converse County in the area of Sec. 32; Township 33; Range 70.

Father was a plumber by trade having taken up pipe fitting in Ravenna, Nebraska and worked for Chas. Clark Plumbing Shop after moving to Douglas.

Transportation was by walking. Father walked to town on Monday and worked until Saturday night and then walked back home for the weekend. Mother stayed out on the homestead and cared for the children (there were three at that time). When they had to haul anything they would borrow Andrew P. Nielsen's team and wagon. Other than that, everyone walked wherever they wanted to go until father was able to buy a team and wagon of his own. In 1919 father bought his first automobile which was a Metz, with friction drive and it didn't last too long. Then he purchased a Model T. Ford. When it wore out he bought a Chevy (Club Sedan).

Walking was still the main way of transportation at the homestead though, because father needed the car to get to and from work. When we had to travel very far we would use the team and wagon.

The main way of social activities was a visit to the neighbors once in a while at which time we would walk. Neighbors lived from one to three miles apart.

Food for the family consisted of jack rabbit, vegetables from the garden and Mother canned from the garden for winter food. There was one milk cow to furnish milk for the children. Water was carried by pail from indentations in the creek and was boiled before use. A while after the family was settled, Father and Mother started drilling a well by hand using a 4' piece of 4" pipe for a drill bit and made a slush bucket from a piece of galvanized sheet metal. After they struck water the fence lines were surveyed, and they found they were on Chris's property (Chris was Father's brother). The water was used anyway until Chris threw a tantrum and told father he couldn't get water there any more, so water was hauled from the neighbors, one mile west of the Nielsen homestead, where Mr. Charlie Merrill and his son, Clifford, lived. When Father was able to, he had a well drilled on his own property, hiring the job done.

The depression of the 1930s was a very hard time. it was so hot and dry we couldn't raise hay or grain for the livestock. It was getting harder to make both ends meet so the two oldest boys went out to Careyhurst to work in the hay fields. They were only paid $15.00 per month which they saved up and bought a cow or two. When the herd built up we broke more cows to milk, having at one time 13 cows milking. Mother made butter, cream and cottage cheese and raised chickens and sold what she could to the Peyton Bolln Grocery Store to help buy the necessities for the family.

The family homestead house (12' by 14') was built of lumber and building paper and the plumbing was an "out house" and Sears Catalog.

As the family grew, the homestead house was used for a livestock barn and a second house (12' x 24') was built of lumber. After all the children but two were educated, the school building was put up for bid and Father bid on it but his bid was too low. The person who got the building had to move it too far so he let father have it for the same bid price. That building was a 16' x 28' wood structure and the boys moved it one half mile east of its original location with two tractors and a big truck, onto a full basement dug by hand with a pick and shovel and buckets. The second house was then torn down and built onto the school house and made a more comfortable living quarters. But Father fell ill and passed away in the spring of 1941 before he could finish the house, so the children, who were still living at home, pitched in and finished the house. A few years later an indoor bathroom was installed.

For clothing, Mother made her dresses from flour sacks and the children's clothes were made over from "cast off" clothes given to the family by people in town where Father had done their plumbing. The family washing was done in a number 3 galvanized tub on a brass washboard.

All eight children joined 4-H club work when that organization came into being in 1923 and our county agent was Mr. A. E. Hyde. The two older boys won trips to 4-H Congress International Livestock Exposition in Chicago, Illinois, sponsored by the Northwestern Railroad Co. Fredrick won his trip in 1925 and Lewis won his trip in 1926. They were very proud and honored and worked very hard to receive the award. The children paid for school clothes and supplies with monies they won at the Wyoming State Fairs during their 4-H membership years.

In 1942 Lloyd and Arthur were called for duty in World War II and the rest of the family scattered leaving Fredrick and Doris to tend the ranch with Mother. After farming the land for 30 years and only getting four paying crops, we decided in 1958 to replant the farm land back to grass and use it for pasture again.

On December 6, 1963 the city dump fire got away in a high wind and burnt an area three quarters mile wide and 15 miles long going through the middle of the Nielsen ranch destroying all the winter pasture and 45 tons of recently purchased baled hay. Many fence posts and wire were badly burnt. There were suits filed in the courts by all the neighbors who had gotten burnt by the fire. Our suit was finally settled in 1970 but not until it caused lots of hard feelings to all those concerned.

Our health started to fail in 1970 so we decided to sell the ranch. The sale was made in 1973 when we retired and moved to Douglas in September of that year.

We, Fredrick (Fritz) and Doris, now spend much of our time entertaining the public with old time music. He plays the violin (a Stradivarius handed down in the family over 100 years, has come unglued a few times and the neck broke off but he hired a friend in Casper to fix it). He has several other violins, one being a violin made from grandfather's old "Roll Top" writing desk, which was made of black walnut and a Steiner which he purchased at a music store in Douglas. The Steiner is 311 years old.

After we left the ranch we wanted to do something (free of charge) for the senior citizens of the community so we started playing for their dances in 1974 and still play for them several times a month when we are able to. We also play for any church who calls on us and have played other towns and states including South Dakota, Colorado, Nebraska, Arizona and Utah, playing for senior citizen groups, old folks homes, lodges, wedding receptions, wedding anniversaries, retarded people, the teachers association, and have played for the Wyoming Pioneer Association for the past 13 years and for the people who attend the state fair on Pioneer Day.

Members of the family who have passed on are: Sigfred (father) passed away April 7, 1941 at the age of 57 years. Lloyd Nielsen passed away in September 1968 at the age of 55 after a motorcycle-car accident. Clara A. Nielson (mother) passed away April 2, 1969 at 86. Annabell R. (Nielsen) Aldrich passed away in June of 1977 at the age of 61 from the dreaded disease, cancer.

At the time of this writing, six of the eight children are still living.

Nielsen, Herb and Mareta

Ole Herbert Nielsen, known as "Herb", came to Wyoming about 1920. He was born at Wisner, Nebraska March 31, 1902 and at the age of 13 moved to a farm near Chambers, Nebraska. He grew up working at home and for other farmers.

This was hay country and many baled and hauled their hay 28 miles to O'Neill, Nebraska. This was the time of four horse teams and wagons with baling racks. They fed some of the hay to the cattle but most of their income was from the hay sold in O'Neill. Herb gained his experience with horses working for these farmers and began to ride wild horses at rodeos around the country.

In 1920 when he was 18, he came to Wyoming with Alvin Johnson, a WWI vet who had filed on a homestead 60 miles north of Douglas, near Dull Center.

Alvin brought a four horse team and wagon, baled hay and other equipment that he would need to prove up on his homestead, and loaded it all into a railroad emigrant car at O'Neill and headed west. Herb was a neighbor of the Johnsons and was anxious to go along with Alvin. Alvin built a cabin and proved up the homestead. He then sold it to Harvey Nachtman and returned to Chambers, where he went back to farming. Alvin died at the age of 86 in February 1975. Alvin Johnson was my uncle. I am Mareta Nielsen.

Herb stayed in Wyoming and found jobs as a cow-hand and as soon as he had the money, bought a horse of his own. He rode on roundups in the fall and trailed cows to Douglas many times. He also broke saddle broncs. He worked at the CY Ranch south of Casper, and the Fiddle-back on the Cheyenne River near Dull Center where he learned to shear sheep. He worked during lambing and shearing season in and around central and southern Wyoming. Some years, after shipping and work was slow, he would return to Nebraska and pick corn and spend the winter with his folks. Wyoming always drew him back in time for lambing and shearing season.

In 1926 or '27, Herb filed on a homestead and built a one room cabin. This was south of the Cow Buttes and joined the Paul Miller place. While trailing cows to Douglas in October of 1927, he received word of his mother's death and returned to Nebraska. After being back in Wyoming for shearing in the spring of 1928, he returned to Nebraska. On July 17, 1928, he and I were married. My home was near Chambers as was Herb's and my maiden name was Mareta Isaacson. We came to Wyoming at this time and settled on the homestead.

Herb had planned to work at a sawmill south of Douglas but it had been closed down so he was again on the cow trail to Douglas at shipping time as the depression had set in and jobs were hard to find.

The fall of 1928, Herb's brother, Calmer, and his wife Hazel, and father, Peter Nielsen, came to Wyoming and filed on homesteads. Herb's sister, Gertrude, came later in 1931 and also filed. She taught school at the Schmidt School and at Lance Creek. All their homesteads were near Dull Center.

In April of 1929 I went with Herb on the shearing tour. We went to the Bishop pens north of Casper to Wamsutter and 25 miles south of Wamsutter. I recall the road wasn't more than a muddy wagon trail. We had a tent and a Coleman stove to cook on and keep warm by, which was loaded into our Model T Ford Coupe. The shearing tour brought us back north to Reno Jt. where Herb sheared for Bert Reno, Elmer Reno, Floyd Robinson and others.

In June of 1929 we returned to the homestead and proved up on it. We sold the half-section that joined Paul Millers to him. Another half-section on the north joined Frank Rothleutner's homestead and he gave us twelve head of cows in payment for it. That started our cow "herd." Herb also leased his father's place and helped him fix it up. They built a rammed dirt house on it. Each fall we traded our steer calves for heifers and soon our herd was growing.

In April of 1930 our first child was born, a girl we named Delores, so that spring I didn't go along shearing. When she was two years old we went along and I got a lot of exercise keeping track of her. This year we first went to Arminto where Herb sheared with Orville McConahay. We camped in their yard. We went on from there to Thermopolis and sheared near Kirby, Wyoming, up on Copper Mountain, then back to the Cheyenne River, where we sheared some smaller bunches. Our Model T Coupe was doing well. In the spring of 1933, Herb's father sold his homestead and went back to Nebraska. We leased a place from Oliver Nachtman a few miles east of the Pinnacle Rocks. On September 18, 1933 our second child was born, a boy named Harold. Our cattle were doing well and we had taken out a reconstruction loan and things were looking pretty good for us. By April 1934 the early spring brought a lush growth of grass and the water holes were full. Herb went shearing at this time and I took the two children to Nebraska to visit. We boarded the North-western passenger train at Douglas one morning and arrived at O'Neill late that night. The plan was for Herb to come after us after shearing, which he did by July 4. We were going back to Wyoming but received a letter from Herb's brother saying everything had dried up, no water, and grasshoppers had taken all the grass. Herb would need to come up right away and see about the cattle. We sold our cattle to the government.

So we were back where we started but now we had two small children and another on the way. Our third child, Harlan, was born October 7, 1934 at Kearney, Nebraska.

We lived with Herb's sister Myrtle and her husband Calvin Bostrum. Herb spent his time babysitting and picking potatoes on irrigated acres at $1 per day. Nebraska's dry land crops looked like plowed fields. After a spell of whooping cough for our two oldest kids and Bostrom's two, we went back to the Chambers area and lived with Herb's father for the next year. In 1935, Herb bought four milk cows at $40 each. He worked baling hay for $1 per day, went shearing for $.08 a head, put up hay and husked corn or whatever work was available and that summer we raised a big garden. In 1935 the crops were back to normal after the 1934 drought.

In April of 1936 we moved back to Dull Center where Herb worked on the government AAA program building dams for ranches in the area.

The fall of 1936 Herb's brother Calmer and his sister, Gertrude, sold their homesteads and bought old ewes at $3 a head. We leased a place and ran the sheep on shares, half the wool and half the lambs of the next year's crop. This started us in the sheep business. We were in this for three years and then lost our lease in 1939. At this time Herb and Calmer trailed the sheep 100 miles north to a ranch located 17 miles northeast of Gillette. We lived there for the next eight years. During this time we bought a house in Gillette and lived in town during the school months. We sold all the sheep in 1944 and then took cattle in to pasture. Herb was injured in 1945 when the horse he was riding bucked off the side of a butte.

On April 18, 1946 our last child, Kay, was born and in the spring of 1947 we sold out and moved once again to Nebraska. We were able to buy a small farm. Because of Herb's neck being broken in the horse accident, he was unable to continue farm work; and in 1950, we bought a grocery store in Inman, Nebraska. Our lot in life was improved considerably, and we ran the store for six years. Wyoming called us again and we moved back to Gillette in 1956 and bought the Wyoming Hotel which we ran for nine years. We then moved to Lovell, Wyoming where we bought the Western Motel in 1967 and operated it for eleven years. We lived there at the time of Herb's death on May 30, 1978 at the age of 76 years, 2 months.

Herb's father, Peter Nielsen died in 1943 at the age of 72 and his brother, Calmer, in 1959 at the age of 54. His sister, Gertrude, died in 1972 at the age of 64. She had married Fred Pate in 1941. She had taught school in Douglas when Fred was serving in the service in WWII. They moved to Hot Springs, South Dakota after he returned. They had moved to Sheridan in 1960 and there she taught school for ten years. She has a total of 43 years as an elementary school teacher.

Our daughter, Delores, now resides in Petaluma, California and works for Fireman's Fund Insurance Co; Harold is employed with Tri-County Electric in Gillette; Harlan has just recently retired from Mountain Bell and is self-employed in a telephone connected service; and Kay lives at Moorcroft and is also self-employed in an oil field service company.

I now live at 220 Powder River Avenue, Moorcroft, Wyoming. In October of 1985 I enjoyed my 81st birthday and am still active and healthy.

Norcross, Ross and Ester

Roswell "Ross" Norcross was born May 25, 1881 in Preston, Connecticut. He was the son of Alphonso and Rose Gardner Norcross.

Ross came to the Douglas area in 1902 for his health. He was a partner in a mine on Three Cripples Creek near Esterbrook. Ross was also a skilled carpenter. He served in the first World War.

Ester Haskell Norcross was born January 5, 1884 in Arnold, Nebraska. Ester and Ross were married November 14, 1921 and to this union one son, Daniel, was born. In addition to being a housewife and mother, Ester was an artist, painting the beautiful mountains, flowers and trees which surrounded their home near Esterbrook.

The Norcross family spent their summers in the mountains and lived in Glendo during the winter months. It was there that Ross died on June 5, 1969. Ester died on April 29, 1982. Both Ross and Ester were members of Christ Episcopal Church and both are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Daniel and Patricia Norcross were the parents of eight children, namely Keith (now deceased), Phillip, Chris, Ross, Kevin, Susan, Lisa and Sarah.

Norton, Ernest and Calla Family

Ernest Norton was born in Highlands, North Carolina in 1893. He married Calla Watson in 1916.

Ernest, Calla Mae and their four children, Sarah (Louise), Myrtle (Marie), Oliver Patrick (Bill) and Phebe M., came on a train to Douglas in March 1930 where Ernest (Ernie) worked as foreman of a ranch on Elk Horn Creek. My father had been told by two of his brothers-in-law, who were already in Wyoming, that Wyoming was the land of opportunity and he could have a big sheep ranch. Four years later my mother died. My dad (Ernest) was a ranch hand for several years after which he moved into Douglas. Also, a carpenter by trade, he helped build the LaBonte Community Hall, the First Baptist Church on Fourth and Oak Streets, and the Rogers' home in the 1920s on the Rogers' ranch at Orin.

In 1944, I married Dennis K. Rogers; and in 1953, we moved to Orin on the family ranch.

Marie married Fred Allen. She died in 1951. Ernest died in 1968.

Numrich, John and Gertrude Family

John Henry Numrich was born in Padew, Austria on October 1, 1883, the son of Jacob and Barbara Dewey Numrich. In 1900 at the age of 17 he came to the United States. He made his home with his uncle and aunt who earlier in the year had come to the U.S. From Padew, settling at Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania. Henry started working in the coal mines. Several years later they all went to Springfield, Illinois to make their home where Henry continued to work in the mines.

In the fall of 1904 he met Gertrude Kohl. She was born in Reichseim, Austria on May 7, 1886. In 1900 at the age of 14, she came to the U.S. and worked as a subservant maid in Boston, Massachusetts. She came to Springfield to spend Christmas with her sister Mary and family. Here she met Henry; and after a short courtship, they were married on January 31, 1905 in the Trinity Lutheran Church. They bought a home on South 15 Street where three of their children were born: on May 13, 1906 a son, John Earnst, on June 28, 1908 a daughter, Emma, and on August 28, 1912 a daughter, Margaret.

On September 17, 1913 Henry became a naturalized citizen of the U.S. He was always proud to be an American.

About this time he decided to go into business for himself. He sold their home and bought a grocery store and meat market and soon had a good business going for himself. Their living quarters were in the back of the store. Here, on September 16, 1915, Ruth was born.

In 1916 he heard about the homestead land being offered near Douglas, Wyoming. After talking this over with several other families, four of them decided this would be a good opportunity to acquire land. The four men, Henry Numrich, Conrad Numrick, (Conrad was a distant relative of Henry; his branch of the family spelled their name with a k instead of an h), Louis Kurtz, and Fred Domsalla came to Douglas and filed for a homestead permit. After they learned that their permits had been granted, they made plans to move. Henry was the first to leave. He sold the store, bought a team of horses, a lumber wagon, many needed tools, loaded up the furniture in a rented box car and was ready to go. The family stayed with the Conrad Numricks because they didn't leave for the homestead until the latter part of May. In March 1917, Henry left taking his son, John, ten years old, and Conrad's two oldest sons, Fred and Conrad Jr. to help build the houses for both families. They landed at Orpha, Wyoming which at that time was called Steven. They stored the furniture, loaded everything they needed on the wagon, hitched up the team and headed for the homestead which was 20 miles north of Orpha. This community is now known as the "Hyland Flats."

During the process of building, Henry and Fred had a very narrow escape from freezing. They had to go to Douglas after more lumber and food supplies. It took two days to make the trip with the team and wagon. It was a nice day when they left; but on the way back, they were about two and one-half miles from home when they ran into a terrible snow storm. The wind was blowing fiercely and turning bitter cold. They stopped at a neighbors, Gene Fowler, to rest the team and warm up a bit before going on the rest of the way. It was getting dark and Gene tried to get them to stay overnight but they thought they could make it and started on. After traveling for a while they decided they were lost. They were getting so cold they got off and walked. Soon they stopped and stood between the horses to try to get warm. After a while the wind let up and they could see a light ahead. Of course they thought it was the light at home but found themselves back at Gene's. He had set the lamp in the window just in case they might come back. He helped them put the team in the barn for the night. How thankful they were to get in by a warm fire. In the morning the storm had let up and they continued on home.

By the latter part of April the houses were finished enough that the rest of the family could come. On April 27, 1917, Gertrude (expecting their fifth child), the three girls, and the milk cow Daisy, arrived at Orpha. Henry and son John were waiting for them with the team and wagon. After loading all their wares on the wagon with the milk cow tied on behind they started on their 20 mile trip, following a bumpy trail, to their new home. After traveling about half way, Gertrude was getting very tired and kept asking Henry "How much farther is it?" and Henry would say "Not too much farther, just over that next hill." The milk cow, too, was getting tired and started lagging so John and Emma took turns walking along behind with a little switch to pep her up a little. What a relief when they finally got over "that next hill" and could see the little homestead houses!

The water situation posed a problem in those early years. There were ponds with plenty of water for live-stock but water had to be hauled from a spring about a mile from the house for family use. Henry's first attempt to dig a well by the house failed. They didn't know wells had to be drilled in Wyoming. In Springfield a shallow well could be dug most anywhere. That first summer Gertrude did the washing beside a pond near the house. Henry had built a rock stove to set the tub on. John and Emma picked up cow chips and chopped sagebrush to burn to heat the water.

That first summer a barn and workshop had to be built. To build the walls they picked up flat rocks that were found plentiful on the hill tops. The rocks were stuck together with pond mud. The roof was covered with logs then covered with sod. It made a good warm barn that lasted for years.

That fall on August 6, their fifth child, a true pioneer baby, Ella Marie, was born. The only attendance besides Henry was Mrs. Conrad Numrick. Mother and baby did fine.

In March of 1918, Henry got permission to leave the homestead to go to work for Fred Dilts at LaBonte, Wyoming. The family went with him. He helped with the irrigating and putting up the hay and Gertrude did the cooking for the ranch hands. That fall, the three oldest children attended the Sullivan School. This was the last year John went to school. He was now twelve years old and went to work herding sheep for John Morton. With the first money he earned he bought a saddle horse "Trinket" for the folks to use. That fall the family went back to the homestead. More improvements must be made. That winter, Emma and Margaret didn't go to school as there was no school in this vicinity.

In the spring some of the fields must be gotten ready to plant grain. After the fields were plowed and disked, they were harrowed to clear off the brush. The seed was scattered by hand then harrowed under. Gertrude was out in the field helping while Emma did the cooking and cared for the smaller children. The horse drawn machinery was crude but they made a start.

During the summer of 1920 the Fowler-Cowger School was built. There had to be six pupils to get a school so Ruth started at age five. This first term was for six months. The school was a mile and three fourths from the house and this is a long ways for small children to walk. If a storm came up during the day or it turned too cold, Henry would come after the children with the team and wagon.

In those early years our mail boxes were on the Ross Road, about nine miles from the house. The neighbors took turns once a week going after the mail. They rode horseback or took the team and wagon.

About the only entertainment they had were the dances held at the Hyland School House. It was centrally located in the community and people came from miles around, some on horseback and some with team and wagon. They would dance and visit till dawn when it was light enough to see to go home.

At home the children created their own fun and games. They had rag dolls Mother made, cut paper dolls out of the catalogs, made mud pies using pieces of broken glass for dishes. In the winter time it was great fun sliding down the snow drifts on a scoop shovel.

During the winter months Gertrude liked to sew, making clothing for the children. She made blankets and quilts, did beautiful crochet work and hooked many a rag rug. How nice it was to have a rag rug beside the bed. The winters were long, very cold and hard to endure but when the sweet song of the meadowlark heralded the return of spring and Mother Nature spread her carpet of green, spirits were lifted and efforts renewed to succeed hoping each new year would be better than the last.

Sometime early in 1919, Fred and Conrad Jr. went to work on Governor Carey's ranch at Careyhurst, Wyoming. Here a tragedy happened in January of 1920 when Conrad Jr. was killed in a runaway team accident. Fred continued to work here until after his father's death in July 1922. Then he went to Kansas City, Missouri where he attended an auto mechanic school. He received his diploma in July 1923 and returned home. On October 23 he and Emma were married in Douglas. Soon afterward they went to Springfield, Illinois to make their home. Here Fred had worked at Lauterback's Garage. On January 14, 1926 their only child, Betty Ruth, was born. After Fred retired from the garage they bought a farm near Palmyra, Illinois in May of 1948. In September 1960 Fred died from cancer. Emma still lives on this farm near her daughter and family.

In 1923 Henry bought their first car, a Model T Ford. What an improvement over the team and wagon. He had his troubles learning to drive it. About the first time he took it out to get the mail he turned a corner too fast and upset it. He had to walk to the nearest neighbor to get help to set it upright again.

On December 28, 1924 about two o'clock in the morning, another daughter, Dorothy, was born. The baby came at an unexpected time being two months premature. Outside, a winter storm was taking place, making roads impossible to get to town to a doctor. Without doctor or nurse, this tiny two and one half pound baby was saved.

With the car, a trip to town could be made in one day. Now Gertrude could go once in a while. How nice if she brought home a new piece of oilcloth to brighten up the kitchen. The children looked forward to Mother going to town, they knew among those necessities would be a small sack of candy.

Things were progressing fairly well when the depression of 1929 hit, followed by the drought years of the early '30s. The fall of 1929 Ruth was ready for high school. She worked for her room and board in order to go. Later that fall, Margaret left home and went to work for Jennie Chamberlin in Douglas. She worked here until on December 9, 1931 she was married to Arthur M. Sims. They made their home at 222 North Third Street in Douglas. To them three children were born: Margaret on August 20, 1933, Arthur M. Jr., December 25, 1935 and Allen Lee on March 28, 1945. She lost her husband in February 1957. She made her home in Douglas until her death in late April 1969. Her son, Arthur, resides in the family home.

Ruth graduated from high school in May 1933, attended the Chadron State Teachers College one year and started teaching in the rural areas of Converse County in the fall of 1934. In 1936 while teaching the Walker Creek School, she met Adolph "Bubs" Whiting. On November 13, 1937 they were married at Deadwood, South Dakota. She finished that term and quit teaching for the next five years. During this time their two sons were born, Jimmie Dale, December 14, 1938 and Larry Joe, December 14, 1940. During World War II, in November 1943, she started teaching again, finishing a term where the teacher had resigned. She continued to teach for the next 14½ years, taking Jim and Joe with her after they were of school age. In March of 1944 Bubs was drafted in the Marine Corps.

After his discharge in January 1946 he bought a place six miles west of Orpha where they made their home. They retired in 1974 and Jim took over the place.

In 1935 John returned to Springfield. He soon found work with the Central Illinois Power and Light Co. He enrolled in night school to learn the mechanics of the light company. He worked for this company until his retirement in 1971. The latter half of these years he worked as a foreman. His main hobby was his gun collection, having collected 463 guns. On March 11, 1940 he married Ida Mae Timms. Ida had two little girls from a former marriage. On September 1, 1974, Ida Mae died. Five years later, John died. Both are buried in the Springfield Cemetery.

Marie graduated from Glenrock High School in 1935, attended the Chadron State Teachers College one year and started teaching in the rural schools of Converse County. She was married to Daniel Saxon July 18, 1942 in San Diego, California. Dan was serving in the navy at that time. They returned to Wyoming in 1945. Dan went back to work for Continental Oil Co and was transferred to Guernsey, Wyoming. Here Marie taught sixth grade for three years then went to Torrington and taught sixth grade until the spring of 1955. During the summers she went to school at Laramie and received a BA degree. In the summer of 1955 Dan was transferred to Cherokee Pipe Line at Wood River, Illinois. He worked there until his retirement on October 1, 1967. Marie continued teaching at Wood River Elementary until May 1973 when she retired after teaching a total of 32 years. At the present time they are enjoying retirement on a farm near Vienna, Missouri. Their only child, David, was born September 4, 1950.

Dorothy graduated from the Converse County High School in 1942. That fall she enrolled in the NRA School for Defense in Cheyenne. Here she met Albert Jack Swearingen. They were married April 19, 1943 at Kimball, Nebraska. On May 19, 1943 Jack left for New Orleans, Louisiana for training with the army. Dorothy could be with him but returned to Douglas when in 1944 he was sent overseas to the Asiatic Theater for about four months, then he was attached to General Patton's Command in the European Theater. He was discharged in April 1946. He came home to his wife and new baby daughter, Karen Marie, who was born in Douglas July 8, 1945. They returned to Cheyenne where Jack returned to his job working as a pipe fitter for the U.P. Railroad. Their son, Albert John, was born there November 1, 1948. In 1975 Jack was transferred to North Platte, Nebraska. Due to poor health he retired in 1979. They still make there home there living near their daughter and family.

Now that their family had all left home, Henry and Gertrude went on making progress. The increased number of livestock made a need for more range. Many of the homesteaders were selling their places thinking they could find better living conditions elsewhere. Henry was able to buy the adjoining sections making enough range to run enough livestock to make a comfortable living.

On November 5, 1955 they were baptized by Rev. Clyde Thompson and became active members of the First Baptist Church.

In 1955 they had the honor of celebrating their Golden Wedding Anniversary with all their children attending. That fall after Henry had suffered a light heart attack he decided to retire. He leased the place and bought a house in town where they spent their later years. On August 5, 1958, Henry died. On September 12, 1966, Gertrude died. Both are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

We are happy that the place is still owned and operated by the family. At the present time, Jim and Joe Whiting are using the range for summer pasture.

As I bring this story to an end I want to add that what we all held most dear in our memories of the homestead days is the love and happiness we shared living and working together as a family.

Nunn, Walter and Mary

Born in Kansas in 1885 to William G. and Elizabeth Geddes Nunn, Walter came to Wyoming with his brother, William G., in 1910. They leased the old Charles Pollard Ranch on LaBonte. His brother, William, later bought the place from Arthur W. Phillips on June 17, 1919.

Walter married Mary Allas Newell in 1914 at Mitchell, Nebraska, at the home of her parents John and Catherine Newell.

Mary was born December 14, 1888 on the old Beer-Keg Ranch, now owned by Dick Pexton in the valley west of Springhill. As a child, she attended school in the summer time with her sisters and their Newell cousins at the Springhill School.

Mary received her high school diploma and a teacher's certificate in 1906 in Nebraska. She then returned to teach the LaBonte, Starr, Gray Rock, Foxton and the Orin Junction Schools. While at the Gray Rock School she taught the two Perrio children. She stayed at the George Howe Ranch on the North Platte River while teaching the Orin Junction School and it was here that she met and dated her husband to be.

For their honeymoon, the newly wed couple climbed Laramie Peak.

They leased the O. P. Johnson Ranch on LaBonte Creek, living there until 1919. A son, Robert Victor, was born in Douglas, May 16, 1919.

In the fall of 1919 the family moved to Douglas where they spent the winter. In 1920 they moved to Lander, Wyoming where they purchased a ranch on Willow Creek.

Walter passed away in the early 1930's. Robert and Mary continued operating the ranch until 1950 when they sold it and moved to Lander. Mary died June 23, 1970.

Nunn, William and Maude Family

William Guest Nunn was born in Kansas on January 28, 1883, the son of William G. and Elizabeth Geddes Nunn. His father was born in England, his mother in Scotland. William and Elizabeth came to the United States as young people. They first met each other in Illinois and later were married there. Shortly thereafter, the family migrated into Kansas and later to Iowa to engage in farming.

William was educated in the schools in Marne, Iowa and at Drake University. He farmed in Kansas for a time, coming to Wyoming in 1908 to visit a friend. He returned to Wyoming from Iowa in 1910 on his way to Colorado to look at the farming country there. The train stopped in Douglas where Will got off to look around. There was work available and he decided to stay awhile.

William worked at several different places in the LaBonte area. He found the people friendly and was welcomed into the community. He was invited to join in the community dances and it was at one such gathering that Guy George introduced Will to his little sister, Maude. Soon Maude and Will were making plans of their own.

Olive Maude George was the daughter of Frederick and Mary Copsey George. Maude's mother and father were born and raised in Wisconsin and were married there.

In the late fall of 1910 Will succeeded in leasing the Phillips place on LaBonte Creek. Will and Maude were married on January 11, 1911. They moved to the Phillips place to make their home.

Mr. Phillips, an Englishman, continued to lease his land to the Nunns until 1920 when he came to Wyoming from England to visit. He told the Nunns that his "geologists" had determined that there was no oil south of the river and therefore he wanted to sell his property.

This was a crisis in the lives of William and Maude since they had little money and loans were difficult to obtain. Will tried to make a land loan in the Douglas banks but failed in his attempt.

Someone at one of the banks told Will that he might see Sarah Morton to arrange for the money. She sometimes made loans if she thought it feasible. Will went to Mrs. Morton who was pleased with what she heard of Will's industriousness and his reputation and she agreed to lend him the money. Later Will's father sold some property he owned in Iowa and was able to make Will a long-term loan.

Times were very hard but with hard work and determination, Will and Maude succeeded in their ranching venture. Land was added to the ranch by purchase and by homesteading on the east side where there had been open range.

Four children were born to this union. They were Clarence, Wilma, Harold and Lloyd. All were born and raised on the ranch. Will passed away in December 1936 of pneumonia. Maude and the boys continued to operate the business until 1946 when Maude moved to Douglas where she lived until her death in June 1980.

Clarence Arthur, born in 1912, was married to Bertie Edwards in 1938. Bertie and Clarence are the parents of three sons, William Arthur, Robert Lee and Paul Thomas.

Wilma Elizabeth, born in 1915, was married to Dale Ballard in 1936. They are the parents of two children, Dale Russell and Marilyn Sue.

Harold Colton was born in 1918 and was married to Alice Beach. They had one son, Larry Colton. Harold died on July 11, 1961.

William Lloyd was born in 1926, was married to Dorothy Jacobs in 1946 and has two children, William Gary and Barbara Jean.

Will's ranch is now in a corporation, being leased by Lloyd Nunn and his son. It is a beautiful, neat, well-kept place. Will's dream certainly did come true. He would be very proud if he could see it today.

Nuttall, William, Jr. and Catherine

In the summer of 1884, Vinton Peterson and his wife, Margaret Hutchison Peterson, came to Wyoming in a covered wagon. They had been married the year before in Keokuk County, Iowa. Vinton was a coal miner and Margaret was a practical nurse. After working a few months in the coal mines in Hanna they came to Glenrock. Their first son, Frank, was born in the fall of 1884. Other children born to the Petersons were Alma, Alice, Elizabeth, John, Carey and Helen.

In 1898 the Petersons moved to Douglas. Vinton worked in the Inez Coal Mine and mined coal along the Platte River north of Douglas. On weekends he walked back and forth from Douglas to the coal mines, sometimes riding the train to Inez on Sunday. In February 1902, he disappeared and was thought to have drowned in the Platte River.

On Thanksgiving 1903, Margaret Peterson and William Osborn Nuttall were married in Douglas. William Jr. was born in a little cabin on Helm Creek south of Glenrock on August 6, 1904. "Doc" Robbins used to jokingly tell Bill "that he was there the day they dipped him out of the creek." Their other son, George Cedric, was born on May 25, 1907 in Douglas.

Supposedly, William Nuttall, Sr. left to visit his relatives for Christmas in Elk County, Kansas in 1906. Neither his family or relatives heard from him again until his death in 1940 in Three Forks, Montana.

L. to r. George and William Nuttall 1916

Douglas by running a rooming house, doing laundry and home nursing. She filed on a homestead which joined her daughter, Alma Elder's ranch.

Bill and George helped their mother prove up on her homestead. They attended the LaPrele Country School and the Douglas School. In 1921 Margaret, along with her daughters, Helen and Alma and sons, John and George, moved to California.

Bill stayed on in Converse County working for various ranchers. Among them were Grandpa Edward Eugene Allyn, Bert Sims, Bill Lindmier, Oliver and Charlie Hitshe, Fred Williams and the Reed Hereford Livestock Company. He was herding sheep for Mike Williams and Ross Barnes during the May blizzard of 1927, being caught out in the storm for two days and one night. He saved himself by lighting a fire to an old pine tree.

Catherine, the daughter of Charles Thomas and Elsie May Seaney Snyder, was born on her grandfather Jacob Seaney's farm near Arnold, Nebraska on May 31, 1907. After coming to Wyoming in 1914 to the Jim Shaw Ranch where her father worked for Mr. Shaw, Catherine lived in Douglas with her family and attended the school system there, graduating in 1924. She acquired her B.A. Degree in Education from the University of Nebraska in 1929 and began teaching in Wyoming.

While teaching in Lost Springs she met Bill whom she had first met in the third grade in Douglas. He was working for Charlie Hitshe at the time of their marriage on August 14, 1932, in Douglas at the Methodist Church. They moved immediately to Catherine's homestead 15 miles northeast of Lost Springs.

In 1976, the British Broadcasting Company documented their story in the film, "Have a Nice Day," taken at the anniversary celebration of Lost Springs.

At the time of this writing they still live on the ranch which has been their home for the last 51 years.

Nylen, Charles and Mary Family

Charles William Nylen was born in Stockholm, Sweden on March 18, 1855 to Gustaf and Anne (Landquist) Nylen. His father was a minister of the gospel who served as a "spiritual adviser" to the King of Sweden, so Charles spent much of his childhood on the palace grounds in Stockholm. His father died in 1893; his mother in 1902, and both are buried in Sweden.

Charles had an adventurous spirit, and did not wish to follow in his father's footsteps, so at age 15 he stowed away on a boat for New York to make his life in the New World. After his arrival in 1870, he spent several months in Chicago, Minneapolis, and Duluth working at farm jobs, in hotels, and briefly on the Northern Pacific Railroad. In 1871 he took a boat down the Mississippi River to Fulton, Illinois and again moved around working on farms and on harvesting crews in Iowa and Minnesota, then returned to the Northern Pacific Railroad as a brakeman. In 1873 he went to work for the U.S. Government as a teamster at Ft. Abercrombie, North Dakota. In 1874 he transferred to Camp Carlin, Wyoming where he had charge of an outfit of mule and wagons for the use of General Crook's expedition against the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians. They were scheduled to rendezvous with General Custer in the infamous Battle of the Bighorn, but the massacre ended before they arrived. Charles remained in the employ of the U.S. Government until 1878 as a messenger for the quartermaster at Camp Carlin.

In July 1879, Charles married Miss Mary E. Butler, daughter of Thomas and Elisa Butler who were natives of Ireland. Her father served in the U.S. Infantry, and while on duty in Arizona was killed by the Indians.

From 1879-1881 Charles served as clerk for the sutler at Camp Carlin. In the spring of 1881, the Nylens moved to Denver and opened a restaurant, but soon disposed of that and took charge of a merchandise establishment in Hartville, Wyoming. During the winter of 1882, Charles opened his own store in Hartville where he remained until 1885.

In 1886, the Nylens homesteaded on the North Platte River about two miles east of Orin Junction on the site of Bridger's Ferry, and established through his homestead and the purchase of additional land that subsequently came to be known as the Orin Livestock Co. Charles and Mary had six children: Alice G., Charles P., Gustaf E.,

"Gus" Nylen on "Teddy Roosevelt" at the 1910 State Fair.

George, James R. and Thomas L., all surviving to adulthood except George, who died in 1888 at the age of four. James R. died Jan. 27, 1937.

After World War I, Charles and Mary Nylen purchased a stately residence in Douglas (since demolished) at 207 N. 4th St. from Governor Richards, and there they remained until their deaths; Mary passing away on Oct. 14, 1926; and Charles on July 16, 1939. The ranching operations at Orin Junction were carried on by the families of the two children who remained in Wyoming, namely Alice, who was married to L. C. "Mose" Gillespie, and "Gus", as he was affectionately known throughout the state. The ranch was sold in 1958 after the deaths of Gus Nylen and both Alice and "Mose" Gillespie.

Gustaf Edward Nylen was born on Dec. 15, 1884 at Camp Carlin, Wyoming to Charles W. and Mary (Butler) Nylen.

"Gus", as he became known throughout his life, grew up on the ranch established by his father about two miles east of Orin Junction. He learned ranching operations from his father, and that remained his lifelong occupation.

As a child he lost the sight in one eye to a slingshot accident, and while still a young man nearly lost a leg in a belt-driven machine accident. None of this, however, kept Gus from becoming an exceptional horseman and a top-notch rodeo saddle bronc rider with many wins to his credit, and an accumulation of saddles, boots, and hats received as prizes.

Gus worked many years of his life as a cowpuncher with nearly all the early day cow outfits from eastern Wyoming to Montana, as well as trail drives from Texas, and later was associated on the ranch at Orin Junction with his father, Charles W. and L. C. "Mose" Gillespie, who was married to his sister, Alice. They succeeded in raising some of the very finest horses for the U.S. Cavalry though their primary business was raising Hereford cattle.

Gus attended public schools in Converse County, and on Sept. 30, 1919, he married Miss Ethel Clanahan, a native of Brownfield, Illinois, who had come to Wyoming as a trained nurse, and was pursuing that occupation when they met. To Gus and Ethel were born four children; daughters Mary Ella, Lois Marie, and Helen Gayle; and one son, William Edward (better known as "Bud") who graduated from the Naval Academy in 1947 in the last accelerated (3-year) class of the World War II era.

After Gus gave up bronc riding as a competitor, he remained active for many years thereafter during the Wyoming State Fair, both as an arena judge and a pick-up man. He also entered several of his fine horses in State Fair races, and won his share of those events.

Gus remained active in the livestock business in varying degrees up to the time of his death in September, 1957.

O'Connell, Daniel V. and Catherine

My father, Daniel V. O'Connell, came to Douglas from Minnesota in late 1919 or early 1920, to be road-master on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. My mother, Catherine F. (Martin), sisters, Margaret 8, Florence 6, and I, Catherine E. 10, followed in May 1920. We were there only eight or nine months when he was transferred to Lusk.

Dad had a house for us on the outskirts of town. Two things greatly impressed us: the great distance we could see and the amount of sand that blew onto the screened porch. Laramie Peak looked to be only an afternoon's walk away with nothing but flat, bare land in between.

We remember little of the town except the park with its bandshell where we often played, and the Catholic Church of which we were members. The only names we recall are those of the three priests: Fathers Adolph, George and Patterson, Mrs. John (Elizabeth) Flynn, who lived in a white house across from the church, and Mr. Trosper, a teacher new to the school that fall.

As the only male teacher, Mr. Trosper was quite a novelty to most of us; also he gave "readings," a second distinction. A third was that in the East, where he came from, dinner was the evening meal, not mid-days as was our custom. We had supper in the evening. This Mother learned, to her chagrin, the Sunday she asked him to dinner, neglecting to mention a time. One o'clock came, then two o'clock and still no Mr. Trosper. She assumed that he had forgotten. He hadn't; he arrived at five o'clock. I don't remember the meal, but I do recall the embarrassment on both sides.

One memory we cherish is that of the little man who took care of the railway station grounds. He sometimes brought a message from Dad to Mother and she often gave him a loaf of her home-baked bread or a freshly baked pie. Every once in a while he would ask if we would be home that evening. If "yes," he would come over, chat with our parents for a time, then, taking a can of shiny new pennies from his pocket and saying, "all right girls," would scatter them across the kitchen floor and watch us scramble for them.

Sometime after we had moved, I came over from Lusk to visit a former classmate. We were walking downtown when we saw this man and I stopped to greet him. He had just bought a cherry pie at the bakery and invited us to go to his home and share it. We did. His home was a boxcar in the railroad yard. He had a small table and one chair. Our "chairs" were up-ended wooden orange crates. He bustled about setting out plates, tin, if I remember correctly, and forks. A happy host to his young guests.

Needless to say, neither of us was very hungry at supper time. I don't recall what answer we gave when questioned, but I remember wondering what my companion's parents would say if we told them we had pie with a little man who lived by the railroad tracks. My parents, I was sure, would understand and approve, but I wasn't sure that her's would.

Dad died on January 16, 1958, Mother on November 8, 1976.

Olds, Charles W. and Ida Family

Charles Olds was born in Milford, New York on February 25, 1865. He married Ida Tefft in 1889 in Lewis, Iowa.

Their children were; Gladys (b. May 7, 1898, married Mark Smith, d. March 18, 1976 and Ralph M. (b. May 25, 1890).

Ralph M. Sr. married Grace Daniels, daughter of J. B. Daniels, December 24, 1910 in Atlantic, Iowa. Two sons were born to them in Lewis, Iowa. They were; Ralph M. Jr., on April 28, 1912 and Gordon L., on August 21, 1914.

Dad's (Ralph Sr.) uncle, Holton Cotten, was a road-bed surveyor from Iowa to Lander for the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad. Uncle Holt was so taken with the Fetterman area that he managed to inspire the Olds to homestead here.

In 1917 grandfathers J. B. Daniels and C. W. Olds, and Dad drove C. W.'s new 1914, 25 hp. Buick Touring car from Lewis, Iowa to Douglas, over 650 miles of dirt roads. (This car had side curtains and leather straps to hold the top to the fenders.) They each filed on a one section claim on Sage Creek, north of Orpha, and built three houses. They hired Al Rice to truck the lumber from Douglas. Nearer Sage Creek they hand dug a ten foot well, rigged it with a pulley and bucket and used a wooden barrel on a horse drawn drag to haul water. Later they would all have "spudder" drilled wells. This land laid north across Sage Creek from the creek to the top of the hill on both sides of the road. Adjoining homesteads were, Wayne Bennett, Carl Williams (now Bill Smith's place), Whitmores, Doyles, Miss Downs (a retired school teacher) and Wilkinsons.

In April, Grandmothers Daniels and Olds, Gladys, Mother (Grace) and her two sons, rode the Northwestern Railroad coach from Lewis, Iowa to Douglas. Mark Smith rode the boxcar to care for the livestock and keep track of things. They had two or three cows, chickens, two teams and wagons, machinery and household goods loaded in at least two of the small boxcars. At Douglas the furniture was loaded on the wagons, including the organ that had survived a Kansas flood. It was rainy and all 18 miles of the road was mud, especially the Morton Lane.

The Ross Road went through the homesteads with Dad's buildings on the east side about halfway up the hill. There were still many string-team outfits hauling freight. An average string-team usually consisted of 22 horses on three wagons and a cooster. The driver slept in the cooster with his personal supplies. One wagon had hay and grain for the horses and the other two wagons carried freight. Fred Manning was one of the Ross string-team freighters as was George Hildebrand. Trucks gradually replaced the string-teams. They were slow, had hard rubber tires, no mufflers and usually gear-bound. Some were Macks, the earlier ones being chain-driven, and a lot of Duplexes, a four wheel drive supposed to be able to haul five tons. One of the Ross truckers, Ralph Randall, had a seven stall garage for his Duplex trucks on the corner of Clay and Second Streets. This was later the sight of the Honey Barn and now is Lyle Hoffman's.

When Dad worked on the Burlington Railroad section crew, Mother would drive a team and wagon to Douglas for supplies. Behind the City Hall were water troughs and a place to unhitch and feed the horses. Upstairs was a kitchenette that the city also furnished for the country folks to use. Mother would get oysters and make oyster stew for her and her sons. Besides the staples Mother got a lot of different dried fruits. Peyton Bolln's delivery "boys" would carry and load the 100 pound sacks of flour and sugar and the groceries into the wagon. It made a very good day for a team to return home that day, 36 miles round trip.

Mother was a good shot thinking nothing of hitting a running jack in the head. Once she picked up her rifle to shoot a rooster to eat while a fellow was there, which was very much against woman's equality. He made a crack about her crippling the thing to death. Mother retorted that she could kill two birds with one shot. When she took aim she didn't have the slightest intention of doing so, the birds not being in line or very near each other. It was one of those freak shots where the bullet split and hit both roosters in the head dropping them dead. Mother calmly picked up her birds and retreated from sight of her wordless, open mouthed adversary to recover from her own astonishment!

We may take it for granted that in the winter a horse pawing through snow to the grass is an instinct. It is not. In Iowa the grass will not cure on the ground, henceforth the Iowa horses they brought to Wyoming would only stand around hungry. The folks had one horse that had been taken to Iowa as a bronc then brought back with them. They taught the Iowa horses to paw for grass.

Dad traded a big draft team, harness and wagon to Mr. Elliot for an Avery tractor, four bottom plow and a disc. This was used to break up about 50 acres of "nigger-wool" sod and plant millet.

Farther down Sager Creek, Grandfather Daniels helped Wayne Bennett build his house. He did all of the masonry and brick work. Grandfather was a professional brick layer. Later this was the house that John and Verbel Hildebrand lived in at their ranch on North Platte. Moving this one and a half story stuccoed building on four wagons, with teams across the sagebrush, was no simple feat.

In 1918, Ralph Jr. started school at the Brown or Hildebrand School, on Werner's land. Nina Bushey was his first grade teacher. To get him to school his folks lived on the Mike Williams' place (Richard Lisco lives there now.) Dad built a big barn and a house for Mike. Later years the barn burned down. In 1921 they tried driving the boys to school from the homestead across country in a Model T Touring car but conditions were too severe.

Around 1920 the rest of the family sold to Dad and returned to Iowa. With three telephone poles, two wagons and teams he moved their buildings to his place. He also bought the Wayne Bennett place and started running two thousand head of sheep. In 1923 Dad sold the sheep to Frank Amspoker and the land to John and Fred Hildebrand. The homestead brought $5.00 an acre. The Hildebrands moved the buildings to their places with horses. Later, Verbel and Donald Hildebrand would sell the place to Eddie Moore. Nothing, not even the root cellars or wells remain to mark the Olds' homesteads.

Dad bought the I. S. Wilson place from C. D. Zimmerman. It consisted of one section, mostly irrigated, for a total price of $12,500.00. This was under the LaPrele Irrigation Project. This place laid west across the road from Lloyd Beach, running north across the highway. The buildings were across the draw from School District No. 20, or LaPrele School, the school being on Dad's land. Later, the LaPrele Community Hall was built beside the school. In the mid 1950s, Ralph and I would move this school house to the 200 block of South Sixth Street in Douglas for Holloway. In the late 1970s, Chet Humphrey moved the LaPrele Hall to the Plains Motel for Wanda Heggund. The I. S. Wilson place had a lot of hay land, both alfalfa and native. Horses were used for all the haying. Dad had a 15-27 cross-framed Case tractor used for plowing and dragging the field. He also had a Cletrac crawler he used for dragging the fields and to run the AtaFeDan Baler. This baler was about the most helpless thing built and at the last, Dad borrowed Jack Schloss' baler. The Schloss family came from Virginia. The hay Dad baled was sold, with most of it Dad and Ralph hauling to town on two hay wagons with two teams. They hauled fifty 100# bales per wagon, two trips a day. It took three days to load the 15 tons, 300 bales in the wooden boxcars. This went to Noland Feed in Casper.

In 1925, Vonnice was born in the I. S. Wilson house. Dr. Storey came out for the birth. Later, Mrs. Dasie Agers, sister of Mrs. Mint Roush, and her six year old adopted daughter, Mary Ann, came from Midwest to stay with mother.

The family lived in the Wilson place seven years, on winter on the Gitthens place, south of Table Mountain, then moved to the Side Hill Place north of Grover Gallaghers. While on the Side Hill Place they farmed the old Maid's 80 acres on shares.

One summer they raised white beans, pulled them by hand and stored them in a house that Dad got by plowing 30 acres for George Warner. All winter they thrashed and sorted beans by hand and traded them to a grocery store at $1.25 per hundred, for groceries.

One evening while coming home in a cart with bagged beans, the quaking aspen tongue broke and the team stampeded, as the double-trees were fastened to the hounds. Ralph, the driver, was jerked onto the tongue between the horses. Their hoofs were pounding beside his head for about 100 feet when he just fell limp. The hoofs and cart all missed him. Gordon and Vonnice riding on the back of the cart, fell off when the tongue broke and none of the three was hurt! The cart swung, breaking the double-trees loose, losing the cart with the team running down a woven wire fence stripping out about 100 feet before stopping. The sacks were scattered but unbroken.

There were many school activities and Mother greatly enjoyed her own 4-H Club. Some of the recalled members names are Afton Beach, Pauline Steiner, Bertha Larson, Margaret Fackler, Marjorie Brown, Maurine Bower, Martha Carlson, Vivian Brown and two Curtin girls.

It was at the Side Hill Place that the web-worms came through, a horde of devouring caterpillars. They turned out for nothing and left a 50 foot swath behind them as bare as a floor. They went through Dad's crop and hay land and the house was in their path. Some invaded the house, but they went completely over the one and a half story building.

Mother burned sagebrush in her cook stove the same as on the homestead. We still have what she called her sagebrush paddle used for pushing the brush into the fire. It resembles an oversized butter paddle.

One summer they lived in Al Sim's house in Downey Park. While they were living there they raised 50 acres of peas on shares for the Kiwanis Club. An excellent crop was raised but just before the harvest, hail took everything. They had been offered $500 cash or a one half crop share. Now they wished that they had heeded the little daughter's advice to take the money.

In 1930 Ralph Jr., after working for Hildebrands, worked for the Mountain Home Co. at Ft. Fetterman. The Mountain Home put a windmill on the soldier's hand dug well and made a barn out of the fort, the fort being the barn walls. Except for the barn and the officers building, all of the buildings were later torn down or moved. Around 1933, Ralph and Gordon worked for the CY or Careyhurst. Wages were $30 a month starting, raising to $35 per month, $.50 a day extra for stacking hay, plus board. Ralph was a hay stacker. Careys fed good, had good horses and equipment. They kept a full time blacksmith to repair the machinery. They used McCormick-Deering tractors for plowing. Ralph first worked at the Pea Green where Sam McFarland was foreman, then two and one half years at the Lower Ranch where Jack Lewis was foreman and the last winter at the Upper Ranch where the main buildings are and Al Johnson was foreman. They put up ice off of Boxelder Creek and usually had trouble getting it thick enough, but that winter it got three feet thick. December, January and February were frigid, with five or six consecutive weeks of 30 degree below nights and 20 degree below days. The Careyhurst store was at the Lower Ranch with Jack Nelms running it. North of the store was a good rock bottom crossing on the river, great for fording but in later years gave the pile drivers building the bridge fits. The store burned down while Ralph still worked for the CY.

When Ralph was 21 he filed a homestead in the mountains south of LaBonte Creek and east of Big Bear Canyon. There were two families living on LaBonte Creek, Ashmeads, nearer the Fetterman Road, and Patricks, where the Curtis Gulch Campground is now. In about four years Patricks moved to Laramie for school. It was five and one half miles from the Fetterman road to Patricks and there were 14 creek crossings or fords. Ralph got a Model T truck and a 1926 Studebaker over this trail. From LaBonte, there was only a pack trail. The last mile, Ralph built a drag trail and using "Colie", an old logging horse on a log drag sled, transported the bigger pieces like the stove and roofing lumber. One still had to pack things up the first half mile up the canyon side as it was too steep for anything else. Once Ralph packed 100 pounds of potatoes clear in, only stopping to rest once. One has to see the country to appreciate this feat. Later, Ralph built a wagon trail east from the Devil's Pass Road. This trail was so rugged that they got the wagon in but had to break it down to a cart to pull it out. Lewis Hinton had a homestead further south and he and his brother-in-law, Harry Isaac, using Model A trucks, trucked through Devil's Pass. One day they were pulling a sheepwagon and it tipped over just east of the pass.

Dad had a great interest in law and would spend hours in Joe Garst's office, the two of them doing nothing but discussing law. If Dad had not been such a "dyed-in-the-wool" farmer, I believe Garst would have successfully made a lawyer out of him.

Dad dealt with George Hildebrand for the River Place which is on a bend of the river north of Douglas, across the river, east of Mortons. Pap (Fred) Hildebrand Sr. filed a homestead claim on this, then changed to a desert claim paying $1.75 per acre and not having to live on it to prove up. The patent was issued on September 24, 1892. He then moved up the river and filed on a homestead in what would become Hildebrand Valley. In 1934, Dad applied for and got a river water right for the land. After he died on January 13, 1938 the family moved to the River Place. Mother also took a desert claim here.

In 1938 Ralph started his general trucking business with a 1934 Ford truck that he got from Gus Race for $100.

In WWII, Ralph served with the 12th Air Force from 1942 to late 1945, serving in England, North Africa, Sicily and Italy.

On January 5, 1943 Gordon married Beth Phinney, the oldest daughter of Brownie and Frances (Bourke) Phinney, in Utah where they were all working in the defense plant. After the war Gordon moved to South Fifth Street in Douglas with the Phinneys. He built his place on Washington Street and started a trucking business.

In 1949, Ralph Jr., Mother and Vonnice also moved from the ranch. Vonnice had her own band, played locally and was a writer. In 1950 Ralph married Leon and Gata Beaulieu's daughter, Leone. After our marriage, we both trucked, moved houses and started a salvage yard on the hill northeast of Douglas.

In the early 1950s the River Place was sold to Lee Peterson who unsuccessfully tried a sprinkler irrigation system. He sold to Jim Sherwin. We moved the Burlington Section House that was on South Second Street, south of the Co-op Elevator to the River Place for him. He sold to Bernice George and she sold to Renfro of Casper. This 176 acres had sold at various time for $10,000, $65,000 and $250,000, quite a bit more than the five dollars an acre of homestead days!

Mother died on December 3, 1976 in Douglas.

O'Leary, James and Mary Family

James and Mary O'Leary arrived in Douglas in April of 1917, with nine of their 13 children. Two children died in infancy. The two eldest sons, Tom and Frank, were married and elected to stay in Iowa with the vast O'Leary holdings.

James and Mary had lived in Osceola, Iowa for 42 years before coming to Wyoming. James was a very successful farmer and a well known railroad contractor. He built many railroads in the Iowa area, doing all the work with horse drawn machinery.

James O'Leary was born in County Wexford, Ireland on May 19, 1851. He married Mary E. Keating, January

12, 1874 in Kewanee, Illinois. Mary was born December 10, 1855 in Rochester, New York.

By 1917 the O'Leary children had grown to young adulthood. They had heard about all the free land to be had in Wyoming. Being very ambitious, prosperous farmers in Iowa, James and Mary could see brighter prospects in the west and decided to travel toward the setting sun to be near their children.

It took ten railroad cars to bring the family belongings to Douglas. James was used to doing things first class with the best materials. So they hauled all they could from Iowa, including all the hedge posts for their homestead properties. The hedge posts are still standing today.

This venturesome family homesteaded on nine sections of Dry Creek flats, 32 miles north of Douglas, the land lying on both sides of Highway 59. Each proved up on his own homestead.

A sad time lay ahead for James and Mary. After being in Wyoming for a year, their youngest son, Edward, was struck down by pneumonia. He died April 10, 1918. He would have turned 18 in June.

When the United States entered the first World War, John Bernard O'Leary entered the service and returned to the homestead in 1919, having seen 18 months of service in France. Then one day in August 1920, John was a victim of a peculiar accident. He was working with a pitchfork when a horse lunged out with its heels and struck the fork, driving the handle through John's ribs. The fractured ribs punctured his lungs. John died within a month, on September 9, 1920.

Mr. O'Leary had been in ill health at the time of his son's death. He died on September 15, 1920, within a week of John's death. He seemed to grieve himself to death over his son.

The O'Learys bought a home in Douglas right where the telephone company is today. They also had a rooming house in back of their home. It is still standing at 217 South Third Street. It is now an apartment house. Mary O'Leary lived out the rest of her life in Douglas. She died April 12, 1924.

Their son, James P. O'Leary, was born in Osceola, Iowa in 1877. He homesteaded at the same time as his folks. He lived 32 miles north of Douglas on the west side of Highway 59 for several years, but the land proved to be barren and unproductive. He learned it was more profitable to lease the land for grazing. He put away his cooking utensils, closed up his homestead shack and moved into town with his sister, Margaret. He became a familiar figure around Douglas. With his keen Irish wit, he became quite a philosopher. Jim was a life long bachelor. James passed away in 1960.

Mayme O'Leary Hunt and Charles Hunt arrived in Wyoming with the O'Leary family. They homesteaded on the east side of the highway where the Barb Estates are now. They made their home there until 1926, when they moved to Cheyenne. In 1927, Charles entered Civil Service and became a fireman at the Fort Warren Post. Mr. Hunt passed away February 14, 1936 in Cheyenne. Mayme remained in Cheyenne until her death. The Hunt's had four sons, Francis, James, Leonard and John. Mayme was born in 1885 and died in 1962.

Margaret O'Leary's homestead was just across the highway from her brother, Jim. After proving up on her homestead she moved to Douglas. In 1918 she became manager of the LaFayette Cafe. What a grand establishment it was, being the center of activity with so many local people and the railroad crews eating there. It was located on North Second Street, where the parking lot is now. It was about three doors south of the corner. Margaret also owned and operated the O'Leary Rooming House until her death on February 2, 1963. Margaret was born in Osceola, Iowa in 1883.

Catherine "Kate" O'Leary was born in 1890 in Osceola, Iowa. She married Merrill Olson May 28, 1918. They lived in Douglas for a short time, then Casper and Riverton. They eventually settled in Lander, Wyoming where the Olsons owned and operated the Olson Dairy for many years. They sold the dairy to their son, Bob. The Olsons ran Hereford cattle on the ranch for twelve years. They then retired and moved into Lander. They had four children, twins Bob and Betty, Jo Anne, and Teresa. Kate passed away in 1980. The Olsons enjoyed a long and happy life of over 60 years of marriage. Merrill died in 1982.

Rose O'Leary was born in Osceola, Iowa in 1892. She homesteaded just west of her parents. She married John Hillman in 1920 and he took up his homestead right next to Rose's. After proving up on their homesteads, the Hillmans moved to Douglas. They lived out their lives at 309 North Second. Rose had a maternity home there. Many babies were born at the Hillman home. Rose wrote the names and dates of the birth on the side of the baby basket and many of those people still live in the Douglas area. The basket was placed on display in the Wyoming Pioneer Museum.

Rose was office nurse for Dr. Hylton for many years. John and Rose took in several old folks at different times caring for them, much like a nursing home. Aunt Rose and Uncle John, as they were fondly known throughout the community, were well known for their interest in children and elderly people. They were both very active in the Catholic Church, helping in any way possible.

John had been associated with several bar establishments in Douglas. At the time of his October 16, 1947, he was employed as a bartender Tavern.

Rose kept on looking after other people and helping wherever she was needed. Rose passed away in 1971. The Hillmans will always be remembered as a very loving, gracious couple.

Angeline O'Leary was born in Osceola, Iowa on May 7, 1894. She married Rhea N. Tillard on September 9, 1919 in Douglas. Angie, as she was fondly known, was teaching the O'Leary School at the time. The school was named in her honor. It was the first country school in District 17. The Tillards had two children, Helen and Rhea A. "Bud." The Tillards ranched on the Cheyenne River (see Tillard story.) Most of the O'Leary homestead properties are still in the Tillard family holdings. Angie passed away June 24, 1980.

Bess O'Leary, the youngest daughter, was born in Osceola, Iowa on December 18, 1896. She married Jim Finnerty on June 27, 1919 in Casper, Wyoming. There were nine children born to this union. The Finnertys made their home in Cheyenne, Wyoming where Jim worked for the Colorado Southern Railroad for 25 years. After his retirement from the railroad, he purchased the "M Bar" Ranch out of Chugwater. The Finnertys operated the ranch until Jim's death in 1972. Their son, Jack, is still on the ranch. Bess died January 21, 1978. The Finnerty's nine children are James P., Irene, Mary, Eddie, Tom, Bob, Jack, Dan and Pat.

The O'Leary family made quite an impact on Converse County and the Douglas area.

Olin, Erick and BIRTHA Family

Erick O. Alund (Americanized spelling, Olin) was born in Sweden on December 25, 1845. He was united in marriage to BIRTHA Wenstrom, who was born October 2, 1855 in Sweden and to this union six children were born: Charles, Ed, Erick L., Hulda and Najma. One child died early in life.

In 1866 Erick came to Texas from Sweden. He was employed there to help load cotton. From Texas he went to Colorado where he found work on railroad construction. Later in Leadville, he worked in the mines in addition to burning charcoal for the smelters. He was often required to help clear the mine shafts after there had been an explosion and cave-in and frequently the rubble contained the bodies of miners who had perished there.

Seven years later Erick set out on a journey to the Black Hills in South Dakota but due to the fact that there was much unrest among the Indians in that area, his journey ended when he reached Fort Fetterman and he was not allowed to continue on. Disappointed, he decided to return to his homeland, taking a bar of silver to use as money on the way. He was unable to exchange it for currency however, so he still had his silver bar when he reached Sweden.

After his arrival he purchased the farm of his brother-in-law, married BIRTHA and settled down. Three of his children were born there. Evidently he became dissatisfied with his life in Sweden since he returned to the United States in 1879 bringing his family and his bar of silver with him. He came first to York, Nebraska where he bought a team and wagon and engaged in the freight business for two years. He then moved nine miles north of Grant, Nebraska where he homesteaded and engaged in farming.

During the next ten years BIRTHA and Erick were the parents of three more children. The farming venture was not very profitable. The summers were, for the most part, hot and dry and his crops were never abundant. Erick then decided that he would move further west into Wyoming. The Olin family came to the Boxelder community south of Glenrock in a covered wagon in 1895. The trip took about three weeks.

Erick filed a claim on Boxelder Creek and built a house of stone there. He worked as a blacksmith in the coal mine at Glenrock for four winters to support his homestead. He also ran a sawmill, raised horses and was credited with having discovered the sample ore which was responsible for the development of the Elkhorn Mine near Glenrock.

Charles was born in 1882 in Sweden, coming to the United States with his parents when he was aged a year and a half. He received his common schooling in the Nebraska and Wyoming rural schools. He took a homestead claim in 1903 near that of his father in the Boxelder area. He engaged in the cattle business with his father and brothers. Charles was never married, passing away in 1963.

The second son, Ed H., was born on November 26, 1885 in Ogallala, Nebraska. He attended school in Nebraska and later in Wyoming. He homesteaded in 1906 taking a claim near that of his father and elder brother, engaging in business with them. He was married to Mary Lucile Williams Bondurant, the daughter of George F. and Stella Beale Williams on October 8, 1960. Ed and Lucile had no children.

Lucile Williams Olin was born in Portsmouth, Iowa. Her first husband, Perle Bondurant, was a member of an early Wyoming family. Perle's father came to Wyoming in 1897 on his way to Oregon. He was delayed a number of times, finally deciding to end his travels and remain in Wyoming. He established a store and post office which bears his name and later homesteaded in Park County in 1904. Mr. and Mrs. Bondurant became the parents of six children.

In addition to his ranching interests, Ed was a director of the First National Bank of Glenrock. He was at one time the president of the Wyoming Pioneer Association. Lucile, as well, belonged to the Pioneer Association and was a member of the WCTU.

Erick L. was born July 26, 1888 in Ogallala, Nebraska. He was educated in the rural schools of Wyoming. When he was of age he took a homestead claim near that of his two older brothers in the Boxelder area where he engaged with his family in the livestock business.

Erick served in the United States Army during the first World War with Company D, 62nd Infantry of the 8th Division. His company was half way across the ocean when the Armistice was signed and so the company was returned to the United States.

Erick was married on September 6, 1959 to Nora Parks Walkinshaw, the daughter of James C. and Elizabeth Perkins Parks. Nora was born in Cheriton, Iowa. She had been married previously to Fred Walkinshaw who passed away in 1956. Fred and Nora were the parents of a daughter, Mildred Mae, who died in infancy. Erick and Nora had no children.

Erick was a director and one of the founders of the First National Bank of Glenrock.

Najma, born on May 9, 1893 in Ogallala, Nebraska, received her education in a rural school in Converse County which was located on land belonging to Fred Grant. The school was located four miles from the Olin home. Najma completed three years of school.

When she was old enough, Najma took a homestead claim near that of her brothers and her sister, Hulda. She was married to Lloyd Huxtable in September of 1921 in Douglas, Wyoming.

Hulda married Vern Spracklen.

The Olin brothers and their father were engaged in the ranching business together until Erick, the father, died. They began their operation in the mountains south of Glenrock on Red Canyon Creek, later extending their holdings to 12,000 acres upon which they ran a herd of 1100 commercial grade Hereford cattle. In addition to their extensive mountain range the brothers owned a ranch near Glenrock.

After the death of their father the brothers purchased his land, the claims of their two sisters and bought the homesteads of Captain White, Pete Virden, Fred Knox, Dave Smyth and the O.D. Ferguson place on Dry Creek near Glenrock. Later they also bought the Higgins land on Boxelder Creek close to Glenrock. The brothers continued in the ranching business until 1963 when they sold the Upper Boxelder holdings, retaining the lower ranch on Deer Creek.

The Olin brothers are remembered with respect in the Glenrock community. They were serious about their business and did not take their responsibilities lightly. They were congenial men, hard-working and thrifty. They developed meadows from some of the bottom land they owned, digging ditches to irrigate them with flood waters. The three boys built a good-sized frame house a couple of miles from the home of their parents, using lumber which they produced at the sawmill. The boys hunted and trapped during their early years of homesteading to help support themselves. The family also raised numbers of horses, both draft and saddle animals for their own use and to sell.

On one occasion the three boys were trailing a black bear which had been killing their stock. Finally the bear went into a cave in a canyon. Now, somehow, the men must entice the bear out of the cave or go in after it. Finally, Erick decided that he would just go in and have a look. He met the bear several yards inside the cave, the bear was on his way out. The bear reared up within about six feet of Erick, its mouth wide open, about to attack him. Erick was able to get off a shot, which, fortunately for Erick, struck the bear in the mouth, killing it instantly. Quipped Erick, "It's no fun, unless it's close."

Once, when Charles was riding a bronc, the horse fell with him. Charles' foot was hung up in the stirrup and the horse, frightened, ran off, dragging Charles with him. Ed, who was riding with Charles, stepped off his horse, shot and killed the bronc and saved his brother from serious injury.

As it is with many family names, the Olin name has come to an end, at least in the United States. Charles never married and Ed and Erick had no children, so the Olin name has no one to carry it on.

Olsen, Per and Heller, John

Per Olsen was born in Boden, Sweden on April 7, 1858, a son of Johann Vosburg's first marriage. He received his education in his native city after which he came to America, arriving in 1879. He lived in St. Paul for a time, leaving there to come to Laramie, Wyoming, where he was joined in 1880 by his half brother, John Heller. For one year, the two brothers were employed in the rolling mills in Laramie, after which they moved to Carbon County, still employed in mining operations until the fall of 1885, when Per went to Buffalo to work in the mining industry for a time.

Later, Per and his half brother migrated to Deer Creek near Glenrock where they discovered the Glenrock Coal Mine and filed on the location containing it. The mine had a six foot seam of lignite coal of superior quality. The brothers worked the mine, selling the coal to neighboring ranchers and townspeople. There was no railroad there at the time, so the coal could not be shipped elsewhere.

In 1887, they sold the property to Baker & Johnston, Cheyenne merchants, and settled on property on Deer Creek, one mile south of Glenrock where they turned their attention to ranching. During the winter months they prospected and mined and during the summer they raised crops of hay and grain.

Among other men, these brothers were progressive, hard working men of industry and intelligence and practical ability. They did much toward the development of the mining and stockraising businesses in the early days of Wyoming.

Onyon, Baxter and Alma Family

Baxter W. Onyon was born in Navenby (Lincolnshire) England on the first of November, 1846, the son of Thomas and Ann Baxter Onyon. Thomas was a cordwainer (a bootmaker who had served his apprenticeship and worked with the better Cordovan leathers.) The family immigrated to the United States in 1850, locating in New Albany, Indiana for some five years, after which they settled in Eagle, Wisconsin.

Baxter Onyon grew up near Eagle and became a carpenter and cabinet maker. There he met Alma L. Sprague whom he married on November 12, 1873. Alma was a teacher.

Five children were born to this union, Jessie Mae, Everett F. (b. August 1, 1876), Chauncey W., (b. May 25, 1879), Willard B. and Mary Leona. The family moved to Harvey, Illinois in 1890 where Baxter built homes for the 1893 World's Fair in Chicago. Several of these homes are in use at this time.

Chauncey and his brother, Everett, worked with their father as lathers, but were not fond of the work. After the fair was over, times were hard and work was scarce. Everett and Chauncey went to the Dakotas to work in the harvest fields in 1895.

The Onyon brothers had been told by Jim Bates, then the Chief of Police in Harvey, that his brother was a station agent at Lost Springs, Wyoming. When the harvest was completed in the Dakotas, Everett and Chauncey, "Chance", went to visit Mr. Bates. There they found employment with Addison Spaugh. Everett was hired as cook and Chance as ranch hand. Both young men took homesteads northwest of Lost Springs.

In August of 1904, Everett discovered sizeable coal deposits northeast of the present site of Shawnee, Wyoming, which later were developed.

By 1908 the Onyon brothers felt that they were becoming well enough established to support wives. Everett returned to Harvey to be married to Sabra Gurnsey of that city on the 25th of June. Chauncey was married to Vera Ocene Anderson of Ionia, Michigan two months later, August 26. Both couples were married in Harvey.

The young ladies were well acquainted before their marriages and were a great help to each other after their arrival in Wyoming. In those days it was not considered fashionable for young ladies to be involved with cooking or finances, so the brides had no cooking skills, learning the hard way. Vera tells of cooking breakfasts for ranch hands, when one of them requested that he would like his eggs cooked more; she took offense and served up the rawest batch of eggs ever served. She said that they ate them and never said a word.

Baxter Onyon and his wife, Alma, also came to the Lost Springs area where they homesteaded, but later they returned to Harvey. Baxter died June 10, 1909, Alma the fifth of December 1910. Both are buried in Harvey.

Everett and Sabra had two children, Laura Belle (b. April 13, 1909) and Frederick Baxter (b. September 22, 1911), both of whom were born in Lost Springs. Chauncey and Vera were the parents of seven children, Alma Elizabeth (1909), Rita (1910), Katherine (1913), Edward Wilson (1914), Paul Chauncey (1917), Wilfred (1918) and Everett C. (1922). All were born at the family home in Lost Springs, with the exception of Rita, who was born in the Douglas hospital.

For the births of her children at home, Vera was attended by the local midwife, Sadie Fenton. A length of rope was tied between the bedposts at the head of the bed. The prospective mother was to pull on the rope to help with the birth.

The washing machine was a large wooden affair, powered by a gasoline engine. One day, Rita got her left arm caught in the wringer. Her arm was mangled to the shoulder. She was taken to Douglas where Dr. Hylton was able to save her arm. She has full use of her arm but carries the scars.

Of interest is the fact that most of the groceries in those days had to be bought from mail order houses, such as Sears & Roebuck and Montgomery Ward. They were of the non-perishable variety, such as dried fruit, beans, flour and canned goods.

In the fall, a steer was butchered, part of it being hung outside on the porch. This arrangement was fine for the cold months, but in summer the family ate corned beef or salt pork. In addition to the red meat, the Onyons raised turkeys, geese and chickens. They also kept a few guinea hens to act as watch dogs to protect the other poultry from chicken hawks.

Chauncey ordered boots and shoes for his family from the mail order catalog. They were very sturdy and practical, but Vera objected since the footwear was not at all similar to what she was accustomed.

Chauncey Onyon, though his home was in Lost Springs, was appointed postmaster at Shawnee February 28, 1911. The office was discontinued April 15, 1912, and the mail drop moved to Lost Springs. From 1913 until 1916, Chauncey was a member of the Wyoming National Guard. He was the chairman of the school board for the district and was instrumental in improving the status of the Lost Springs school to "accredited."

The children of the two Onyon families were particularly close since, in winter during the school year, Laura

Chauncey and Vera Onyon 1909

Belle and Frederick lived in Lost Springs with the Chauncey Onyon family, and in the summer, the children all lived with the Everett Onyon family near the mine.

The Onyons raised some sheep along with their cattle and horses. The children would tease the rams. When Aunt Sabra went to hang her washing on the line, the rams would butt her. They also had a billy goat which they kept to protect the sheep from the coyotes. The children would hitch the billy goat to a cart and drive him around. When the goat tired of this, he would leap through a barbed wire fence and leave the children stranded, scratched and bleeding from the barbs. They tracked pack rats to their nests, examining all the trinkets which the rats collected.

Frederick and Katherine were the great hunters and kept the family supplied with rabbits using single shot rifles to bag their game.

The children also spent many hours riding up and down the railroad track from the mine to Shawnee, using a hand car which their parents owned.

In the early 1920's, a severe blizzard put the Onyon brothers out of the livestock business. Everett and his family returned to make their home in Harvey, Illinois in 1925. Chauncey Onyon moved to the oil field at Midwest to work and to pay off his debts, one of which was owed to Mr. Fogarty who operated the grocery store in Lost Springs. When Mr. Fogarty moved his grocery store to Casper, he found an out-dated check under the drawer in his cash register. The check has been written to him by Chauncey Onyon. Later, Chauncey went to Casper to pay Mr. Fogarty the amount of the check.

Chauncey Onyon and his family left the Salt Creek oil field in 1929 and returned to Harvey, Illinois to make their home.

Everett F. Onyon died in 1960, his wife, Sabra, in 1964. Chauncey died in 1958, his wife, Vera, in 1970. All are buried in Harvey, Illinois.

Ormsby, Major and Jessie

Major Ormsby was born in Pennsylvania in 1869, the son of Leander Ormsby. He grew to manhood there, migrating to Arlington, Nebraska in the late 1880's. He was united in marriage to Jessie Ann Fink of Arlington on July 24, 1895. Jessie was a native of the town, having been born there on January 25, 1875. Five children, Orland, Helen, Lawrence, Roland and Alice were born to the couple in Casper, Wyoming.

Eventually Ormsby homesteaded in western Converse County, taking isolated unadjoined tracts to make up his 320 acre claim. His home place, called the Spearhead, was located on one 40 acre tract. The original house he built was destroyed by fire and was replaced by a new dwelling in 1915.

In 1913, Major Ormsby built his town home located on Center Street in the city of Casper. He entered into a business relationship with Frank G. Scherck and together they erected a four-story office building located between Wolcott and Center Streets. This building, called the O-S

Building was managed by Ormsby and Scherck for several years. Ormsby's son, Orland, was associated in that business.

By the year 1916, Ormsby had acquired a sizeable amount of land which he sold to Herman Werner, retaining his Spearhead headquarters and some 2000 acres of land. A year later, Ormsby sold this to Mr. Werner.

Due to Major Ormsby's failing health, he and his wife were obliged to move to Phoenix, Arizona in 1941. He disposed of his interest in the O-S Building to his son, Orland. Later the building was purchased by Dr. N. E. Morad, a Casper physician.

Major Ormsby was one of Casper's most prominent businessmen for over a quarter of a century. The Ormsby Road, which branches off the Casper-Midwest highway north of Casper, was named for him.

Mr. Ormsby died in 1948 in Phoenix but was interred in a cemetery in Casper. Jessie Ormsby returned to Casper to make her home with her daughter, Helen, until her death on May 30, 1952. One son, Roland, preceded his parents in death, leaving to survive the Ormsbys four children, ten grandchildren and nine great grandchildren.

Owen, Ross and Blanche Family

Ross Owen and Blanche Warriner were married on September 6, 1908 in Franklin, Nebraska. Ross was working as a carpenter and cabinet maker. They built their first home there.

Clinton and Clora were born in this house.

Ross and Blanche could see that it was going to be hard to live there and continue in that trade so they moved to Central City, Nebraska.

After living in Central City, Nebraska the winter of 1916-17, Ross and two other carpenters shipped their furniture to Douglas and homestead on three sections of land just off Fiddleback road about 46 miles north of Douglas.

The only place Ross and his two friends could find to live in Douglas was the old Haslam Carpenter Shop.

Blanche, and their children, Clinton and Clora went to Franklin where Clinton finished his school grade. Clora had been going to kindergarten in Central City but finished up the year in the first grade.

In June 1917, Blanche, Clinton and Clora moved to Douglas. The two carpenters' wives had taken one look at the crowded, wet town of Douglas and shipped their furniture back to Nebraska.

Ross worked as a carpenter off and on here in Douglas and with Bernie Ford they built his and Bernie Ford's shack up on the Cheyenne River.

Ross also worked in Henry, Nebraska that first summer. Clora got rheumatic fever that summer so Ross rode the freight home to Douglas. They didn't move to the homestead until the spring of 1918.

They used creek water for washing but hauled their drinking water from the Fiddleback shearing pens. They were about five miles south of the section that Ross had. They had two wooden vinegar barrels. Bernie Ford had whiskey barrels. They always had to keep the barrels soaked up or they would leak.

Ross' sister, Carrie, and her husband, Dr. Charles E. Cross, and sons came out in 1918. They filed on the section that cornered the one that Ross had. They built their house just northwest of the shack Ross had.

Charles L. Owen (Grandpa) came out and filed on the section just north of the Ross Owen place. Each had shacks on the three corners. No one stayed on the homestead that winter of 1918-1919.

They all moved out in the spring of 1919. By this time, Ross and Blanche had acquired a team and wagon.

The fall of 1919 Carrie Cross taught her two youngest boys, Donald and Charles, and Clinton and Clara. She taught in Grandpa's shack.

Dr. Cross and son, Owen, had moved back to Franklin for the winter where he practiced dentistry and Owen went to high school.

Clinton, Clara, Donald and Charles were picking potato bugs and the leaves with eggs on them off of the potato plants. They had coal oil in their syrup buckets to kill the bugs. They got some matches and decided to burn the bugs. The barn, harness and saddle and a little of the hay went up in smoke. All four children were scared, but safe.

One of the worst jobs was cleaning the chicken house. The bark made a good place for the mites to hide. Mother usually had a tub of water ready for Clinton and Clara when they got through.

Dr. Cross did some dental work for people who needed it. Mr. and Mrs. Jake Riehle and twin baby boys came from their place with a team and wagon. Also, Mrs. Schick brought her daughter, Anna, over in a wagon to have a tooth fixed. The doctor used a grinder that ran with a foot pedal.

Dr. Cross had purchased a truck that summer. He very seldom made it to town and back without stopping to grind the valves or clean the spark plugs. That truck worked fine on level ground and in dry weather. It had hard rubber tires on the back.

One morning Ross noticed a shack across the road at his southeast corner. The section was the one east of his and just north of the timber road. The fellow's name was Thomas Holdsworth, a painter by trade. He had a small kitchen and a one stall barn all together. When Ross rode up, "Old Tom" was busy cutting up two dead horses out of the stall. He was cutting them up with an ax and carrying the pieces out of the kitchen door. Tom hadn't turned the horses loose because he couldn't catch them. He had run out of oats so he fed them pinto beans. He said, "You know they just didn't relish the beans. They died."

Ross could never remember Thomas Holdsworth's name so they all got to calling him "Old Tom, Mr. Beans." The name stuck.

Perry and Ada Burden moved into their log building across on their southwest corner. They later moved just south and west of the Cross house.

Ross' brother, Noble Owen, homesteaded across the corner south of Thomas Holdsworth's house. It had a small shack on it. The land ran along the south side of the road to the timber. Will and Marg Wagoner had land southeast of Uncle Noble's land.

That fall, Ross built the Pleasant Hill School on a hill just east of Tom Holdsworth's shack. Flora Wollen was the first teacher. Early in the fall she had Donald and Charles Cross, Howard and Bob Wagoner, Clinton and Clara Owen, and Harold, Elsie and Faye Baker. Only the Owen and Baker children finished up the season. Orville Pellatz taught several years after Flora Wollen stopped.

In the winter of 1921 or 1922, Elsie Baker was killed when her horse fell on her. That next summer, Faye died of diphtheria. Marie Baker died of the same disease. After that, Harold either moved away or quit school.

The Pleasant Hill School was moved in 1925 just west of the Owen house on the Perry Burden place. It was later moved to Verse where Clara taught in it and was later moved to the Dry Creek Community School and used as a teacherage.

A.E. Hyde was the first County Agent and started the Dry Creek Ladies Club. Many new ideas were brought to the wives of the homesteaders. Blanche was the first president.

One Fourth of July, the Dudleys had a ball game in the afternoon and a dance in the evening. The Owens went in their team and wagon and stayed a while for the dance the Curry boys and Buster Goodrich played at. That night it rained some and then turned to snow. The only one warm was Mr. Shrader who had a long cow hide coat on.

The Fiddleback had a telephone line along the road from Douglas to the ranch on the Cheyenne River. Ella Featherston got permission from Carroll Mohr, the manager, to have a phone. The neighbors would call Ella and she could change phones and call town. This helped a lot when they needed supplies sent out by mail or someone was sick.

Most everyone had phones which worked on the top wire of the fences. Over gates and at the corners there were high poles with a wire running between them. Everyone had a different ring. Bill Barker liked to call everyone at night and play his fiddle over the phone.

The Blackmans and Dorrs had the first radio. The Blackmans would call on the line and people would listen to the pretty music. One night, Carrie Cross sang over the Hastings, Nebraska station. The Blackmans had everyone trying to listen that night.

The fall of 1925 brought a big change to the Owen family. Ross' mother, Clara M. moved out from Franklin Nebraska to live in Douglas. Clinton and Clara moved into town to live with their grandmother and go to high school.

Rosina Margaret was born on September 1, 1925 to Ross and Blanche.

The next year Clinton and Clara stayed with Grandma Clara Owen but when Will Bernhard and Ross added a long room onto Grandpa's shack, Grandma moved to the ranch.

Clinton and Clara worked for their board and room the last two years of school.

When Clinton was 21 he took a homestead around different places. Some of the land was north of the Cross land among the Rife land.

Ross and Blanche bought part of the Wagoner land and Rife land. They also bought Tin-Can-Lake from the Fiddleback. It had originally been bought with Civil War script. Ross died of cancer on January 28, 1958.

Clinton got the Charles L. Owen land after Grandmother broke her hip and they moved her to live with Uncle Noble in California. She and Charles L. both died near Santa Rosa where Noble had a cottage court and worked as a cook in the hospital.

Blanche stayed on at the ranch until 1960 when Clinton bought their land and the Cross place. She lived in apartments here in Douglas several years and lived with Clara for two and one half years and was in Michael Manor for almost five years. She died on November 23, 1973.

Noble now lives by himself in Santa Rosa, California. Laura Schrader lives with Rosina Owen Bernhard in San Jose, California and Clinton and Anna Lynch Owen live in Douglas. Clara and her husband, Durward Robertson, also live in Douglas.

Parker, Harry, Emma and Carolyn

One day in mid September 1915, a stocky man in his early 30's got off the C&NW Train at Lost Springs, Wyoming. He introduced himself as Harry Parker from Ohio, in search of land to homestead in Wyoming. His reason was that his wife had a bronchial problem.

Among the first people he met were Albert L. Hoge and his father, Ras Baughn (who helped people find suitable land), Henry McGowan (also known as "Sugar Foot-Shug" because of his odorous feet) and Mr. Brink and his wife who ran a family rooming house known as "The Bee Hive."

A few days later Mr. Baughn loaded Dad and some camping gear into a wagon, and they were off to look at land. The first night they made camp, he was introduced to the typical bed roll, a tarp, pillow and some quilts. He learned that was standard equipment for all cowboys and others who spent time in the out-of-doors. About this time he heard a loud dog-like noise. He told Mr. Baughn that they must be near someone's house. Mr. Baughn suppressed a laugh and told Dad that it was a coyote and what a coyote was.

In the next few days, they found a place that suited Dad. He went to Douglas, where the Land Office was, filed on the land, told the people he would see them next spring, and went back to Ohio to work in the coal mine where he had worked for several years.

My grandfather, Mother's dad, besides having a large farm, also had an agency for farm machinery and helped Dad get some things he knew he would need: a walking plow with a wooden beam, a harrow, disk, mower, and wagon. The next April, 1916, he rented what was termed an "Emigrant Car" from the railroad. He loaded all of our belongings, including four milk cows into the car. About this time a single man Dad knew in the mine wanted to get away. His name was Wm. H. Abels. They weren't rich so Dad stowed him away in the car and brought him along. He homesteaded a place about a mile from where Dad built the house. The place was about three miles north of Flat Top.

Around April 16, my mother, Emma (Way), arrived in Lost Springs with a ten month old baby in her arms. That is me, Way E. Parker. That summer we lived in a tent a little ways up the hill from where Dad and Mr. Abels were building the house. That first summer was quite an ordeal for my mother, who had always lived in a fairly nice place with lots of people close by. That summer, Mr. George Parks with his wife and two small children built a house about half a mile northeast of our place so Mother had one woman she could see.

Parker homestead house

It happened that our place was exactly at the cross-roads of the two major trails through that country. Therefore, we had most of the cowboys in eastern Wyoming come by sooner or later. One day when my mother was over at the Parks, one "Toothless Bill" Campbell came by after a little too much liquid refreshment in Douglas. Dad told him that milk was the best hangover remedy and went into the little cave we had and got a pan of milk and gave Bill several glasses. Every swallow he complained of the terrible taste, but if Dad said it would help—down the hatch. That evening my mother asked Dad what had happened to that pan of sour milk she was aiming to make cottage cheese of.

By fall the house was done—it was logs, 16x26 feet, and a story and one half high. Dad bought lumber for the gable ends and roof with three "V" crimp red iron roofing. The house was supported by several large pitch pine posts.

About a half mile from our house, which is now owned by the family of Willard Hoffman, there was a little house which belonged to an old country German bachelor carpenter. One evening, the fall of 1916, Dad saw a big fire over that way but it didn't look like the house so he didn't pay any more attention. "Dutch John" Wilkes was never seen again. A few years later Charley Crosley happened to dig through a pile of ashes and found the burned remains of a double hernia truss, the very kind John was known to have worn.

In the spring of 1917, a single man by the name of John Tipton acquired that place and started farming it. He proved to be a good neighbor and one of my favorite people. My other favorite person at this very young age was the Al Hoge I mentioned earlier. He had a place about two miles down the West Fork of Twenty Mile Creek.

On the evening of November 9, 1917, Dad was building a barn. About five, Dad stepped into the house to tell my mother that he was going after the milk cows. What he saw was my mother lying on the floor with me tugging at her clothes and holding my coat in one hand. I wanted to go see my dad. He thought at first that she had just fainted. He ran up on the hill toward Tipton's and yelled to John for help. He came over immediately and right away said, "Harry, she is gone." Later it was figured out she had what was then called inflammatory rheumatism now known as rheumatic fever that had damaged her heart.

Dad left me with John, whom I liked real well. He had a grown family so he knew how to care for a two year old.

Dad rode about six miles over to the Marion Whitings with whom we had become well acquainted and somehow even then they had a phone. He called the proper people in Douglas where my mother's body was taken and prepared for burial which was to be in Ohio in the plot with my brother who had lived only a few hours. He would have been about a year and a half older than I was if he had lived. After the funeral, Dad left me with my mother's older sister for a while and came back west alone for the time being.

My very well meaning grandfather, Mother's dad, had what might be called a woodshed session with Dad. He tried to get Dad to sell out what he had in Wyoming and come back to Ohio, but Dad just wouldn't hear that. Grandfather also pointed out that it would be terribly difficult for a man alone out there to try to farm and raise cattle and raise a small boy at the same time. He also had a wife all picked out for Dad, his favorite niece Carolyn Sheldon, who was a practicing Doctor of Osteopathy, having graduated from the school in Kirksville, Missouri. For various reasons, she wanted to get away from the East too. Anyway, it was arranged by mail, and she picked me up at my aunt's and brought me to Douglas where they were married before she even saw the ranch. It was a romanceless marriage for business reasons, but they stayed together until Dad's death in 1951.

She had her diploma and Ohio license in similar frames, and they were hung on the wall where they remained until they sold the ranch to Paul Williams in 1946. They then returned to "Good Old Ohio" as Dad referred to it.

Mom, as I called my stepmother, was an old maid doctor from the East and eleven years Dad's senior. Because of her age and background I don't think she ever got "climatized" to the West and western ways. She never even tried to take out a license in Wyoming but she practiced considerable from the ranch. She delivered a number of babies; the three youngest Crosleys, Jess, Agnes and Thelma; and one of the Dickau girls, Ila Mae, if I remember correctly. She set at least one broken arm for Daryl Alsup, Jim Valentine's cousin, and gave innumerable spinal manipulation treatments. Once she was even called to ride a saddle horse about five miles through the timber with the Spellman girls to treat their mother who had been struck by lightning. She was burned some but with a little time, completely recovered to live many more years.

Ordinarily, men stopped, one or two at a time, but once, I well remember was different. I believe it was Thanksgiving Day 1919. We heard something, looking west around the end of a hill came more cattle than I knew there were in the whole world. It was Dick Pfister's fall roundup, about four hundred cattle. It was a dreary day and Dad almost insisted that they bed the cattle in the lea of a crescent shaped strip of jack pines above the house and stay the night. I still remember Dick sitting on his horse, looking all around at the lead colored sky. He then asked the men if they would like to sleep in a house for a change. There was a yell of approval. It turned out they were there four nights. A northwest wind blew in a full blown blizzard during that night. To a four year old boy that was a party. The roundup cook practically took over the cooking and almost everything came from the well stocked chuck wagon, including fresh beef they had recently butchered. The men helped Dad with the chores, did the wood cutting and whatever else they could. One of the men was a pretty good "second" on the pump organ and Dad had done a lot of old-time dance fiddlin' so we had a concert every evening. I woke up each morning in time to see 19 bed rolls in the process of getting rolled and put up for the day. When the storm finally broke and the cattle started to move, the men saddled up and Dick had the cook bring us in a very large piece of that beef, keeping just what he would need to get them to Manville.

In the spring of 1918, Crosleys moved into their house which was about a mile from ours and on the hillside. This made it in sight of our house a feature which turned out to be mutually beneficial. They had seven children of which Dorothy (Reese) was just a baby at that time. Willard was just a little older than I. Then there were Raymond, Gladys (Herrick), Harry, Ervie and Delbert, the oldest. We soon got a school house built, the "Twenty Mile" School it was named. In that one room school building over a period of years a lot of us got more or less our grade school, including the eight older Crosleys, Howard and Curtis Hanson, Jim Valentine, Freda, Merlyn and Wendell Crawford, that I remember. As it happened, 1927-1928 was the last year of school held there. The total enrollment was two eighth graders, taught by Mrs. Zelta Baughn. The graduation class was James Otis Valentine and yours truly.

During the first few years after the end of World War I there was a large increase in the population of the neighborhood. Several were recently discharged veterans; Walter Dickau and his wife, her single brother, Harry Hoffman, who later married Etta Reed; Jake Reed and family; Andrew "Dude" J. Young and family; Harry Crawford and family; William Mann whose wife, Opal, was a relative of Mrs. Crawford; Roscoe Baughn, a bachelor who, years later, married Zelta Wintermote, the teacher previously mentioned; James Herrick and his wife; Ulysses Grant Evans, "Preacher Evans"; and Julius Conner and family. Of the early arrivals most stayed, but some found they didn't like the country, or fit, or for some reason stayed only a few years. George Parks stayed only two summers. An elderly couple by the name of Metz homesteaded just north of us and stayed only a short time. Another family of note was a Lutheran Minister, Hans Hanson. He and his wife had three children; Mildred, who later married "Slip" Chambers of Douglas, Howard, and Curtis. They came in 1918 and settled just south of Al Hoge. They stayed only a year or two then went back to eastern Nebraska where Rev. Hanson died. The three children spent a period in a church home in Lincoln, Nebraska then in the spring of 1923 Mrs. Hanson brought the children out and married Al Hoge. They lived in his place until her rather untimely death in January 1934, I believe.

In about 1924 then County Ag Agent A. E. Hyde got us to start 4-H clubs; the girls had a sewing and cooking club and we boys chose corn and pig projects. The one who really worked at the pig project was Louie Meinzer. I chose corn; planted and hoed my acre of corn. I was doing reasonably well to a point, then some of our fence crawling cows got tired of the dried grass and tore down the fence; and, you guessed it, proceeded to make a mess of my cornfield. About two years of that and I gave up on corn and 4-H in general.

In May 1922 it rained for two days and then the wind changed to the northwest and for two more days we had one of the worst spring blizzards to hit in many years. While we were trying to assess the damage a man and boy rode into the ranch. He introduced himself as Ray Valentine and his son Jim. That was the start of a buddy acquaintance that lasted for several years. He and I were into and out of quite an assortment of endeavors; nothing bad, but sometimes funny. One happened on a day he, Merlyn and Wendell Crawford, Jim's cousin, Daryl Alsop from Manville, and I decided we would be rodeoers. In the process of trying to ride a big yearling or two year old steer, Daryl broke his arm. The next stop was Parkers to have Mrs. Parker set his arm.

About the only thing I accomplished that I can point to with pride is the job I did of breaking and training a horse. In the spring of '25 Dad gave me a mare colt. Dad also had her half brother. I had been taught that the way to have a good horse was to first gentle, then break and train it. I started gentling those two colts when they were about a week old. Dad sold the gelding but almost two years later he was still not paid for and just running loose so we went to repossess him. Two young boys had been trying to ride him some. All they had succeeded in doing was getting him just plain spoiled and causing three cinch sores a foot long, so I rode him home bareback. I promptly started to rehabilitate him into a good horse instead of a spoiled brat. I was progressing when school started so I had less time for horses. It came threshing day at our place, the machine was owned by Walter Dickau and Harry Hoffman. Walt was standing on the machine when he saw me walk up behind Sally, speak, put my hands on her rump and jump aboard, and ride her to where I kept my tack. He told Dad he had promised his children a horse when he could find a suitably gentle one, and Sally was it. He offered Dad the preposterous price of $25, premium for that time. That was the fall of 1929, in case anyone remembers. Dad offered me a trade, the gelding, Tom I called him, for Sally so he could sell her to Walt, so I traded. Years later Walt told me that was the best investment he had ever made - she had half raised his whole family. They had her nearly 20 years till the blizzard of 1949. When I left, I gave Tom back to Dad and he still had him when he sold the ranch in 1946.

Jim Valentine decided not to go to high school but I did. The first year the bus was driven by Charley Crosley and carried the six younger Crosleys, Merlyn and Wendell Crawford, Paul Mann, Florence Johnson, the Turners who lived just north of Shawnee, the Millers, who lived west of town, besides this writer. That winter we had quite a lot of snow and the ever present wind so we older boys got a lot of practice with scoop shovels. The next year, Horace Nelson drove the bus, about the same load except the families nearer town had a third route which shortened our end several miles. Not too much snow that winter, but we had enough cold to make up for it. One stretch it stayed in the 40 below range for a number of days. The third year Harold Cram drove without major problems. My senior year, Charley Crosley drove again and that wasn't too bad but we did get drifted in a few times. The graduating class of '32 consisted of; Irene May Price, Hugh Kornegay, Marvin Nelson and last, yours truly.

The next year I went to Douglas where there was a college extension post grad normal class. In '34 it was the middle of the drought and middle of the great depression. Money was scarce so I joined the CCC for 16 months. Then I taught two terms. I worked at Seminole Dam during the summer, where I was introduced to industrial construction.

That is where I ultimately made a career of some 40 years which took me to every western state except Nevada and Louisiana, plus two years in Libya. I was there before and after the take over by Colonel Muammar Kadaffi, but that is another story.

On June 3, 1938 I married a girl from Hartville, Theodora Brott. We raised five children; Patti W. Kirst, born in Guernsey, March 4, 1940, now retired Captain USAF in Boerne, Texas; Samuel R., born in Guernsey, December 8, 1941, now in communications electronics, Fairbanks, Alaska; Fern L. Francois, born in Ontario, Oregon, April 9, 1944, accountant, Longmont, Colorado; Fredrick A., born August 10, 1949 in Casper, now a Major USMC, Springfield, Virginia; and Linda K. Parker born in Casper, June 25, 1954, interior decorator, Bend, Oregon.

When Patti was five we decided we should settle down for several years, at least for the children's schooling. We bought a place near Casper which was the family home until 1968. There are three grandchildren; Larry D. Johnston, 19, Fern's son by a former marriage; Derek, 12 and Kristen, 8, Fred's children. The children's mother passed away February 8, 1974. We had been separated for several years and both remarried. My second wife since July 1, 1966, passed away January 26, 1984, after being almost totally helpless and suffering for a little more than six years. At this writing I am still trying to play "Rip Van Winkle" and wake up in the world I now live in after having had to retire to care for her almost entirely by myself.

Partridge, Robert and Roxana T.

I think it was about 1915 when my husband's older brother, Elbert Partridge heard that there was land in Wyoming which could be homesteaded. He was not married and had a friend, Will Osgood, also not married. They both decided to go to Converse County, Wyoming and apply for a homestead. They were so pleased with the country that they wanted my husband to come out there, too. We were living in Kansas, where we owned a 160 acre farm on which we raised wheat and alfalfa, but we decided that we could keep that and still go to Wyoming and apply for a homestead there. We had two little girls, Pearl two years old, and Ula just six months old.

So in the fall of 1918 after my husband had planted the wheat in Kansas we left by train for Orin Junction, Wyoming. Robert's brother Elbert came back to Kansas to stay with their mother, who had been living with us, while we were living in Wyoming. We left our Model T Ford car for them to use. We used a team of horses and a spring wagon for transportation all the time that we lived there.

This is the land that we homesteaded: Section 34, T32N, R.70.W.

At this time in order to prove up a homestead we had to follow these conditions. We had to put up fencing, build a house and live there for seven months out of the year for three years. So we followed these conditions.

Elbert Partridge, being a carpenter, built us a two room house which was ready for us when we came out in November of 1918. We came in to Orin Junction by train and a neighbor met us and took us out to our place.

This was the year of the bad flu epidemic and the first night that we were there, Robert and I both came down with the flu. We finally got a doctor to come out from Douglas to see us. He told us that we would have to go to the hospital in Douglas, so he just loaded us into his car and as there was no one to take care of the little girls, they just had to stay with us in the hospital, although they were not ill. That was quite an introduction to Wyoming, but we both recovered and were able to go out to our new home.

We enjoyed those three winters that we spent in Converse County, Wyoming. We would plant the winter wheat crop in Kansas, then head for Wyoming, live there until May, then go back to Kansas to harvest the wheat that had been planted in the fall. Before we left Wyoming in May, my husband would plant carrots, potatoes, a little corn and beans, and these would be ready to harvest when we got back in the fall.

Our house was small but comfortable, and we enjoyed the time that we spent there, it was almost like a vacation. We kept busy with our daily chores. We liked to put the baby in her cart and go for walks over the hill and one day while out for a walk, I found a five dollar bill. I had no idea where it came from as we had no close neighbors; the wind must have blown it in, as we had plenty of that. Sometimes my husband and I played horse-shoes, or we would do some target practicing with the rifle, (the first that I had ever handled a gun). And we read quite a lot. Once in a while we would drive four or five miles to visit a neighbor or they would come to visit us. We went to Orin for our mail and maybe to get a few groceries. My husband often walked there as it was only three or four miles. One morning he decided to walk there for the mail and when he got there they told him it was 60 degrees below zero, but he hadn't minded the walk and didn't know it was so cold.

Once in a while we drove to Douglas for supplies (I think this was about twelve miles) so with the teams and wagon it was an all-day trip. We bought canned milk by the case and other groceries in quantity, for we didn't often make the trip. The highlight of the trip, for me at least, was our visit to the library. We would check out books to last until our next trip, even children's books which I read to Pearl, the older girl, and even the little one learned to like the stories. She tells me what she remembers most was that she was so scared when the coyotes howled at night. Of course she was only three years old the last year that we lived out there. The older girl, Pearl was five and would be ready for school, so it was time for us to prove up on our homestead and stay in Kansas. When our son George was born in 1922, we were wanting to go back to see our place. When he was four years old we planned a vacation, drove the Ford out there, stayed a few days at the ranch, then drove to Yellowstone National Park. That was a nice trip which our family always remembered. When the girls had to write an essay for English at school, they would write about this trip, tell about our place and of course about Yellowstone Park.

Through the years we were busy on the farm in Kansas, and putting the children through school. Both girls live here at Osborne, Kansas. Pearl is a registered nurse, Ula lives on a farm, but also worked for twenty-five years as a nurse's aide at our hospital. George was in the Army and was wounded in World War II, then after living as a civilian for three years he re-enlisted and spent twenty more years at Ft. Bliss in the Army, then in work under Civil Service.

We have never forgotten Wyoming and kept our land there. Most of the time it has been leased to a neighbor, George Carmin, for grazing cattle. Also part of the time it has also been leased for oil.

In 1946 my husband Robert died and by this time the children were grown so I sold the Kansas farm and moved to Osborne to be near my daughters. I wanted our son George to have the Wyoming land, so I deeded it to him, and although he still lives in El Paso, Texas, and is retired, he plans to make a trip to Wyoming in the future to see the land. He does keep in touch with George Carmin as he still leases the land for grazing.

Patterson, Taylor and Kate

Taylor Patterson was born in Georgetown, Kentucky. He married Catherine "Kate" Wise, the daughter of William Wise. Kate was born on November 6, 1850 in Georgetown, Kentucky.

In his reminiscences, Edward E. Cushman, son of Elizabeth Newell Cushman, told the following about Patterson, "Taylor Patterson, a bullwhacker of the old school who, when a boy, was stolen from home and raised by the Indians. Upon occasion he would demonstrate with a butcher knife the technique of the Arapahoe and Sioux in the gentle art of scalping. While but a boy he escaped from the Indians, hiding the first day of their search for him in a pond, his head above the leaves of a lily pad."

Patterson received a patent for lands on LaBonte Creek on June 7, 1893. These lands are now owned by Charles and Shirley Forgey. Water rights were issued on these same lands on May 1, 1887 and in 1889.

Taylor and Kate had one son, Luke (b. July 25, 1875 in Leavenworth, Kansas, d. April 28, 1935), and one daughter, Anna (b. December 16, 1878 in Leavenworth, Kansas, d. December 28, 1925). Luke had a barbershop in Douglas in his later years. Anna married Joe Dunn.

Taylor died on July 8, 1910; Kate on April 9, 1931.

Patzold, O. A. and Ida

Joseph and Sophia Patzold, natives of Germany, were the parents of nine children, the youngest of whom was O. A. Patzold. In the early 1840's, Joseph and Sophia, in the company of Joseph's older brother, sailed from Germany to Galveston, Texas, finally finding permanent residence in the then distinctively German city of Cincinnati, Ohio. Joseph was a skilled artisan in cabinet making, having followed that trade all of his life. He was for many years a stockholder and manager of the Cabinet Makers' Union which did an extensive manufacturing business and in which he was employed at the time of his death in 1876.

O. A. Patzold was born in Cincinnati on August 2, 1870. He attended both grade school and high school there and furthered his education at an excellent commercial college. After he completed his studies he was associated as a bookkeeper for three years with the Campbell Coal Company, after which he moved to Denver. There he entered the employ of the Halleck and Howard Lumber Company, continuing there for seven years as an accountant, after which he was retained for several years by the receiver of the United Coal Company. He came to Glenrock in 1898 at the request of the Glenrock Coal Company to become their general agent, a position which he held for many years.

On June 27, 1893, Mr. Patzold and Miss Ida Burns of Denver were united in marriage. Miss Burns was the daughter of the Honorable D. V. Burns, judge of the District Court of Denver District of Colorado.

Mr. Patzold was associated with the Slaughter-Patzold Sheep Company which conducted extensive sheep business on the Platte River below and north of Glenrock and in the mountains south of Glenrock on Box Elder and Willow Creeks.

Mr. Patzold was an enterprising business man, active in commercial and industrial activities of Wyoming; a man of energy and ability, highly respected, very progressive and prosperous. He was a popular, well-thought of individual in the community in which he lived and served.

Paull Family

William Paull, a tall broad-shouldered man and his youngest brother, John Paull, a short heavy-set fellow, were among the early day freighters who blazed the trails for the West and saw that the salt-side bacon and cases of canned tomatoes reached their destination in the new territory of Wyoming in spite of the Sioux.

Of Scotch descent, the Paulls were among the early settlers of Virginia. William Paull Jones, the planter, who served with Major George Washington's battalion of Virginia Provincials in the Braddock expedition was reputed to be related to the John Paull family of Virginia. John Paull, who lived in Virginia, married Margaret Campbell and they had two sons; William and John C.

John C. Paull was born in Virginia in 1816. He married Nancy Potter, daughter of David Potter and Mary Lawson Potter. To this union, four sons: Robert,

David, William and John and six daughters: Mary Ann, Sarah Jane, Marthae, Nancy, Lucretia and Elvira were born. The older children were born in Virginia, but just prior to the Civil War, the John C. Paulls moved to Illinois.

When the Paulls were leaving Virginia, the slave market left such an impact on young William's mind that he determined to fight to end slavery. With the Civil War the family was torn on both sides of the Mason Dixon line, but Will's family had arrived in Illinois where Nancy was born February 21, 1850. William "Will" served in the Civil War with the 99th Regiment of Illinois, and, upon receiving his honorable discharge in 1869, returned to the family home in Kansas where he met Ed Smith. Smith was courting Will's sister, Nancy, but planned to return to Wyoming. Will had a wagon and team of mules and Ed persuaded him to go to Wyoming and do some freighting.

Will and Ed hauled supplies from Rock Creek to Fort Fetterman and other places. They met George Powell; and Ed, who had other plans, turned his team and wagon to Will. During 1870 and 1871, Will Paull and George Powell worked together. They hauled the surplus supplies from Ft. Caspar to Ft. Fetterman for the government when Ft. Caspar was closed.

In 1871 Ed Smith and Will Paull made a trip to Kansas. When they returned to Wyoming, John Paull, Will's brother, who had served with the 19th Kansas Cavalry against the combined forces of the Indians, went with them. Oliver "Ol" Rice, a Paull relative, and Clay Jones went with them, also.

John put his team of mules with his brother's team and hauled freight to Ft. McKinney and other places along the Bozeman Trail. John Paull did not stay in Wyoming very long at a time, but was in Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Nevada and Idaho, covering a vast amount of mountain country with saddle and pack horses.

When General Crook called for volunteers with knowledge of Sioux country, John Paull joined them. In the spring of 1876, John hired out to the government as a scout serving under "Kanaka Frank", Frank Grouard, chief scout, and sub-chief scout, Edmo LeClaire, going with Crook's expedition at the time of the Custer massacre.

John Paull said, "In spite of things that went down in history, I never believed that General Custer attacked that huge Sioux army." In his opinion, Custer was attacked by the Indians and murdered before the reinforcements that Custer had reason to believe would meet him, could come to his assistance. John said Frank Grouard had taken the last message to Custer before the battle. As usual, scouts were camped several miles from the army; John was with the horses.

John said that his first notice of the Indians, aside from their tracks which were probably tracks of Indian scouts who saw Grouard leave his sub-scouts before he reported to the General, was when he heard the government teams running with hundreds of howling Indians after them.

John always laughed when he said that the Lord heard him say, "Lord save us!" when his horse was shot from beneath him. Nell, the bell mare, came along just in time for him to grab her blind bridle as he scrambled to his feet and swung up on her back. Nell raced among the shouting Indians in such a cloud of dust that the Indians following the rest of the teams failed to see John lying flat on the back of the faithful old mare. When the wild stampede was over, John found himself and his steaming steed not more than a couple of miles from the battleground.

In the fall after the Custer massacre, John Paull returned to Kansas where he married petite, lovely, Martha Jane Bowen in Sedan, Kansas, September 13, 1879. John's sister, Nancy, had married Edwin C. Smith at Independence, Kansas, February 12, 1879, and left immediately for Wyoming (see Edwin C. Smith story).

William Paull divided his time between freighting and working with Jim Bragg, Edwin Smith's brother-in-law, at Tie Siding and Laramie City. The Bragg operation consisted of bringing railroad ties out of Colorado, chiefly North Park, for the Union Pacific railroad. William finally went to Washington where he settled on a fruit farm in Yakima Valley.

In the spring of 1881, John Paull, with his wife, Martha, and baby, Ida, returned to Wyoming in a covered wagon. They settled on a small piece of land in the lower LaPrele Valley but worked in various parts of Wyoming. The Paull's second child, Jessie, was born in Buffalo, April 6, 1883. In September of 1883, John and his family went back to Kansas where they stayed until the spring of 1885. In 1885 the Paulls went to Colorado where Madge was born.

John and Martha and their brood made their way back to the Pat Tobin place on lower LaPrele in Wyoming in the spring of 1886. John put his teams to work on the roadbed for the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad.

At that time, the town of Douglas had not started; however, Charley Clay and others were at the tent town of Antelope, just north of the present town of Douglas. The Paull family lived at that camp until John finished his contract for work that extended to the camp at the Rock in the Glen, west of present Glenrock.

The John Pauls returned to the Tobin place in LaPrele Valley where they lived until some time after the town of Douglas started. John Paull was ready to settle down, and the family moved south to Indian territory to farm and wait until Oklahoma would be opened for settlement. In 1889 John settled in Oklahoma where he established three farms, and his son, Charles, was born.

John Paull only returned to Wyoming for very short visits, but Martha came at every opportunity. Wyoming attracted the newest Paull, John's son, Charles or "Charley." The young Charley came to Wyoming and worked on the Pleasant Valley Ranch. For as long as he lived, Charley had a second home with his cousin, Pauline E. Smith Peyton, and her family.

Charley served with the U.S. army in France during World War I. Charley returned to Pleasant Valley Ranch and soon went to work as a government trapper. Charley loved the mountains and established a Shorthorn ranch on the upper Boxelder near his best friend, Lloyd Huxtable. Charley was always a great hunter and fisherman. Charley trained his cattle, horses and dogs to respond to their owner's whistle. His dogs would jump on Charley's horse to ford a stream.

Charley had found time to travel throughout the West and had become familiar with the Feather River country near where his sister lived.

In Wyoming, Charley had bought a ranch on the Wagonhound for winter pasture. He always laughed about the house on this ranch with its many hidey holes suggesting a sideline during prohibition days. His home was always the mountains. Charley married Mrs. Nellie Rice and established an idyllic relationship for his later years.

When an ailing heart suggested that Charley move out of Wyoming's high mountains, he bought a small ranch in California's Feather River country where he duplicated his Wyoming existence on a small scale.

During the 1880s and '90s, Oliver Rice "Ol," a cousin of Nancy Paull Smith, spent much time with the Edwin Smiths. He was popular with the family and claimed that Pleasant Valley ranch was where he kept his dress boots.

After Douglas was established, Oliver served as town marshal. Ol married Kate Scogland, Margaret Powell's sister. They moved to Casper where Ol ranched, raised children and served several terms as Natrona County Sheriff.

William Paull visited Douglas in 1918 when he was 82 years old. An old friend, Harvey Allen, greeted him, "Can this be Bill Paull? I thought you would have been dead long ago!" The two enjoyed reminiscing about camping on Crazy Woman Creek, freighting to Buffalo and Ft. McKinney and other old time experiences.

Payne, Gene L. Sr., Golda and Ferne Family

Gene was born November 6, 1896 in Laurel, Nebraska but at the age of six months moved to Wayne, Nebraska where he attended school and graduated from high school in 1914. In April 1916 he came to Douglas, Wyoming with his father to file on a homestead. Tony Logan helped them find land that was open. This filing was northeast of Douglas about 14 miles. The fee was $50.00.

After returning to Wayne, Nebraska, Gene married Golda Kimble on October 14, 1915. After loading up their belongings on an emigrant car, Gene traveled with the CNW Railroad on a boxcar to Wyoming. Golda followed with his parents and his brother, Hugo, on the passenger train.

They struggled hard to prove up on 40 acres. Gene and Golda helped his parents build a house with lumber they brought with them from Nebraska. Gene and Golda lived in a tent for two months. They bought 75 head of chickens and two pigs. After the chickens were old enough they turned them out into the wheat field nearby and the coyotes ate all of them. They also lost the two pigs, as they foundered and died. They soon ran out of money and Gene went to Douglas and got a job with the Douglas Mercantile Co. for $50.00 per month. He "boarded" with Mrs. Mecum and after all expenses, he had $10.00 take home pay.

The Payne Co. was started in May 1922 with the help of the local banker Ral Collins. Gene and Golda had four children: Kimble, Betty, Shirley and Gene Jr. Kimble and Shirley are deceased. Golda passed away in 1956 and Gene married Ferne Carothers in 1957. He remained active in his business until the time of his death, January 25, 1984.

Payton, James and Hannah

James Payton, "Jim," was born in Canada, June 1854, and moved with his family to Boone, Iowa, where he spent several years before coming to Wyoming in 1888. He first settled in the Shawnee and Douglas area. He was a foot racer, a blacksmith and miner. As soon as Jim got settled he sent for his wife, Hannah Stephney Payton, born June 5, 1868 in Illinois. Jim and Hannah moved to Glenrock in 1890 and operated a rooming and boarding house for two or three years. This was during the time of the Johnson County War, and many times men from both sides of the war stayed at the same time. They were careful to keep this a secret!

Hannah and Jim had four children; Walter, Harrison, Della Inez and George Michael "Mike". Walter and Harrison were born in Happy Hollow in Glenrock. Della Inez was born while they lived at the Inez Mine. Mike was born prematurely at a sheep camp northeast of Glenrock. He was kept in a padded cigar box for three weeks after birth, and was fed by a medicine dropper.

Walter, Harrison and Della all had typhoid fever. They all seemed to be recovering, but one day Walter screamed and died suddenly from a heart attack. He was buried in the old Douglas Cemetery, but the location was lost. Harrison tried to locate the grave around 1948, but was unable to do so.

Jim sharpened picks for the coal miners and ran from one mine to the other. Many times mountain lions followed him.

One day in 1894, Jim went to a Glenrock underground coal mine. He saw smoke coming from the shaft and rushed down into the mine to alert the miners and get them out as fast as he could. The miners all got out safely just before the mine burst into flames. The miners all rejoiced and carried Jim into a jewelry store in Glenrock to purchase a watch that they had inscribed "Presented to James Payton for rescuing the Glenrock Miners, 1894." This watch is now in the Pioneer Museum at Douglas. That mine burned for many years before they finally extinguished the flames.

On May 31, 1899 James Payton was issued a U. S. Government Patent on his homestead south of Glenrock, Township 33, Range 76, Section 16. Jim sold the homestead to the Tolland Company May 7, 1900. Soon after this, the Paytons moved to Esterbrook where Jim worked in the mine and Hannah ran a boarding house.

It was a hardship for the children to get to school. The terms were only three or four months. One of their teachers was Maggie Reid, later Maggie Bolln.

Later the Paytons moved to Platte County and Hannah homesteaded in 1911 on Spring Creek, north of Horseshoe Creek. They moved to the 4T Ranch on Horseshoe, and Jim died there on October 9, 1923. Hannah died February 18, 1931. They were both buried in the Horseshoe Cemetery at Glendo.

Della married Clifford Adsit of Casper and they had three children, Dorothy (deceased), Jim Harrison and Katherine Marie.

Mike married Bessie Chroninger and they had one son, George, who passed away in his senior year of high school.

Pellatz, Orville L. and Vena Family

Vena Victoria Ford was born in Missouri in 1895. When she was about ten years old her family moved to Nebraska where she was educated. Vena and her next older sister, Dessie, attended Lincoln Business College at Lincoln, Nebraska after having completed their high school education. There they became acquainted with Leta Pellatz, a young woman who lived in the same boarding house as Vena and Dessie, and through her met her brother, Orville Pellatz. He was attending the University of Nebraska, from which he graduated with a degree in law in 1915.

Orville was born and raised on a farm near Ceresco in eastern Nebraska. His father, Carl G. Pellatz, had immigrated from Germany at the age of 16 in the company of several of his brothers and sisters. Carl and two of his brothers worked in a dairy in Illinois for five years, then came to Nebraska with their employer. Carl and his brother, Otto, rented land and farmed. Carl and his wife, Isabel Yergen Pellatz, bought the "home" 80 acres in 1897 and built all the buildings on the farm. Later they added an additional 180 acres and lived their lives there. Orville's younger brother and sister are still living on the farm, though they lease out the farm land.

The lure of free land to be homesteaded in Wyoming enticed Vena, Dessie and Dessie's husband, Clarence Gilmore, to come to the Dry Creek community. In 1917, the Gilmores filed their claims, as did Vena. In order to get lumber for her homestead house, Vena was obliged to take a team and wagon to Douglas, a distance of nearly 100 miles, round trip. She made the three or four day journey alone.

Orville and Vena had been going together for several years. In 1918 he filed next to Vena's homestead located between the Cheyenne River and Woody Creek. They were married in Douglas in 1918 by the Congregational minister. Bernie and Anna Ford were their attendants. Orville was inducted into the army at Wahoo, Nebraska two days after his wedding. He spent his service time at Camp Funstan, Kansas. He was discharged in January of 1919, after which Vena and Orville returned to the homestead in April of 1919.

The Pellatzs were the parents of five children, two boys and three girls. The two eldest were born in Nebraska, the others in Wyoming. When the eldest daughter, Mary, was old enough for the first grade, Vena taught her at home. The following year, the Bill School was moved to a new location about three miles south of the Pellatz home. Lincoln, the second child, and Mary rode to school, riding "double" on one horse. After Donald, the third child, was old enough, Orville bought a two wheeled cart drawn by one horse for the children to use for their daily trip to school. The four older children used this cart until Mary and Lincoln, by then in the same grade, were ready for high school.

One afternoon in 1933, while they were driving home from school, a wild animal ran across the road at the river crossing. The children took a line off the harness, made a loop in one end and gave chase to the critter, which was a badger. They "roped" him around the middle and dragged him back to the cart, where they put him in the space behind the seat. They managed to tie him down by putting the line through a crack in the floor boards of the cart and fastening it securely. The badger, by then in a very ill-temper, prompted the children to drive the last mile home in record time. Orville killed and skinned the animal, selling the hide later for $12.00. This money paid for the cement for a foundation needed in order to build an addition to the Pellatz house.

The family of seven had lived in two rooms, measuring overall, 14 x 16 feet, a very small area for that many people. The new addition was to be about 26 x 32 feet, containing four big rooms and a bath, though it would be some time before it became a "real" bathroom with plumbing and fixtures. The walls were constructed of cottonwood logs, large enough so that Orville and the boys could saw them lengthwise, thus having a smooth wall surface on the inside. It was a wonderful thing to have all the extra room.

Vena loved flowers and houseplants. She and her mother and sisters exchanged seeds and plants through the mail. To please her, Orville and the boys hauled rocks and dirt to make a level flower bed for her, next to the new addition to the house.

As a means of extra income, Orville taught school. His first school was held in Rose Walton's homestead house. That term, 1920-21, he taught Rose Schick Walton's daughters, Anna, Elizabeth and Helen Schick. Also enrolled was Nonnie Geick, a niece of Harry Russell. One side of the house was curtained off. There they placed the children's desks and that of the teacher. The term lasted five months.

During the winter of 1922-23, Orville taught the Pleasant Hill School, located about one and one quarter miles east on Pinto Bean's place on the Cow Creek Road. Some of his pupils in this school were Clinton and Clara Owen, Harold, Elsie and Faye Baker, Owen and Donald Cross and Bob and Howard Waggoner. The Pellatzs lived that winter in McRobert's house one mile southwest of the Owen home so that Orville might be closer to the school. Had they lived in their own home, they would have been eight miles from the school.

For two years, Orville taught at the Dorr School located three miles northeast of Pellatz's. Some of his students in that school were Howard and Dorothy Dickson, Dean, Robert and Milo Moye, and Thelma Henley.

In 1939 the Bill School was consolidated with the Dry Creek School. Four school buses brought children to the Dry Creek School. Orville drove the north route for five years bringing the Pellatz, Walton, Steinle and Johnson children to school. There were two teachers who taught grades one through ten.

Vena died in 1944 after a short illness. Orville continued in the ranching business, adding the Federer and Henry ranches to his holdings. Besides these properties, Orville bought a house in Douglas, and the Conlogue farm located west of Douglas.

In 1961, Orville married Bertha Lampman of Glenrock, a widow. He had become acquainted with her through the church. Together they retired to live in

Vena Ford (Pellatz) 1916

Douglas in 1968. Three years later on October 21, 1971, Orville died and after his death his property was divided among the heirs. The land is still owned by the descendants of Orville and Vena.

Mary Pellatz Nachtman, the first child of Orville and Vena Pellatz, received her elementary education at the Bill School, the first two years of high school at Dry Creek and then graduated from the Douglas High School in 1939. She was employed at the Converse County Welfare Office and later in the County Assessor's office. She was married to Victor J. Nachtman in 1942 at Ft. Lewis, Washington, where Victor was stationed. He served in the United States Cavalry, Mechanized Division for five years. During that time he was stationed in Washington, Oregon, California, Louisiana, Kentucky, the Phillippine Islands and Japan. Mary followed him around the country until he was sent overseas. He was discharged in 1945, after which they moved to the Ira Dull place. There they were engaged in ranching. Later they bought the Paul Miller ranch, raising sheep as well as cattle. Victor also did contract earth moving. They carried the Dull Center mail route for 24 years and Mary has taken care of the Dull Center Weather Bureau Station since 1952.

The Nachtmans had four children, three boys and a girl, namely Russell Lee, Jack Dean, Jerry Joseph and Lona Jean. The second son, Jack, was associated with the ranch until he and his father, Victor, were killed in a small plane crash. After the accident in 1974, Jerry returned to the ranch to manage it until 1983 when he and his family bought a ranch near Wheatland. After Jerry left, Lona returned home to manage the ranch for her mother with part-time help from the eldest son, Russell Lee. Mary makes her home at the ranch.

Lincoln Pellatz was born in 1922 at the home of paternal grandparents in Nebraska. He attended the Dry Creek School for ten years, completing his education in the Douglas High School in 1939. After graduation, he worked at various jobs finally enlisting in the air force in 1942. He completed his training, graduating as a bombardier from Carlsbad Air Force Base in 1944. He was married in 1944 to Ruth Eleanor Johnson of the Dry Creek community by Reverend Louis Gale of the Congregational Church in Douglas. He was sent overseas in the fall of 1944 to the Phillipines, and returned to the United States the following May. He was discharged in November of 1945.

Lincoln worked for a time as a ranch hand, eventually buying the Perry Burden place in the fall of 1949. For the next ten years they lived there, but moved to Farson, Wyoming to an irrigated farm in the Eden Valley Irrigation District primarily for the education of their eldest child who was then of high school age. Lincoln sold this property in 1968 and the family returned to Converse County. They make their home on a portion of Orville Pellatz's holdings. Their buildings are situated near the river in a grove of trees which Orville planted in the early 1950's. Lincoln and Ruth are the parents of three children, Steven Lincoln, Robert Dean and Joan Ruth.

Donald Dean Pellatz is the third child of Orville and Vena Pellatz. He graduated from the high school in Douglas in 1943, enlisting in the navy that fall. He was stationed in several places in the United States, and then sent to the Phillipines. He was discharged in the spring of 1946 in Washington. He made the trip from Washington to his home on a motorcycle.

For the next few years, Donald worked at home and on other ranches. He met Betty Lighthall of Clinton, Illinois. Betty was a relative of the Jim Facklers and of Sara Nachtman. After a few months' courtship, they married in 1951. They were employed by Rollie Sadler about two years and then moved to the Ray Henry place to make their home. Donald and Betty have five children, Nancy Ann, David William, Carl Dean, Charles Amos and Jane Louise.

June Pellatz was born in 1927 and educated in the Dry Creek schools, graduating from the Douglas High School in 1945. After graduation she worked in the AAA office until her marriage to Charles Radford, a native of Nebraska, in 1948. Charles entered the army in 1942 and was discharged in 1945. Charles and June were married in Nebraska in 1946 and to this union two children were born. The son, who was born in 1947, died as a result of an accident in 1959.

Jewell Pellatz was born in 1930. She was educated in the Bill and Dry Creek schools, graduating from the high school in Douglas in 1948. She attended one semester at Barnes Business College in Denver. Jewell was married to Earl W. Reed in 1949. They make their home on a ranch eight miles northeast of Bill where they are engaged in the livestock business, raising both cattle and sheep. There were four children born to Jewell and Earl, namely Larry Wayne, Thomas Lee, Bruce Francis and Mary Katherine.

Perrine, Roy and Frances Family

Roy A. Perrine was born in Northboro, Iowa, December 25, 1882, the son of Henry and Ruth Perrine. While he was still small the family moved to Larkin, Missouri. He was reared and went to school in Larkin. When he was 21 years old he came west to Douglas in July of 1902. He moved west because of more work and better wages. He earned $50.00 per month instead of $35.00. He went to work for A.R. Merritt General Store.

While delivering groceries to the John Morton home he met Frances M. Hendryx, daughter of James and Margret Hendryx. She was born in Abbott, Nebraska December 20, 1880. She attended school at Abbott and Omaha, Nebraska. She came west in the fall of 1900 for better wages and more work. She hired out to Mrs. Sarah Morton as a live-in housekeeper. Later she worked for Mrs. Jacob Jenne.

Roy and Frances were married September 21, 1903. They were married by a Methodist minister by the name of Harry Kemp, in a Methodist parsonage located at that time in the 400 block on South Third Street.

Frances came west by train and in those days it left much to be desired. The train left Crawford, Nebraska at 6:00 a.m. It stopped in Van Tassell so the crew and passengers could watch men brand horses. Next stop was Shawnee so a man could buy a coal mine. The train was warmed by a coal stove in one end of the passenger car. The train carried mail, freight and livestock. An engine, nine cars and a coal car made up the train. They arrived in Douglas at 10:00 p.m.

Nine children were born to Roy and Frances; six of them are still living.

In 1908 his sister, Bess Irene Perrine, came to live with them for many years. She worked in the telephone office located upstairs next to the old Budget office. She also worked in the post office located in the middle of the block in the 100 block on South Third Street. I believe it is now a store room for Bolln Grocery.

Roy worked for different stores and a brick yard. Then he went to work for Ed Reville, a contractor. Many of the cement walks they laid are still in use on Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Streets. Roy laid the tile floor in the LaBonte Hotel and in the post office. In 1918 he bought the Rice Hardware located in the 100 block on North Second Street. He operated the store until Wyoming Bank and Trust Company went broke. That, and the depression starting, caused him to go broke. They moved to LaPrele Community where they ranched and raised poultry and sold milk until their son, John, came home from the service.

They both did a lot for the community. Frances and Mrs. George Doyle canvassed the town for funds to get water put in the park and cemetery. The men had secured and planted trees up there.

At that time, Douglas was small and most entertainment had to be provided by the people. There was a committee of women organized to help get entertainment. Mrs. Doyle, Mrs. H. G. Peters, Mrs. Kellogg, Mrs. Jackson and Frances made up the committee. At Christmas time they held suppers and programs in the Opera House. It was located where the Ben Franklin Store is now. Women brought food and all the men came for supper. After supper they spoke pieces and read poems. The four churches (Catholic, Episcopal, Methodist and Congregational) furnished candy and oranges for all the children. Oranges were a real treat as they were only available at holidays. The evening was closed by singing carols led by the ministers. Mrs. E. T. David played the organ. In the late part of July the committee planned picnics. Children ran races and played games in the afternoon. Women brought food and the men all came for supper. They built bonfires and when they died down everyone sang "Till We Meet Again." This was held at the fairgrounds. Again, everyone came and the churches all took part. These get-togethers were discontinued when World War I started.

Roy organized Jobs Daughters in Wyoming while Master of the Masonic Lodge. Douglas was Bethel No. 1 and still is. He also started plans and named committees for building Masonic Temples.

When their son, John, returned home from World War II Frances was very near blind and they moved to Casper. Frances passed away March 6, 1963 at the age of 82 and Roy passed away September 21, 1973 at the age of 90.

Peters, Howard G. and Ella Family

On April 12, 1861, the Confederates fired on Fort Sumter. The Civil War had begun. Lee's army was defeated at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania two years later in July of 1863. The area around Gettysburg had been overrun by warring soldiers wearing both the blue of the Union Army and the gray of the Confederacy. Farms of families living in the vicinity were devastated. Their crops were destroyed — their livestock confiscated by the troops.

A family by the name of Peters owned a farm near Gettysburg. The Peters had eleven children. Howard G. Peters was born at the family home in 1857. After the battle of Gettysburg, the family was destitute.

Howard Peters grew to manhood in Pennsylvania, learning the trade of harness-maker. In 1880, he migrated to Iowa where he was in the harness business with one George DeWolf. In 1885, he left Iowa and his partnership to take a homestead near Ainsworth, Nebraska. For some obscure reason, he left Nebraska only a year later and came to Wyoming.

Douglas was a tent town located on the mouth of Antelope Creek when Howard arrived. He opened a harness shop there, and his business flourished.

On Thanksgiving Day 1885, Howard had a turkey roasting for his dinner. The famous, or infamous, George W. Pike stole the bird from Peters' oven, and returned to invite Howard to take Thanksgiving dinner in his tent.

With others in the struggling community, Howard helped grub sagebrush from the newly laid out streets of Douglas in 1886. Mr. Peters loved trees. He planted, or helped plant, nearly two-thirds of the trees along the streets of the new town. He and Fatty Hardenbrook, the local barber, planted the cottonwood in front of the College Inn saloon. The town well was located in front of Hardenbrook's shop. The entire population of Douglas used the water from the well. Of interest, is the fact that the pumps were worn out at the rate of one pump per month.

Peters built a new harness shop on Second Street. His former partner, George DeWolf, came to Douglas from Iowa and, once again, was engaged in harness making with Howard.

In 1888, Howard journeyed to Rothville, Pennsylvania, where he was united in marriage to Ella Jane Hobough, daughter of David Hobough. He brought his bride to Douglas that same year.

Howard Peters eventually disposed of his harness business, and established the Douglas Brickyard. Many of the older homes in town were constructed of bricks from his kilns.

On December 18, 1945, at the age of 88, Howard Peters died. His wife, Ella, died on March 13, 1930.

A livery stable occupied the corner of 2nd and Oak Streets in Douglas in 1900; in 1910, the livery was razed to make room for the Arnold Lumber Company. The company was managed by R. W. Bahken for a period of four years when Bahken moved to Keeline, Wyoming to open the Bahken Lumber Yard. The Arnold Lumber Company was sold to Peter Mintener. Bloedorn Lumber Company of Torrington purchased the Mintener yard in 1935, and the business was then called the Converse Lumber Company.

H. M. "Mort" Peters was born to Ella and Howard Peters in Douglas on April 4, 1895, and received his education there. Shortly after he graduated from high school, Mort established a lumber yard in Chugwater. In 1915, he accepted a position as manager of the Mintener Lumber Company in Douglas.

Mort married Esther Ruby Nelson in Douglas on September 23, 1930. Miss Nelson had come to Douglas in 1926 to work as a nurse in the Douglas Hospital. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Nelson and was born in Idaho Springs, Colorado on August 25, 1903. She attended the Idaho Springs elementary and high schools and following graduation went to Denver where she worked as a nurses aid. Esther took her formal nurses training at a hospital in White Plains, New York and later worked for the Immigration Service at the Port of New York.

When the Mintener Lumber Company changed hands in 1935, Mort remained as manager of the new Converse Lumber Company.

Mort and Esther had two children who both died shortly after birth. Esther died from complications of diabetes in early April 1952.

On April 3, 1956 in Torrington, Mort married Carrie Johnson Larson of Douglas. Carrie was the widow of Axel Henning Larson who had passed away June 3, 1951. She had two daughters Margaret and Alice; a son Joe was killed in World War II.

Upon his retirement in 1960, Mort had completed 47 years in the lumber business. Mort and Carrie were both avid and expert fishermen, and they spent much time during the year proving their skill in lakes and mountain streams.

In addition to being a vice president of the Wyoming Pioneer Association, Mort was a charter member of Samuel Mares Post No. 8 of the American Legion and served as commander for 1922-1923, a member of the Masonic Lodge, and served 21 years as treasurer of the Christ Episcopal Church.

Mort died in his sleep January 13, 1970 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Peterson, "Lars" and Caroline

Laurence G. "Lars" Peterson was born September 5, 1840, the son of P. Peterson. He was united in marriage to Caroline Eklund and to this union four children were born, all in Sweden.

The eldest son, Gus, was born September 9, 1861. He and his wife, Emma Jane, were the parents of two children, Laurence and Nettie. Gus died November 9, 1938.

Percy "Pete" was born September 17, 1875, was married to Zella Van Dalsem in 1913, and died February 10, 1938. To this union four children were born: Mary, Lisbeth, Van and Rose Leigh.

Eli, the third son, was born September 12, 1870. He was never married and died August 4, 1960.

Anna was born in 1873. She was married to Adam Schneider in 1907. There were no children born to the couple. Anna died in June of 1964.

Eli came to the United States with his family in 1879. They first settled near Odebolt, Iowa where Lars was engaged in farming for several years. When Eli was 16 years old he hired out to a farmer who paid him $10 per month wages. The working hours were long and hard and Eli held all Iowa farmers in very low regard. In 1885 Eli's mother died. Two years later the family left Iowa and came to Wyoming, arriving in Lusk on a cold, miserable day in early spring. Eli got into an argument over the adverse weather with a total stranger and finally the two men came to blows. "Damned if I didn't come out second best!" quipped Eli.

The family continued their journey westward, settling near Irvine. Eli's father was hired as section foreman on the Northwestern Railroad. Eli went to work for the Douglas Willan's outfit located across the river from Irvine. After about two weeks Eli became uneasy. There had been nothing said about wages and the work he was doing was so easy compared to that which he had done in Iowa. He was not at all sure he was even on the payroll. He went to the foreman, Mr. Childs, and told him that he would like to start work and was astounded to find that he had already earned half his month's wages, $12.50. His work consisted of mending fences, milking cows and helping to break horses. He remained at the job for almost five years, at the end of which time he had worked his way up to the top man with a wage of $45.00 per month.

In 1890 Eli's father bought the old Westwick place on

Wagonhound Creek south of Douglas. Westwick had been a pattern marker before he came to Wyoming, working in a foundry in Galena, Illinois. In 1893 Eli bought the Wagonhound ranch from his father and operated it until 1906 when he sold it to Harry Pollard.

A close friend of the Peterson family at that time was Kelly Peach who, although he was a wealthy man, lived in a tent on the Peterson place. When Mr. Peach left, he gave Eli his two teams of horses, a wagon, traps and various other possessions which he had stored in boxes.

After finalizing the sale of his ranch to Pollard, Eli began to clear out his belongings prior to vacating the ranch. He came across some of the boxes which Peach had left. Not bothering to look inside, Eli took one box into the shop and threw the box on the bench. There was a horrible explosion which tore Eli's clothes to shreds and demolished the shop. The box had contained dynamite caps.

Eli was taken to a hospital in Omaha, Nebraska where Dr. Gifford had to remove one of Eli's eyes. For nine months he remained in the hospital. About 18 months after his release he developed a dreadful earache from an abscess in his ear. Finally the abscess burst and Dr. Hylton removed a piece of copper that had been embedded there since the dynamite caps had exploded.

After his accident Eli lived in Douglas helping his brother, Pete. Pete was a carpenter and contractor. The Petersons built many dwellings and other buildings in town, among them the log cabin, which is located on the fairgrounds and is used by the Wyoming Pioneer Association, and the old Catholic Church.

Pete was a multi-talented person. Besides being a carpenter, he was a brick-layer, a mason and a mechanic. He built a stone house for Curtis Sears who raised horses on a ranch about 45 miles northeast of Douglas. He fashioned a pair of spurs for Curtis which Sears wore with pride.

Eli could remember many of the early residents of Douglas and of Converse County. There was Charles Nysten who had been with General Crook when the army gathered up the dead on the Custer Battlefield in 1876; Kion Hart, an Irishman and a Civil War Veteran who came to Fort Laramie after the war; Duke Connely, an orderly at Fort Laramie; Bobby Fryer, the poet-blacksmith at Fort Fetterman. He was a good man, well educated. He liked his whiskey but was not a drunkard.

Eli remembered this little rhyme which Fryer composed:

"When I'm dead and in my grave,
No more whiskey will I crave,
And on my tombstone I want this wrote,
Many a drink's gone done my throat."

Of George Pike, Eli said that he was a "shining light in the tinhorn fraternity."

A more villaneous character who lived on LaPrele was George Lambe. He was wealthy but had acquired his wealth through devious and illegal methods. A man by the name of Baumgartner caught him stealing cattle so Lambe killed him. Lambe was prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary in Rawlins. He tried to buy his way out but his efforts failed.

"Dutch" Henry had a ranch on the river bottom across from the Morton ranch. He was a bachelor and a well-built man, noted for his strength. Oddly, he loved to read ancient history and was quite an expert on the subject.

Natchez Perez came from Colorado in 1866. He could not read or write and was not sure of his age, but he was a good, honest man. His French name was too hard to remember so George Cross, Sr. called him Nels Perry, a name which stayed with him the rest of his life. Nels never put anything by for his old age and when he could no longer make a living, Eli built a cabin on a lot in Douglas and moved Nels in. Nels was suffering from cancer. While he lived in the cabin, three ladies, Mrs. Schneider, Mrs. Slichter and Mrs. Webster, brought food to him. Eight days before he died, Billy Gerlach and Eli took him to the hospital.

The first restaurant in Douglas was operated by Demy Olivereau who came to the area in 1876. Mr. Olivereau was a Latin scholar who had studied for the priesthood. He lived to be 102 years old, spending the last years in California.

Douglas' first school teacher was Mrs. Lizzie Cushman. The school was built of sand-rolled bricks. It was located on the site of the present North Grade School. The bricks were made by Brenning and McFarland who operated a brick yard located where the Payne Company stands today.

Douglas once had 24 saloons, one wholesale liquor house and two dance halls. There was an alfalfa mill, a flour mill, two brick yards and a seed house.

Francis Cushman and Eli were very good friends. Eli said of Frank that he was a poor cook but a natural wit. Mr. Cushman said of Eli that as a correspondent, he was much like a flashlight, intermittent flashes of brightness between long periods of darkness.

Eli's sister, Anna Schneider, lost her husband in 1914. After that, Eli shared a home with her on South Fourth Street where Eli died August 4, 1960. Anna lived until 1964. She was confined the last two months of her life to the hospital, the result of a fall.

The entire Peterson family came to love their adopted homeland. Lars studied and received his citizenship papers. Though they were born in Sweden, Gus, the blacksmith, Percy, the carpenter, Eli, the rancher and Anna, the devoted sister, all contributed much to the development of Converse County.

Pexton, Charles and Gilberta

Charles Pexton and Gilberta Barnhill were married in Douglas at the Episcopal Church on Easter Sunday, April 13, 1941. Gilberta was born and raised east of Chugwater, Wyoming. She came to Douglas to teach the Pexton-Dunn School in 1940.

John Edward Pexton was born to Charles and Gilberta on August 31, 1942; Mary Charlene was born on October 6, 1943 and Gene Ray was born on November 16, 1952.

From 1941 to 1947 Charles and Gilberta worked on the ranch for Charles's father, Lisle. Lisle sold them the ranch they presently own. It is located on Reid Creek, or known to some as Rutherford Creek. Raising Hereford cattle was the main project besides putting up native and alfalfa hay. They strived to improve their ranch through the years. Developing more meadows, raising a large garden, and each year increasing the size of the yard for the abundance of flowers Gilberta wanted to grow.

During the growing years of her children, Gilberta became involved with the 4-H program. She was a leader for 25 years and still serves as a resource leader making it 33 years. She is a member of the extension homemakers and has been for 43 years . . . now serving as secretary of the Wyoming Homemakers Council.

Charles was elected to the Federal Land Bank board in 1969 and is still serving in that capacity. Because of his interest in the betterment of people in agriculture, he became active in Farm Bureau. He has served in many offices and is presently district director of central district and Wyoming Farm Bureau membership chairman. Because of his interest, Gilberta became involved also. She has served as treasurer to Converse County Farm Bureau since 1964; of that time, she also served 12 years as secretary. They are members of the Stockgrowers and Gilberta is serving as Converse County Cow-Belles president.

In 1948, Gilberta was bitten by a rattlesnake which nearly cost her life. She had gone up the creek taking Ed and Charlene with her to enjoy a day picking gooseberries and chokecherries to make jelly and jam. Charles was in the mountains hauling hay with their only vehicle, a pick-up. She called Pansy Dunn on the old crank phone and Pansy took her to meet Dr. Everett Gardner whom Gilberta had called about her bite. He met them near Brow's Ranch and administered a venom shot. It took eleven shots to save her. A den of rattlers was located several years later and around 100 were killed.

Ed graduated from the University of Wyoming and from Morgantown University in West Virginia with a Doctors Degree. He is married to Jeannie Bindschadler, and they have two sons, Jed, who is attending Central College in McPherson, Kansas and Terry, who is a senior at Ft. Collins High School. Ed is a professor at C.S.U.

Charlene graduated from Central Business College in Denver and worked in the Douglas High School as secretary before joining the Vista Program. She worked with the Swinimish Indians in Puget Sound, Washington. She married Kendell Brown, and they live in Omak, Washington where they are buying his folks' ranch. They have a son, Kendell, Jr., who is in the seventh grade and a daughter, Mona, who is in the sixth grade.

Gene graduated from the University of Wyoming with an Animal Science Degree.

Gene is incorporated in the family ranch with his parents. He married Janet Read, and they have two sons, Travis, who is in the second grade and Dustin, who is in the kindergarten at the White School.

Gilberta Pexton

Pexton, James and Lillian

James Pexton was born on April 25, 1874 in Beverley, England, the son of Thomas S. and Mary Sturdy Pexton.

Coming to the United States in 1880 at the age of six with his parents, he grew to early manhood in Neligh, Nebraska.

On November 27, 1901, he married Lillian G. Hinsdale, the daughter of George and Ada Gilbert Hinsdale.

They became the parents of two sons, Fred and George.

Coming to Converse County they bought land under the LaPrele Irrigation Project near his brothers, John and Tom. Andy Moore owns the land in 1985.

Lillian died on March 7, 1936; James on July 10, 1948.

Fred and George attended school in Douglas. Fred was an outstanding football player while in school and in order to keep playing he would attend high school in the fall during the football season then drop out of school until next fall. He was able to do this until he graduated. Douglas had championship teams during these times and was due no doubt to their seasoned players.

Fred joined the merchant marine and went to sea while George went to work for the Union Pacific Railroad and lived in Cheyenne.

John R. Pexton

Pexton, John and Mary Family

John Pexton came to the United States from England at the age of 17 with his folks, Thomas and Mary Jane Sturdy Pexton, in 1880. He grew to manhood in Neligh Nebraska.

In 1907, upon learning of land for sale under the proposed LaPrele Dam, John and his wife, Mary Krebs, the daughter of Henry Krebs, whom he had married July 31, 1889, along with children Glen (born 1890), Ada (born

John and Mary Pexton at sheepcamp on Upper Horseshoe Creek in 1920.

July 31, 1893), Dora (born 1897), and Lisle (born Mar. 9, 1899), came to Douglas. An emigrant railway car brought their six horses, two mules, four milk cows, chickens, machinery and wagons along with Glen and a friend, while the rest of the family came by passenger train. Lisle remembers it was Halloween as there were yard gates, outhouses and other things all over the streets. Also a buggy was on top of a livery barn.

After living in Douglas for awhile they moved to the Frank Wheelock place six miles west of Douglas. These are the buildings immediately north of the LaPrele interchange on I-25.

During the winter of 1907-1908, John and Glen hauled cement from Inez to the LaPrele Dam staying in the oil company shacks on the hill west of the Ed Smith Ranch on LaPrele Creek.

The Ben Wheelock Ranch, on LaPrele Creek, located west of the Frank Wheelock place, was leased for one year after which they moved to their property under the LaPrele ditch. This is located where Don AuFrance lives presently (1984). It took two or three years to clear off all the sagebrush. Water from the dam became available in 1911 or 1912.

During the winter of 1909-10, which was very cold and a lot of snow fell, John and Glen Pexton and Joe Bergstrand hauled corn north for the Logan Bros. and later in the spring hauled wool for them.

Ada, Doris, and Lisle went to school at the O'Brien School with Verda Wiker as their first teacher and Mable Swartz as the second. They had to walk most of the time the 2½ miles to school. Lisle remembers there was a building close to the school house where they would go during recesses and noons. There they would dance using whistling and singing for the music.

In 1910, John filed on a homestead one mile south of the place under the ditch. They moved into a two-story house which along with a barn he had built there.

John contracted clearing sagebrush, disking the ground and planting alfalfa for several people. A cutter was used which had a pair of blades in a V-shape fastened under a frame on four wheels. It was pulled by a team of six horses and cut a swath of 5 to 6 feet wide. The sagebrush was raked up and burned allowing the disking of 3 or 4 times and planting to be done. Raking and burning of practically all the land from Water Tank Hill to LaPrele Creek was done by John and his sons.

After the bad blizzard of April 1912, in which many sheep and some lives were lost, John bought 300 yearling ewes and took them to Shawnee to be run by Henry Reese and Mr. Rheusart. In the fall, 1200 ewes were bought along with 160 acres and some leased lands in Downey Park on Rocky Ford and Ghost Creeks from L. W. Clelland. This land was used until 1915.

The Bolln-Rice Ranch near Laramie Peak, now owned by the Werners, was leased in 1915 for putting up the hay. There was also an option to buy made but after learning that the Thomas and Charlie Shepard lands were for sale, it was decided to purchase them. These lands, which belonged at one time to John Newell and Arthur Kenyon and known as the "Beer Keg Ranch", are still owned by the Pexton Family. Richard and his son, Randy, summer their cattle there.

While leasing the Bolln-Rice place, the family lived in the old Giles Strangways' house on Munday Creek. Lisle tells, "the packrats were so thick and made so much noise rolling an empty barrel back and forth upstairs that we had a hard time sleeping".

During the winter of 1915 Frank Edmison, who was nicknamed "Fuzzy" because his hair was never combed, helped Lisle feed the cattle that they had bought from the Shepards. The following story was told by Lisle about "Fuzzy". "A Dutchman, who was working alongside "Fuzzy", was found to have cootie bugs on him by "Fuzzy". "Fuzzy" decided to burn all the Dutchman's clothes. You can imagine how that set with the Dutchman and, of course, started a fight. I finally got them settled down and went to the bunkhouse to look if there were any more bugs and I found some of "Fuzzy's" clothes about ready to crawl off, they were so thick with cooties, so I took them out and poured coal oil all over them and also fumigated the bunkhouse."

Springhill, the nearest post office, was east over the first mountain and there was a telephone line from Esterbrook to the Shepard place and on over to Bert Bell's on Forty Mile near the Laramie Plains. There was a switch to connect the two lines when anyone wanted to talk.

Ada married Fred Hildebrand in 1915 going to live on his place on the Platte River west of Orpha.

Glen and Anna Hildebrand were married March 26, 1916. Following an appendicitis operation he passed away on May 6, 1916. Anna later married Clarence Marsh.

After Glen's death Lisle took over the active management of the sheep. They were trailed by way of King Creek, over Magpie Hill and through Downey Park to the head of Horseshoe Creek where they were lambed down the creek and sheared at a corral some four or five miles from the head of the creek.

In the summer of 1917, when Lisle was riding from the ranch west of Douglas to the mountain place, he stopped at the Jeff and Robert Scott Ranch on Wagonhound. While eating dinner a pretty girl sailed through the room so fast he hardly got to see her but he saw enough of her to want to see her again. She was Lucille Scott, the daughter of Joseph Robert Scott. J. Robert and his brother had purchased the place in the spring of 1917 from Lyman Cooper.

Lucille (born May 30, 1900 in Abilene, Texas) had lost her mother, Nellie Bollin Scott, when she was twelve. The Scotts lived on a homestead in eastern Colorado near Haswell prior to coming to Wyoming. Lucille and Lisle were married in Douglas on March 23, 1920.

Dora was married in 1919 to Robert Coil. They moved later to Crawford, Nebraska where they had a farm.

In 1918, John and Mary moved to Douglas, first living in the 500 block on South 5th Street, then buying the E. T. David house on East Center. They lived there until 1935 when they traded houses with Mike and Eleanor Williams who lived at 428 So. 5th. John died October 28, 1937 and Mary November 14, 1940.

A son, Charles E., was born to Lisle and Lucille on April 20, 1921. That spring the sheep were lambed on upper Bedtick Creek prior to taking them to the mountains.

While Lisle and Lucille were living at the ranch, west of Douglas, John R. was born on September 27, 1925.

By 1927, needing more range to run the sheep on, a ranch on Horseshoe Creek belonging to Henry and Willard Saul, was purchased. This ranch, called the 4T, had originally been owned by the Freeney's.

In the spring of 1928, while trailing some sheep to the mountains from the Horseshoe place, a bad storm came through and found them at the Saul Mines. After getting them to the timber, south of there, they spent two days until the storm was spent. Forty head of ewes were lost. A week or so later the county attorney in Laramie wrote that the dead sheep would have to be buried as some of the people in Esterbrook were complaining of the smell.

Two daughters and a son were born to Lisle and Lucille while they were living on the Horseshoe place west of Glendo: Barbara Lee, Aug. 17, 1930, and passed away on Nov. 21, 1932; Joan L., Sept. 4, 1934; and Richard L., Apr. 6, 1937.

During the drought of 1933 and 1934, land was leased from A. A. Spaugh and Magoon north of Manville. The fall of 1934 found the U.S. Government buying old ewes for 12.00, $3.00 per calf and $10.00 for old canner cows. They then killed and skinned them as there was no market for them. The meat was home canned, in a lot of cases.

After having to sell the rest of the sheep and turning the Horseshoe Ranch to the bank in 1936, the family lived on the old Harmon place just west of the 4T for one year.

In the spring of 1937, the family moved to the Rutherford place on Reid Creek, which was purchased from C. J. Saul.

Lisle served as County Commissioner from Jan. 1, 1947 to Jan. 1, 1951.

The George Foxton, or Mills Ranch, as it is commonly called, was bought in 1945 from C. D. Zimmerman, aka the Douglas Securities. John and his family own this now. John married Noramae Philbrick in 1948. They had four sons: Frank, Mike, Tim, and Jeff, and one daughter, Melanie. Noramae died in 1972; and in 1974, John married Catherine Larkin.

The county line between Albany County and Converse had a boundary change in 1955. Lisle was instrumental in getting this change made. It enabled them to do county business in Douglas instead of Laramie.

The Fred Manning Ranch on LaBonte was broken up and sold to their neighbors in 1960. Lisle and son, Richard, bought the portion on LaBonte and Lower Owl Creek. Richard and his family live in the Saul bungalow now. Richard married Jacque Wilkinson in 1960. They have one son, Randy, and two daughters, Valerie and Kim.

Joan married Charles Woodin, Jr. Jan. 8, 1955. They live in Casper where he works for True Oil Co. Their children are Debbie, Greg, and Becky.

Pexton, Tom and Mamie Family

An English lad of seven years of age sailed from Liverpool on the British Steamship, The SS Polynesian, arriving at the Port of Baltimore on March 22, 1880 with his parents, Thomas Pexton and Mary Jane Sturdy Pexton, and seven brothers and sisters — all born in Beverley, Yorkshire, England. Only Annie, his oldest sister, remained behind. They settled in Neligh, Nebraska, which according to history, had just rid itself, in 1877, of a devastating seige of grasshoppers lasting four years.<sup>1</sup>

Tom, named Thomas Stephenson Pexton, was educated at Gates College. Widowed after a marriage of ten years to Effie Jones, he married Mamie Ella Hurst on July 10, 1911. He was with the Atlas Bank at the time. Four years later he "bought a controlling interest in the Pioneer Bank of Basin, Wyoming"<sup>2</sup> and moved there in late April of 1916 with his wife and three children — Emly, Edwin, and Maxine.

In early 1918 another move was made to Douglas, Wyoming where a ranch, seven miles west of town, was purchased from Adam Schmiedlein. This was to be the Tom Pexton Ranch for seven years in Converse County.

Barren of trees and with a sparse amount of buildings of which the big red barn dominated, Tom developed the ranch into an ultimate oasis. The house became completely surrounded by lawn and a large grove of trees, mostly cottonwood, planted by Tom. Lawns were irrigated by water in a pond made by a dam in a gulley a few hundred yards above the house. The pond was fed by springs and there was plenty of water to keep the grass green and the flowers — sweet peas, nasturtiums, and hollyhocks — growing. Tom adopted "Oasis" as the official name for his ranch and it truly was an oasis.

Tom enlarged the house to three bedrooms, front room or living room, dining room, bath, kitchen, breakfast room, and backporch. To house the car, he built a garage with an icehouse underneath and built a new red chickenhouse, cattle sheds, and a windmill with a tank to store water. Quite a change took place in seven years.

The Tom Pexton Ranch house became comfortable with a coal furnace which was banked with coals at night in winter. A large green curtain hung in the archway sealing off the living room and the guest bedroom during the cold weather. At first, water was heated in a boiler in the stove and baths were taken in a large galvanized tub behind a screen frame covered with green burlap. Later a bathtub was installed in the bathroom.

Boxes of Crystle White Bar Soap were stored by the inside stairway in the basement and shavings of the bars were melted for the laundry. An oval copper-bottomed tub with water was placed on the wood and coal stove and clothes were washed in it with a stomper. Later an electric washer with a wringer on the side helped make the task easier.

A Lally Lite electric plant, run with batteries, producing 32 volts, was in the basement of the house. This made possible the use of 32-volt appliances — a vacuum cleaner, an electric iron (replacing the old cast iron flat irons heated on the stove and clamped onto a handle), electric lights (replacing the kerosene wick lamps), electric toaster, curling iron, and the washing machine. Tom's was the first of the ranches in the area to have these conveniences. Still in the spring all the rugs were hung on the clothes line and beaten with a wire beater — spring house cleaning.

A DeLaval separator was on the backporch used to separate the cream and milk. The cream was churned into butter in an old-fashioned crock churn with a stomper. At times milk, cream, butter, and eggs were delivered to customers. When first settling on the ranch, Tom ran sheep. Supplies to his sheep camp were listed in his ledger in 1919. Later the sheep were sold and twenty or so cows were milked with a milking machine and the whole milk was placed in five and ten-gallon cans which were left on the Yellowstone Highway to Casper to be picked up by a creamery truck. The cooling of the milk was done with ice cut into one hundred pound blocks at a pond in winter and brought by wagon to the "icehouse" under the garage where it was packed in straw. It kept frozen quite well. Blocks were chipped off and carried with tongs and placed in an icebox on the backporch for refrigeration.

Irrigated land produced alfalfa for feed and a surplus to sell. More land was homesteaded above the "big ditch" increasing the ranch to 520 acres in total. It was in the sagebrush above the "big ditch" where a sheepherder, Pete Higgney, lived in a covered wagon which was moved about with the grazing sheep. When he went to town, he purchased quite a stack of records. As he played them on his Victor Phonograph with a horn speaker, he would sail the ones he didn't like out over the sagebrush. It was in his covered wagon that Tom and family shared two sets of earphones and heard music from Cincinnati over the air for the first time. Tom was much impressed with that phenomenon. It was a tedious trip home that dark night in a box wagon pulled by a team of horses through the lightly falling snow without a road

When the children reached school age, they attended class in a schoolhouse built nearby. Tom was chairman of the school board, so when a tie vote resulted, it was his vote that located the school on its site to the chagrin of those living farther away.

A barn dance was held in the big red barn hayloft, entered at the top of the hillside. Bales of hay surrounded the dance floor for seating. The neighbors came from all around dancing to the strains of "Three O'Clock in the Morning"; "Oh, You Beautiful Doll"; and other popular music of the time. Tom was a talented fiddler, so no doubt, contributed to the evening with a rendition of "Turkey in the Straw".

At the country school, box socials were held. Food, such as fried chicken, rolls, pie, etc., were placed in decorated boxes and auctioned off to the highest bidder who ate with the one who prepared the food.

Much handiwork — embroidery, tatting, crocheting, stitching — was done in the evenings by Mamie. She gave most of it away for gifts, but she didn't own a pair of pillowslips that weren't decorated with embroidery and crocheting. Mrs. Myrtle Bicknell came to the ranch for two weeks before school started to help sew clothing for the children, as most clothing was handmade.

A number of vacations were spent at Tom's brother, John Pexton's upper ranch near the foot of Laramie Peak, when relatives from Iowa came for a two-week stay. One summer all slept in the hay loft on blankets spread out in the hay. Tom's brother, William Sturdy Pexton, silhouetted in the loft doorway, proved himself quite a storyteller. Among his stories were his staying at the ranch one winter rounding up stock when a blizzard struck. He and a ranch hand almost camped at a corral next to the ranch house before discovering where they were. Another late night he saw a man hanging by the neck from a tree. After throwing his jacket over his horses' head and leaving, he returned to find the hanging man was but a broken limb moving about in the moonlight. William also broke forth into song singing "Bringing in the Sheaves" and "Showers of Blessings".

Tom Pexton was a soft spoken man, young at heart, and a loving father. One May Day the children heard a knock at the front door which was seldom used. Slow in deciding who should answer it, the door was opened and there were three May Baskets and no one there. Delighted with the homemade baskets, showing their mother, who had secretly made them, how they were constructed with sewn cardboard and covered with colorful crepe-paper, they didn't see their father jump over the calf pasture fence catching his toe and going head over heels as he hurried away not knowing that no one was chasing him. The conversation in the house was that maybe the Beach children, Afton, Kenneth, and Alice, who were neighbors two miles away, had made them and left them at the door.

Wanting the best education available for his children, Tom began sending them to Douglas schools in preference to the country school where the teachers changed frequently. In 1920 Tom's family lived at Verley's in Douglas while the children attended the North Grade School. In 1921 Mamie and the children resided at the Scott Hamilton house while Tom remained on the ranch.

Then two winters were spent in D. D. Caley's front apartment and all three children were in the South Grade School. Martha Caley became a dear friend. For the 1924-1925 school year, when Emly and Edwin had Charles Roush, a ranch neighbor, for their sixth grade teacher, they resided at the Cook house. The latter was where a new son, Charles William Pexton, was born in February. The following summer on June 20, 1925, Tom sold the ranch for $15,000.00 to Mrs. Etta Angell Hart who had a dairy ranch and raised horses.

There was an auction held at the ranch on September 1, 1925 for all the farm implements and livestock. The children's horse, "Hammet", was previously spoken for and sold to Tom's nephew, Lisle Pexton, for his son, Charles. The furniture was crated and with other household goods filled half a boxcar going by rail to California where Mamie's sister, who had written of the opportunities and mild climate, lived.

Purchasing a new 1925 four-door sedan, with ruxel gear, the Tom Pexton Family drove to Santa Rosa, California by way of Eugene, Oregon to visit Annie Pexton Bulmer, Tom's oldest sister. A third son, Ned Arden Pexton, was born in July 1927 to complete Tom's family of five children. Residing in Santa Rosa, Mamie passed away in 1937 and Tom in 1945.

Peyton, Albert and Pauline Family

The Anglum-Peyton families arrived in Wyoming from Ireland via Stratford, Ontario, Canada and Boone and Ayreshire, Iowa.

The sudden unexpected death of father Thomas Peyton, and the lack of legal inheritance rights for women leaving mother Mary Anglum Peyton frustrated about the care of seven children and two step-children, led young Albert William to hop a freight to Wyoming in 1893. Laughing blue-eyed, brown-haired Albert had been born in Boone, Iowa, May 24, 1879, but Wyoming was the home of his heart.

Established in the Kirby Hotel, which was operated by his cousins in Glenrock, Albert felt that he had reached manhood capable of handling the world.

Glenrock was a lively mining town with a rip-roaring payday every two weeks. Albert and a young cohort felt very adult playing pool on a brawling payday night. Suddenly the fight between a Polish and an Irish miner erupted into the pool room. The boys were paralyzed, but as the Polish contender turned toward Albert, the boy swung his cue with all his might, laying the miner out. The terrified boys streaked for home with Albert convinced that he had killed the man. Albert crawled between the featherbed and mattress and spent the night in terror. His cousin, Maggie, had heard the story and knew that the miner had not been injured. When she saw the quivering mass of featherbed, she made the best of a fine joke.

Albert tried his hand in the mines for two weeks, pitying himself and the little donkeys that worked in the mines. He always said that underground was no place for man nor beast. Albert was convinced that the foreman for the next two weeks was always determined by the payday fight.

Albert decided that the life of a cowboy was for him as he was well acquainted with animals and had ridden all of his life. However, he could not bear to see an animal mistreated and often had a fracas with a freighter who was beating his team. The VR Ranch was Albert's home for some time and he enjoyed all of the community dances.

Whenever a posse was called, Albert joined if possible. Albert was fascinated by the law and studied Wyoming law books like later youngsters read "Whiz Bang."

When sheep raising became an established industry, shearing became highly competitive and profitable. The shearing was done with hand shears and bets were sometimes placed on the shearers. This profession gave Albert an opportunity to travel about the state.

Near the turn of the century, John, Albert's half-brother, came to Glenrock to operate a grocery store. John married Alma "Allie" Businger, March 2, 1898. Allie operated a ready-to-wear shop in Glenrock for several years. Kirby, their son, was born in 1902. After several years, the John Peytons moved to Glendora, California.

By the turn of the century, the Douglas social life was attracting young people. Dances, programs, plays and band concerts were held in the Opera House. The Episcopal, Catholic, Methodist and Congregational Churches were thriving. Whist was becoming the rage. Men on Second Street indulged in poker and hi-low-jack and the game.

The cowboys kept neat through the Chinese laundry. Their laundryman, like Bret Harte's "Heathen Chinese" loved to play poker but was honest and usually lucky. The laundryman wore a queue of which he was inordinately proud and which was a constant source of teasing from the cowboys. One night the Chinese was unusually lucky, and while he was engrossed in the play, someone slipped behind him and snipped off the queue. The Chinese immediately left the game with considerable winnings and was never seen in Douglas again. No one knew whether it was the loss of his queue or that his winnings had made him a victim of foul play. Anyway, the cowboys who liked to play the dandy for the Douglas girls were furious over the loss of their laundryman and friend.

Albert was working for George Bolln Co. when he married Pauline E. "Lena" Smith, May 3, 1902. The wedding was solemnized by B. J. Erwin at the North Fourth Street home of the bride's mother. The couple bought a small three bedroom house on South Fifth Street but soon moved to the Pleasant Valley Ranch. Albert spent spare time working on the LaPrele Dam as well as the Brenning Basin oil ventures.

The Peytons belonged to the Douglas Social Club, Good Roads Club and participated in the musical and dramatic events popular in the community.

Their auburn-haired son, Albert Lester, later known as "Pete," was born June 6, 1903. He learned riding, hunting and fishing at an early age. Probably the first sheep to be raised on the ranch were "Henry" and "Jake", two bum lambs which Henry Brenning and Jake Schneider gave to Lester. The rams became unusually large and gave the community much entertainment because they fancied that they were watch dogs.

Albert's sister, Gertrude, who had been a bank teller in Iowa, had contracted tuberculosis. She came to Wyoming to see if the dry climate would improve her health. When two younger girls, Ella and Ida developed the disease, Albert's mother, Mary, decided to move the family to Wyoming. Ed and Bernard, who had finished at St. Thomas Academy, Marguerite, the eldest who had been in Montana and Mary's father, John Anglum, who had been born in Ireland in 1810, completed the family.

Mary built a home on South Sixth Street. In spite of trying various western states, Gertrude, Ella and Ida all succumbed within five years. John Anglum died in 1905.

Mary invested in several businesses including a used furniture store and a building of small apartments. Marguerite operated a needlework and art shop and taught china painting.

Ed and Bernard (Birney) participated in local athletics as well as social affairs. In 1907, Ed joined the Navy. Bernard passed the examination for railway clerk and went to Cheyenne.

Pauline M., the second child of Albert and Pauline E. (better known as "Lena" much to her disgust) came as something of a shock to the family when she arrived May 23, 1911. The Old Timers honored Ed Smith by inviting Lena to attend their 1911 meeting at fair time. She attended with baby, Pauline.

Albert ran for sheriff and served the 1912-13 term. Albert and Lena moved into a house on Third and Oak Streets. Albert used his own horses for transportation and often set after desperadoes by himself; his gun was a colt cylinder action with a terrific kick. He used the gun effectively to bring in some rustlers who had sent him a threatening note.

Hub Southwick was Al's deputy; if Al set out alone, he left a note for Hub to join him or to get a posse if necessary. Robbery and rustling were the primary problems. The Mormon Canyon area was a popular hideout. Sometimes, tin-horn gamblers or too much booze caused shoot-'em-ups. Brothels were quite well controlled. At times the inmates of the little red brick jail (high school rodeo office, now) did disturb the peace; but the horror of drug abuse was absent.

The public generally supported law enforcement officers and respected the law. Dances had bouncers and did not allow boozing at the ball. Men knew where to go for ladies-of-the-night and women and children were not molested. The object was to protect the public from the law-breaker rather than to protect the criminal from the public.

At this time, Albert's youngest brother, Bernard, married Lena's youngest sister, Elvira, and they soon followed Mary and Marguerite who had moved to Montana. However, Elvira and Birney took care that their children, Edna Mae, Richard, Madeen and Robert were born in Douglas.

1914 brought a new project; Al and Waldo Bolln opened a grocery store. Some Douglasites may remember blocks of maple sugar and small glass windows in the counter with cookies that said NBC. They had a Model T delivery truck. Men from throughout the state dropped in to compare ideas. Old Lady Abe came with a black stocking full of silver dollars. Bob Carey and John Kendrick could be seen exchanging thoughts and jokes with Douglas men as they leaned against a counter and Dutch Phelan draped over the stool that was his perch.

War came. Elvira came back to sing "Over There" with the Douglas band at the railroad station. People shouted and marched and knitted grey wristlets, but the excitement couldn't alleviate the pain when Al sold his interest in the store and joined the army in 1917. Ed Peyton scoured the bottom of the North Sea in the submarine corps.

At home, Lena made bread and mixed Klim. She ran for clerk of court and lost by 27 votes; thanks, said the politicians, to the misguided campaigning of her seven year old daughter.

The men were all tired when they came home. The ranch seemed the best place to be. Uncle Jim Smith and John Paull and Billy Howard came to visit and talked about the Civil War. Lester and Mike Roush fished and took the Model T apart. Al raised fine oats, alfalfa and potatoes; and taught his daughter how to know the wild animals.

R. L. Markley, "Red," was superintendent of schools. He taught the boys to play football, basketball, and go out for track. They went from awful to superior. Lester won state championship in discus and javelin. After graduating from high school, Lester went to Billings Business College and then to work for Mountain Bell.

In 1922 Al was elected sheriff again. He still cared about people and justice and the law. In the ten years which had elapsed since Al's first term, many changes had taken place.

Rustlers and horse thieves were still at work, but there was no worry about vigilantes stringing them up. Robbers were still at work but train robbers weren't common. Thieves and robbers used the train to get to and from the Sandbar, Casper's infamous bottom. Mormon Canyon was a haven for the lawless but now bootleggers were captured in the vicinity.

Al's family moved into the sheriff's residence and duty was not just 24 hours a day for Al; it was for the whole family, but they loved it. There was no welfare nor job service. People brought their problems to the sheriff. Many new homesteaders had come to Wyoming with neither resources nor knowledge of the land. Al couldn't neglect their worries. Sarah Morton told him to send groceries to the needy and charge them to her.

Cars had replaced horses but there were very few "good graveled roads." There were no Wyoming driver's licenses nor speed limits, just the need to get places in a hurry. Matt Berg who came from the Canadian Mounties to be under-sheriff said that he rode on the running board for the first six months he knew Al. Matt bought Zip, the largest registered German police dog in the United States. When he got to Douglas, Zip joined the Peyton family. Finally, Matt laughingly gave the dog to Pauline. A big red-haired cowboy with a terrific smile was George "Red" Smith, deputy sheriff.

Prohibition - nobody wanted it; but it made a terrible impact upon the law. Teetotalers began to experiment with bathtub gin and home brew. Everybody with a bottle of brandy in the house began to feel guilty, resentful or devilish. Good people began to identify with law breakers. It was hard to get a conviction on anything.

Alcoholics stumbled around with "jake leg", ate canned heat, drank anything. Harmless old men became monsters; one bit a great big hunk out of Al's hand when he was trying to take him to get sobered up.

Federal agents created scheduling problems; generally they were a good lot, but sometimes their mere presence suggested a raid. It was essential for county officers to cooperate, particularly those of Converse and Natrona. The Sandbar became a haven for federal vice. Mobsters created a ring with Chicago, Kansas City and the Sandbar as depots for car theft, white slavery and booze, often "micky finns." Criminals escaped from San Quentin and racketeers on the run made for the security of the Sandbar and Converse County was on the way. Stories of officers cooperating with bootleggers or taking a private stock home were false during Al's terms.

Raids were many and varied. Sometimes it was necessary for officers to spend two or three nights in the cold, waiting for moonshiners to return to their place of business. Then it was necessary to get the coil or the whole thing could be lost time. Without the coil, moonshiners claimed that they were making hog mash (with the nearest hog in Nebraska.) At a trial, a weeping wife would appear with all of the kids in the neighborhood to show how difficult it was to feed their family (they would have had to have them in litters.)

The largest still captured in Converse County was operated by some Greeks newly arrived in the United States with a lifetime knowledge of making good liquor. The still was raided on the first run and all of the officers deplored the necessity because so many bootleggers were making poison; but the law made no distinction.

At approximately the same time as the above raid, a black man in Glenrock was arrested for operating two stills; one was an old fire extinguisher, the other a tin milk can. When the district attorney asked the bootlegger if he drank the booze from the milk can, he answered, "Lawd, no, man, that stuff ud kill you!"

In 1923 the town council and people of Lost Spring gave Al a written commendation for putting two stills in the Lost Spring area out of business. One was fifty gallon, the other 20 gallon with 350 gallons of mash.

John Mihas from Casper came to Douglas in a car without a license. Sheriff Peyton arrested Mihas and told him to go to the city jail. When Peyton stepped on the running board of the car, Mihas stuck a gun in his ribs and threatened to blow him to kingdom come. Peyton knocked the gun out of Mihas hand and took him to jail. Mihas had come to town to interest himself in behalf of two bootleggers who had been arrested for operating a still seven miles southwest of town. Judge Arnold fined Mihas $35.00 for threatening the sheriff.

The saddest and most exhausting time of Al's terms came with the Cole Creek train wreck when the sheriff spent a week on the cold river looking for bodies, many of them friends. Al spent the next week with pneumonia.

One local couple had a habit of quarreling at three o'clock in the morning and calling the sheriff to protect one or the other. When Al arrived they would refuse to file a complaint. Finally he told them that he was no referee and that if they did this again he would arrest them both; a remarkable cure for marital difficulties.

One man in Shawnee had been a frequent nuisance to his neighbors and the officers. He finally shot himself in the head during a blizzard. The trains and roads were all blocked by snow. In his Buick Al went after the man. It seemed impossible for the man to survive and when they got to the Douglas hospital it was found that the bullet could not be removed. The injured man recovered and Al thought that he had more sense than ever before.

One morning a ghostly pale Lena wakened her daughter at 5 a.m.; a telephone call had informed her that there had been a shooting, either someone had shot Al or vice versa. It was seven o'clock before the family discovered that Al had killed Fred Van Gorden who had murdered his wife and son in Casper. Van Gorden was a Camp Perry marksman who fired first; Al thought that it was a miracle that he had survived. Al did not like to kill anything and the shock of the shootout in the LaBonte Hotel caused him much suffering.

When the county began to plant sugar beets, a new threat came to the community; marijuana. A short time after the plant appeared in 1927 a dance hall opened in an old laundry building, a nickel a dance. Little bottles of a clear fragrant liquid were given to the kids and later sold for 15 cents. The liquids was a dip for cigarettes. Fights and strange behavior began to appear among normally well-behaved youths. Al began a campaign against the drug.

A saddle thief was picked up in Cody. Ed Lambert and Mr. Benham brought him to Douglas. They ate lunch at Thermopolis. When the thief came out of the restroom, he was sniffing; as they drove through the canyon he increased his sniffing. By the time they were out of the canyon he was hallucinating. He fancied that the trees in the distance were giant rabbits. He thought that the rabbits were trying to attack him and was wild by the time they reached Douglas. He had been sniffing cocaine which appeared a few times later among prisoners.

Two young "clothing salesmen" registered at the LaBonte. They were well dressed, good-looking young men and they soon appeared at the dances. With all the latest steps, they were popular. They only seemed to show the clothes to two young girls, but they stayed in town too long. One day the girls disappeared but the "pimps" had underestimated the girls' supervision and a frantic mother contacted Al who called the Casper sheriff. Fortunately the word got out in Casper that Al was after the men and they took off for Chicago. The locals in the white-slave ring didn't want to get involved. Al and the Casper sheriff searched the likely spots but it was three days before they found the girls locked in a room on the top floor of the Virginia Hotel. The girls had thought that they were eloping. They had been drugged and their swains had gone looking for a sale, never to return. Strangely enough, this was very similar to the story of the best known madam in Douglas. She had not been as fortunate as the two Douglas high school girls.

Al loved young people and found time to take them to football and basketball games, swimming and picnics. Lena found time to provide parties and feeds, sponsor the girls' cavalry as well as American Legion scholarship programs and Episcopal activities. Both of them preferred to have the young entertained at home.

Pfeifer, Andreas and Anna Family

Andreas (Andrew) Pfeifer was born in Baden-Baden, Germany on December 1, 1865. As a young man he came to the United States to join his two older brothers, Joseph and Louis, and his older sister, Mary, who had immigrated earlier.

Mary, born October 20, 1859, was married to William

Andrew and Anna Pfeifer on their wedding day 1907

Louis Pfeifer 1900

Werner in 1885. Werner had been born in Achem Baden, Germany, November 11, 1854. The couple settled near Inez, Wyoming.

All three of the brothers homesteaded land near Orpha, Wyoming. Joseph sold his share to Fred Hildebrand in 1904, moving then to Mexico City, Missouri where he married and raised a family.

Louis lived on his claim until 1927 when, due to failing health, he too disposed of his land to Fred Hildebrand and moved into Douglas. He built a small house on property owned by his brother, Andrew, and lived there until his death in 1929. He is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

Andrew was married on April 2, 1907 to Anna Holtcamp. Anna was born February 8, 1886 in Coberly, Germany, the daughter of Joseph and Annie Eicogle Holtcamp. Andrew and Anna lived on the homestead until 1912. Their first two daughters were born there. He sold his land to Fred Hildebrand and bought property in Douglas located on North Fourth Street. In 1914 he bought the Shoe Repair Shop which belonged to B. Bucelowsky and was located on Center Street. He operated his business alone until 1929 when he took a shoe salesman, Herman Vander Griend, of Lincoln, Nebraska to be his partner. They sold shoes as well as repairing them and soon opened a candy and cigar store next to the shoe shop.

After the partnership dissolved, Andrew continued to operate the Shoe Repair Shop until his death on February 9, 1938. He is buried next to his brother, Louis, in the Douglas cemetery.

Andrew and Anna were the parents of four daughters, Edna Ann, Emma Catherine, Clara Agnes and Helen Elizabeth. All of the children received their education in the Douglas school system.

Edna Anne Pfeifer was born September 12, 1908 and died September 20, 1978 as a result of an automobile accident which also claimed the life of her husband, Walter L. Alexander, Sr. The couple had married on November 30, 1925. They had three children: Walter L. Jr., Donald, and Shirley.

Emma Catherine was born on October 2, 1910. She was married in 1929 to Sigfrid E. Olson. Olson was born in Jamtland, Sweden. He was employed by the railroad after coming to the United States. Later he engaged in the carpentry business. To this union a daughter, Delores Loretta, and a son, Charles Darryl, were born. Emma and Sigfrid were divorced in 1949 after which she married John Paul Williams who owns and operates a ranch northeast of Douglas. Emma was active in many community endeavors, serving as Superintendent of the Culinary Department of the Wyoming State Fair for 34 years.

Clara Agnes, born February 8, 1913 began a career as a beautician before she finished high school. She called the shop, which was located next door to her father's shoe shop, the Polly Prim. After completing her high school education she attended the Washington School of Cosmetology.

She was married to Roy Van Pelt in 1931, divorced in 1936; married to Jesse Martin Kraner in 1942, divorced in 1952; married to William C. Hamilton in 1952 and widowed in 1974. Her final marriage was to Gordon Fitzhugh in 1980. She was widowed in 1981. Clara lived with her mother from 1974 to 1979 at Irwin Towers. Since Fitzhugh's death she has made her home in Yuba City, California.

Helen Elizabeth was born August 8, 1914. She was married to Byron Simonson but divorced him in 1940. They were the parents of one daughter. Helen was married for the second time to Roy Amick in 1940. Roy had a son by a previous marriage. Roy and Helen were the parents of a daughter. The marriage ended in divorce in 1946. In 1946 Helen was married to C. William (Bill) Brock. They were the parents of one daughter. Bill was engaged in the ranching business in Wyoming. Later they moved to Nevada and continued in that business. Bill passed away in April of 1985.

Anna and Andrew were members of the Catholic Church and raised all their children in that faith. Anna was married to Edward Hunter in 1940. They made their home in Douglas. Mr. Hunter died on December 6, 1957 and Anna lived in the family home until she moved to Irwin Towers in 1974. She died in 1979 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

The Pfeifers had eight grandchildren and two step-grandchildren.

Philbrick, Oscar and Lizzie Family

Frank Hutchinson Philbrick, born April 8, 1880 in Grinnell, Iowa, came to Wyoming in 1898 and died November 1941.

Frank first worked for U.S. Grant and then at other ranches around the area.

Frank married Mary Ann Sullivan, June 14, 1909 at her folks' home on LaPrele Creek (Will and Nora Sullivan.) She was born October 6, 1887 at Granite Canyon, Wyoming.

Mary came to Converse County in a covered wagon from Granite Canyon near Cheyenne.

Frank bought the Johnson ranch on Boxelder Creek where they first lived in a two-story log home. Two boys were born here, William Nathan, born March 8, 1910 and Lawrence Frank "Buzz", born August 15, 1911.

Frank's father, Oscar Nathan Philbrick, (born 1851, died 1921), and wife, Lizzie, came to Laramie where Lizzie's sister lived. Grandmother died about this time and is buried at Laramie. After a visit there, Grandfather came on to spend time with us.

Grandfather then located in Glenrock and took a job hauling mail from Glenrock to Boxelder, a job he had for many years.

In 1913 Dad bought the Charley Smith ranch on Boxelder Creek. He bought the ranch from his brother-in-law Ray Pierce and we moved to the ranch. It is still known as the Philbrick Ranch.

We raised cattle, hogs, turkeys and chickens. Mother sold milk, cream, cheese, eggs and chickens for immediate cash. In the fall we shipped cattle.

Three more children were born in this union, James H. (January 13, 1915), Noramae (May 22, 1922) and Mary Ann, 1925 who died at birth.

I only went to school through the eighth grade. I then went to work that summer stacking hay for Charley Grant and other neighbors. In 1937 I went to work in the oil fields and when the second World War started I was called into the service. After returning from the service, I went back to the oil fields and was sent to Lance Creek. While in Lance Creek, I met and married Mary Larsen, December 15, 1944.

In 1945 I went to work for Standard Oil Company of Indiana in Midwest, Wyoming. I stayed in Midwest until after my retirement in 1972. In 1977 we moved to our present home in Torrington.

Buzz finished high school and then went to Coyne Electric School in Chicago. After graduating he returned home and went to work for the Careyhurst Ranch which was later sold to W. E. Bixby. The ranch was managed by Buzz for four years during World War II.

Buzz married Beatrice Burks, May 31, 1939. Two boys were born to this union; Larry F. (born December 10, 1941) and James R. (August 17, 1944.)

Buzz and Bea then leased the I.G. Phillips Ranch where they lived until they bought the Edwards Ranch five miles south of Douglas on Bedtick Creek. They then moved there with their family. Buzz and Bea still reside there.

As the boys grew older, Buzz bought more land from

Fred Manning and Olins to enlarge the ranch.

Larry married Jeri Lee Olson and is now engaged in ranching with his father.

James went to college and became an electrical engineer and now works for Nerco Company and is located in Gillette.

My brother, James, grew up on my folks' ranch on Boxelder Creek, attended school at the old log school house located at Fred Grant's ranch.

James' great love was horses, so we always had many horses around. He broke many horses to ride and drive. He worked for Harry Yesness at his ranch near Casper and also the Careyhurst Ranch.

In 1937 he returned to the home ranch and lived there until his death in 1985.

James married Ruth Putnam in 1943 and to this union were born two daughters; Ella Marie and Sarah Ann.

Mother and Noramae then moved to Douglas where Noramae went to work in the courthouse. She worked there until she married John Pexton, October 2, 1948.

John and Noramae Pexton lived on their own ranch on LaBonte. They had five children. Noramae passed away July 9, 1972. Mary Ann Philbrick passed away September 30, 1955.

Phillips Family

My brothers, George, Charles, Warren and Cecil Phillips and I, Velma (Steckley), played a small part in the heritage of Converse County, Wyoming.

Our father, George, was a baby when his parents,

Charles Phillips standing in front of his sod house on his homestead in Wyoming, 1930.

Frank and Margaret (Fox) Phillips, natives of Pennsylvania, came to Nebraska, making the journey in a covered wagon. They settled south of Alliance in 1887. George grew up there. When he became of age, he filed on a homestead in Cherry County, Nebraska in 1900. He married Jessie Piester on June 4, 1900. Her grandfather was one of the earliest settlers of La Salle County, Illinois, settling there in 1847. Jessie was six years old when her parents, Benjamin and Amanda (Hadley) Piester, natives of Illinois, came by covered wagon to Nebraska and first settled west of Alliance in 1886. Later they moved to Cherry County and filed on a homestead in 1899.

George and Jessie started their life together on George's 640 acres of land with ten head of cattle Jessie's father gave her. They increased their acreage of land and herds of cattle over the years. They reared a family of 13 children, six of whom survive.

We children whose names head this sketch were raised on the ranch and received our early education in a rural school. The older boys in their early teens hired out as ranch hands on large cattle ranches, when not needed to help at home. When they became of age, they had an intense desire to own some land they could call their own, establish a home, be self-employed and independent. There was no land open for homesteading and no land for sale in Nebraska in the 1920's.

Homestead days began on a spring day in the late 1920's when we were all at home. My brother, George, had been to Mullen and had heard there was free land in Wyoming still open for homesteading. He contacted a homesteader from Wyoming, then visiting in Mullen, Nebraska, who told him there was free land north of Douglas, Wyoming open for homesteading. One could file on 640 acres, establish a home, put improvements on the place, live on it for three years and the land would be his.

The spring of 1929, George, Charles, Warren, Cecil and two friends, Gerald Hineman and Ivar Rawles packed their belongings in a truck and left for Wyoming to take up claims. They took up homesteads in the same area 55 miles north of Douglas near Verse. Verse consisted of a country store and post office, owned and operated by William Boehler.

They built sod houses, added other improvements with expectation of owning land and a home of their own.

In 1930 I made my first trip to Wyoming on a visit. As I stood at the door of Cecil's soddy, gazing across the rolling plains, covered with sagebrush, observing the antelope wandering across the open spaces, I recall asking Cecil why he homesteaded on such worthless land. He told me then there was coal and oil beneath the land and someday there would be a need for it. He never lived to witness the truth of those words. I later learned that all the good land along streams and valleys had been homesteaded long before the late 1920's.

Cecil obtained a five month leave of absence to return to Nebraska in the fall of 1930 to trap for fur bearing animals. Their hides were worth a good price at that time.

It was while Cecil was in Nebraska that he met and later married Elizabeth Cain, a school teacher from Omaha, Nebraska, on September 3, 1931. They came to Wyoming to make his homestead their permanent home, but that never materialized. Cecil became ill in December, and as they planned on going to Omaha, Nebraska, to visit her parents at Christmas time, they went early so Cecil could get medical aid. He entered the hospital soon after they arrived. He passed away January 11, 1932. His wife relinquished his homestead claim and remained in Omaha with her parents.

Several weeks after Cecil's death, Charles and I came to Douglas to settle Cecil's estate. Ed Ewel advised me to contest his land and refile. The contest papers were drawn up later in January 1932. Two years later I received notice the contest was in my favor. I then filed a homestead claim on the land in January 1934. I intended to live the required length of time on the place, receive a patent and then sell the land. I had no intention of making that place 55 miles from a town, my permanent home.

George was now thinking of having a wife and family of his own. He chose for his bride a local girl, Lucille Gladson, daughter of Elmer and Verna Gladson. George and Lucille were married April 15, 1933, at Hot Springs, South Dakota.

Due to the depression and drought, there were not jobs in Converse County for everyone. Charles and I obtained a leave of absence to return to Nebraska, where we had jobs, Charles to his on the ranch, and I to teach school near Merriman, Nebraska.

While in Nebraska, Charles was united in marriage to Edna Hull, daughter of George and Jessie Hull, on December 21, 1935, at Hot Springs, South Dakota. They then returned to Wyoming to establish residence on his homestead.

I married Lou Steckley, a native of Geddes, South Dakota, on July 6, 1934. We did not come to Wyoming to make what once was Cecil's residence our permanent home until May 9, 1936. Soon after we arrived, my husband went to work with the Verse crew on the WPA Government Program, building reservoirs, using a four horse team on a Fresno. He borrowed one team from William Boehler and the other team from Robert Hardy. For the use of the horses he gave Mr. Boehler and Mr. Hardy half of the money the government allowed for each team.

Cecil had 60 acres of the land fenced. It enclosed the buildings and had been used for a horse pasture. The land to the north and east was open range. Mortons Incorporated ran sheep and cattle on the land. The rest of my land was not fenced so we leased to Mortons Incorporated for several years, until we had a need for it. Very few of the homesteaders living in that vicinity had all their land fenced. A few had fenced a small horse pasture. What few stock they owned ran on open range.

The vicinity was thickly settled with homesteaders when we first came to live in Wyoming. Our nearest neighbor lived a half mile to the west. The Verse store and post office was three miles away. We were not experiencing the struggle and hardships of those sturdy pioneers who earlier came west to build homes.

Ivar Rawles, George and Cecil Phillips are getting ready to leave for Wyoming to file on homestead claims. 1929

We dug a well, but the water was unfit for drinking. We hauled water for drinking and household use. We never went visiting without taking our water barrels along. We used the well water to water a small garden. We later built a large reservoir and constructed an irrigation system so we could raise vegetables and other products for use during the summer and can enough for winter use. We depended on sage chickens, antelope and deer for meat. We soon began raising chickens and turkeys for meat and to sell for the much needed money.

The roads were best described as trails. The road north of Douglas was paved the first 17 miles, then graded the other 38 miles to Verse. When it got wet, some places became impassable. If a rain cloud came up while in Douglas, people would hurry home hoping to make it before the rain. The side roads were trails. A paved highway from Douglas to Gillette was finally completed around 1945.

Neighbors exchanged help on jobs that were hard for one person to do alone. When cutting and storing ice for summer use, several neighbors lent a hand. Ice boxes were used for keeping food from spoiling. There was no electricity and no refrigerators.

People seldom locked their houses when they were gone. A cowboy or someone passing through was welcome to help himself to a cup of coffee and a snack. A thank you note left on the table told who was there. In those days seldom did anything turn up missing.

Due to the great depression and drought years of the 1920-1939, many settlers' and ranchers' crops failed. With no jobs available, they became discouraged, gave up their land and moved away, or sold it back to the government before patent, or after patent to more successful neighbors. Prices the government paid for land was based on the value of the land, improvements made, how long the owner had lived on it and if it was sold before or after patent. The average price ranged from $1.00 to $1.25 per acre.

Many settlers sold and moved away, including George, Charles, Warren and their two friends, Gerald and Ivar. George, his wife and two daughters moved to LaCleda, Idaho where he owned and operated a garage and filling station. He later owned and operated the North Idaho Drillers until he suffered a heart attack and died June 9, 1962.

Charles and his wife moved to Casper. He owned and operated the Phillips Tire Shop until 1951. After that, he owned and operated a lawn mower repair service up until the time of his death on September 23, 1963.

Warren sold to Mick Hardy. He enlisted in the Army in World War II in 1942 and served in Unit 1059 Combat Engineers for five years. He bought a place at Harper, Oregon, where he owned and operated the Phillips Gas Station and Mechanic Shop for years. He never married. He is now semi-retired and runs a few sheep on his place, raises a big garden and cares for his fruit orchard.

My husband and I decided to be with the thrifty ones and stay. With faith, courage and determination we looked forward to brighter days.

The government was to allot government land to the people that stayed so they could make a living. We purchased two milk cows to freshen soon, which would provide us with dairy products and milk for bum lambs.

Henry Thomas and John Wohlford gave their lambs to us rather than let them starve. The ewe lambs we kept to get a start in the sheep business, and the wether lambs we sold in the fall for extra cash.

Our son Donald Eugene arrived May 9, 1938 to brighten our home. We now had need to expand, so we added a frame kitchen, pantry and sun porch onto the south side of the house.

My husband Lou joined the Verse shearing crew and sheared sheep in the spring for a number of years. We both worked for Jesse Morsch at the Antelope Coal Mine during the winter of 1941-1942. Lou worked in the mine and I cooked for the hired help. Coal was loaded by hand on the truck.

During World War II many men were called to serve their country and there was a need for teachers. I went back to teaching school in January 1943 and completed 30½ years as a school teacher in Converse County, Wyoming.

Donald's first eight years of schooling were in the rural schools. He was a very active, six year member of 4-H.

We lived on the homestead for 15 years. When Donald was ready for high school in 1952 we purchased a home in Douglas and a few years later made Douglas our permanent residence.

I still own the land, and with the help of grandchildren, it is still in operation.

Donald graduated from the Douglas high school in May 1956. He married Janice Faye Cole, daughter of Elvin and Cora (Lees) Cole of Douglas, on November 22, 1956. They have two daughters, Janet Louise, now Mrs. Danny Martin of Guernsey and Donita Jean, now Mrs. Fred Kirchhefer of Douglas.

I'm proud to be numbered among the pioneers of Converse County and to be a part of the things they stood for: the courage, the fairness, the neighborliness, with faith and strength of spirit.

Pickinpaugh, Ralph and Susie

John W. Pickinpaugh and Pearl May Gregg Pickinpaugh raised their family of nine children on a farm near Alton, Kansas. One of their sons, Ralph, was born in Alton, Kansas in 1894; he received his education in Kansas and Iowa. When Ralph was a teenager, his family moved to Stuart, Nebraska, where his father farmed on a rental basis. In the fall of 1915, Ralph came to Wyoming to homestead. His claim was located in the Shawnee community. He began the procedure of proving up, constructing the required dwelling, and plowing the necessary acreage. The original homestead house still stands after all these years.

In April of 1916, Ralph returned to Stuart, Nebraska, to claim his sweetheart as his bride. Susie Mildred Humphreys Pickinpaugh was the daughter of Joseph Oscar and Maryetta Hinkley Humphreys, one of several children. She was born in 1898 in Stuart, and received her education there.

Ralph and Susie traveled by train to Shawnee, arriving there on June 4, 1916, to begin their lives on the homestead. They farmed, and, in addition, raised cattle and sheep. During the next several years, six children were born to them. They are: Mary (Bunning); Susie (Lee); Helen (Scott), deceased; Goldie (Wright); Floyd, deceased; and on March 26, 1924, the last child Johnie K. was born.

All the Pickinpaugh children were educated in Shawnee; they completed high school in Douglas.

Through the years, the Pickinpaughs acquired several adjacent homesteads increasing their acreage.

Johnie served in the armed forces in World War II, returning home in 1946 to become engaged in the ranching business with his father. In 1944, Johnie married Patricia Rodgers. The couple had three children: Pamala (Anderson) of Glenrock; Kenneth; and Vicki (Willey) of Riverton.

In 1966, Ralph and Susie celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary, after which they turned most of the working operation of the ranch over to Johnie and semi-retired. They continued to live in their home on the ranch.

Patricia passed away on February 26, 1971. Ralph died October 12, 1971.

In 1972, Johnie bought the original homestead and has since added more acreage to the ranch. He and Kenneth operate the ranch together.

In 1976, Johnie married Elizabeth "Liz" Stanford. Prior to her marriage, she cooked in several Douglas restaurants including the LaBonte Hotel and Country Inn. Liz has developed her artistic talent, as well as helping on the ranch and with the grandchildren. She has completed many beautiful paintings. Her subject matter deals mainly with landscapes and old buildings which are found in the rural areas, and for which she obviously has a deep affection and understanding.

Susie remained in her home until 1982 when she entered Michael Manor due to failing health.

Johnie was an ASCS employee for a number of years; now he serves on the local Soil Conservation District board.

Picklesimer Family

Archie Picklesimer was the first of the family to come to Wyoming, coming in 1900.

Archie was the son of Thomas W. and Margaret Green Picklesimer. He was born in Highlands, North Carolina in 1879. He, or his Dixie Sheep Company, owned the following lands: Cow Creek Ranch, located near the Cow Creek Buttes northeast of Douglas; Taylor Patterson Ranch on LaBonte Creek (purchased in 1915); the Guthrie or Gibson Ranch on West Fork LaBonte Creek; and Ullman Park, southwest of Esterbrook, was owned for a short time before his death.

He never married. Archie's death in 1935 was the result of an auto accident that occurred near his ranch on LaBonte. The vehicle in which he was riding met another vehicle on the top of a hill on the nearby county road and Archie was fatally injured.

Several of his nephews and one niece were also in Converse County. They were: Archie Alexander, Harry, Haywood, and Tom Picklesimer, and Greta Picklesimer Edwards.

L. to r. Fred Edwards, Marion Watson and Michael Shonsey 1935

Archie Alexander, the son of George and Zelia Picklesimer Alexander, was born in 1902 in Lake Toxaway, North Carolina. He came to Wyoming in 1919 and herded sheep in the Lysite, Wyoming area before coming to his uncle's place north of Douglas. He eventually owned the Cow Creek Ranch. He died in Douglas in 1979.

Harry Picklesimer, the son of DeWit and Shellie Miller Picklesimer, was born in 1903 in Highlands, North Carolina. Coming to Wyoming in 1920, he worked for his Uncle Archie and for his cousin, Haywood Picklesimer. Harry is living in Highlands in 1985.

Greta Picklesimer Edwards, the daughter of DeWit and Shellie Picklesimer, was born in Highlands in 1897. She came to Converse County in 1920 with her husband, Ed Edwards, and homesteaded on Lightning Creek.

Greta married Ed F. Edwards on December 25, 1919. They had one son, Fred "Brevity", and one daughter, Lucille.

The Edwards lived for a time on the "Dad" Morton place on LaBonte Creek. Fred and Lucille attended school at the White School while the family lived there.

Fred married Virginia Dawes, the daughter of Jim and Alice Snyder Dawes. They moved to Jordon, Montana where they lived on a ranch. Fred died in October 1970.

Lucille married Dennis Irwin, son of Charles and Ruth Irwin. Lucille died on March 13, 1979.

Ed died in December 1964; Greta on September 8, 1983.

Haywood Picklesimer, son of Henry and Effie Alley Picklesimer, was born in Highlands, North Carolina on July 3, 1902. Converse County became his permanent home in 1923 when he homesteaded at the foot of Eagle Peak in the Laramie Mountains. He married Ruby Gunn Paige on October 24, 1949. Ruby had one daughter, Elnora (Payne Brow), by a previous marriage. Haywood died on June 8, 1970; Ruby on March 10, 1970.

Tom Picklesimer, son of Henry and Effie Alley Picklesimer, was born in 1907 in Highlands. Tom came west to join his cousins and uncle in 1927. He came by freight train and was arrested for not having a train ticket; whereupon the court sentenced him to 60 days of hard labor on a rock crew. After arriving in Wyoming he went to work for his Uncle Archie herding sheep. It was to be his life for twelve years before he returned to North Carolina.

Piraino, Guy and Rose Family

The Pirainos homesteaded in Lost Springs, Wyoming the month of October 1916. Guy built the two room log cabin. The school we attended was five miles from our home. Our transportation to school was on horseback and sometimes we had to use the horse and buggy. My parents were both born in Italy, a town called Palermo. They were married in Peru, Illinois at St. Valentines Church in 1906.

On or about 1916, Dad (Guy) and his brother, Guiseppe, went to Wyoming to homestead, which is Section 17 & 19 in Converse County. Dad farmed the land for seven years. The living conditions that my parents and family went through were a nightmare. Mom (Rose) had two miscarriages and almost died. She had to melt snow to wash our clothes. Dad dug a well; but he always hit hard rock, and it would always come up dry. So we had to haul our water on sled from a spring nearby. Because of the poor farming land and severe weather, my father decided that his family suffered enough so that was when he decided to move back east to LaSalle, Illinois and start his life over again. However, he left the homestead in care of his brother, Guiseppe. Several years later his brother had an accident with run away horses and died.

When Dad moved to LaSalle, Illinois he went to work in the coal mines. My parents had eleven children. One girl, Mamie died at the age of seven from scarlet fever. A boy, Frankie, died at the age of six months. Two boys, Tony and Joe, died in the service. Seven are still living. Dad, Guy Piraino, Sr., was born October 17, 1880. He died March 17, 1951. Mom, Rose Piraino, was born December 22, 1889. She died July 10, 1980. Joe and Tony were born in the log cabin in Lost Springs, Wyoming.

Poirot, Emile and Nevada

This is the story of Emile Joseph Poirot and his wife, Nevada Byxby. Their daughter, Mildred, was my mother. I am Patricia Spracklen Magee.

Emile came to America from Lorraine, France, where he was born July 7, 1866. During his young manhood he served in the French army and saw two years in Tripoli. He came to America in 1891 and came directly to Converse County; this became his home. He was an active member of Company F of the Wyoming National Guard. He was with the American Expeditionary Forces during the trouble in Mexico. He would have enlisted for services in World War I but his age was against him and he was sent home by the war department.

Emile and Nevada Poirot 1917

Nevada Byxby was born in Promise City, Iowa August 21, 1874. She came to Douglas and married Emile July 9, 1898. After her children were grown up and some of them married, she took out a homestead south of Douglas on the Esterbrook Road east of the old Charlie Reid place in 1930. She leased the grass out for summer pasturage. She eventually sold the place and moved back to Douglas where she lived until her death August 18, 1955. She was one of eleven children born to Sarah Elizabeth Cresey and William Richard Byxby. They were married in 1873 and lived in Wayne County, Iowa.

Emile and Nevada had five children, Leon, Mildred, Marie, Lorraine and Wilber. He took out a homestead north of Douglas near the railroad bridge on the Platte River. He had been suffering from heart trouble for a few months and died a few months before his 55th birthday on June 17, 1921. Emile and Nevada are both buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Emile had a brother, Eugene, living in Douglas. He was born September 19, 1874 in Epinal, France. He ranched in central Wyoming and on October 12, 1897 married Edith Brockway at Casper, Wyoming. They had two sons; Charles of Salem, Oregon and George of Douglas, Wyoming. One daughter, Beatrice, was born September 17, 1898. She married Fred George on January 1, 1918. She died May 11, 1935.

Pollard, Charles and Sophia

Charles A. Pollard was born in Boston, Massachusetts on April 18, 1848. Coming to the west as a young man, he resided in Alton, Illinois for a time and later in Council Bluffs, Iowa before coming to Cheyenne. In June 1878 he settled on the Laramie River some 15 miles west of Fort Laramie. The Post Sutler at Fort Laramie, John S. Collins, was associated as a partner with Charles in the Laramie River ranch operation and also on the LaBonte ranch.

On September 12, 1868 Charles married Sophia Elizabeth Jones in Omaha, Nebraska. Sophia was born in Elizabethtown, Ontario, Canada in 1843. Their children were: May Belle (died in infancy); Harry P. (born December 28, 1870, died January 12, 1958); Caroline J. (born January 14, 1873, died December 1944); and Percy Edwin (born September 25, 1874).

Coming to Albany County and what is now Converse County in 1884, the Pollard family settled on LaBonte Creek at the site of the old stage station.

U.S. Postal Service records show that Pollard became postmaster of the LaBonte Post Office on June 17, 1884. His predecessors were Joseph H. Flagalther on February 14, 1878, John Gordon on June 24, 1880, and A. Garth on September 24, 1880. The post office was discontinued from January 26, 1881 to May 4, 1881, when Billy Bacon took the position until the Pollards started.

George H. Cross Sr. tells in his memoirs the following about Flagalther, "A Belgian named Joe Flagathier (Cross' spelling of the name is different than the U.S. Postal Service records) lived in a two room building near this famous LaBonte Crossing, utilizing one room as a bar, which had everything but a brass rail and included a pool table and was a favorite stopping place for government freighters, bull whackers, mule skinner and cowboys. Jokingly they said, 'Joe freights up a barrel of alcohol from Cheyenne, after watering it down, adds a few rattlesnake heads, some coffee, red pepper and tobacco juice and sells it for 25¢ a drink. The cowboys called it 'rot gut'. Joe could have given valuable tips to more recent moonshiners for making a blend of fighting whiskey, it was said, 'The first drink was a shock, the second made a man forget his name and the third transported the wild man of Borneo to Wyoming Territory.'"

Mr. Pollard served as a Converse County Commissioner from 1889 to 1891.

Sophia died on September 30, 1893: Charles on March 31, 1895.

Harry married Jeanniene "Jennie" Olivereau on December 16, 1897. Jennie was born in Cheyenne on March 18, 1876. She came to Douglas in 1886 when her parents the "French" Olivereaus came and started the LaFayette Restaurant. Their children were: Julia (born on September 28, 1898, died on March 1966, she became a Catholic nun); Ruth (born on December 25, 1899); Elsie (born on February 19, 1912); Caroline (born on April 27, 1914); and Harry (born on June 22, 1916).

Harry and Jennie bought the LaBonte ranch in 1910. They also owned at one time the ranch where Jim Fitzhugh lives on Wagonhound Creek and the place that Dennis Daly has also on Wagonhound. They sold out in 1917 and moved to town where they bought the Bozart Harness Shop on North Second Street (it was where the City Shoe Shop is in 1985). Harry died on January 12, 1958; Jennie in June 1968.

Caroline married C. H. McWhinnie. She wrote the following story in 1939 about one of her first Christmases on LaBonte.

"The first Christmas which I can remember of having a part in was 45 years ago. At that time I was unmarried. My mother had been dead two years and my father had passed away earlier of that same year. We prepared a Christmas tree and some gifts for the children of our neighbors, the Kerns. Mrs. Kern, Sarah to me, had come to Wyoming from Ireland as a young girl of 18 and had lived with our family for several years. Since I had no real sister she had filled the place of one in my life as a girl. Several years before this particular Christmas she had married and she and her husband had settled on her homestead close by our home ranch.

"My brothers, the man who worked for us and myself got our presents and tree ready and took them, on Christmas eve, to the Kern home, about two and one half miles away. Sarah entertained the three children in the kitchen while the rest of us set up the tree, decorated it and placed the gifts about it. Decorations for a Christmas tree were limited, one couldn't just drop into the dime store and purchase the things needed. Some of the things used on the tree included long strings of red cranberries and popcorn. Another bright addition to the trimmings was made by cutting out two different lengths of straw and threading it on string separated by puffs of red tissue paper. The golden color of the straw showed up well on the green Christmas tree. Red apples and bright yellow oranges were tied to the branches of the tree as were walnuts covered with tinfoil. Several evenings preceding Christmas were spent in the big kitchen at home getting these decorations ready to be placed on the tree. Small tallow candles were used for lighting the tree and the fire risk was constantly on one's mind until the last candle had been blown out.

"When the children were brought in, after everything was ready, their delight and pleasure at sighting this spectacle was gratifying. I had spent some time in dressing a doll for the little Kern girl and she could see nothing but the doll. That sight of the children discovering all these things repaid for our time. I am sure that you would have felt as I did at that time, many times paid for all the trouble of getting this Christmas ready."

Percy "Ted" married Edith Anne Austin on April 22, 1896. Charlie Reid tells the following about Ted and his bride, "Ted Pollard got his marriage license in Laramie and came to Douglas where he found it impossible to get married, as he was in a different county. The wedding party drove by team, about 30 miles south of Douglas, crossed the line into Albany County and were married under a pine tree, still standing, beside the Esterbrook Road."

Ted and his family moved away in 1902.

Pollock, George and Molly Family

Our maternal grandfather, M. George Howe, (b. 1858) came to Wyoming from Sharon, Vermont in the 1880's. He and his brother, Paul, ran a band of sheep up in the Laramie Peak area. He brought to that area his wife, Elizabeth, from Vermont. She gave birth to our mother, Molly, in 1887 between Laramie and Eagle Peak but was soon taken to Crawford, Nebraska where Paul's wife lived and she died of tuberculosis in 1888. George remarried and operated a ranch in the Glendo area and then purchased and operated the hotel in the thriving metropolis of Orin Junction. While living there he raised and trained sheep dogs and also became actively involved in the government of the new state of Wyoming by serving in the legislature in Cheyenne two different terms of office.

Our mother was a young lady by then and met our dad, George N. Pollock, (b. 1860) in Orin Junction. Dad came to Wyoming from Mexia, Texas as a young man by joining up with a cattle drive over the Texas Trail. He did a little gold mining in Hartville, tended bar in what is now known as the oldest bar in the state. Drove stage coach between Ft. Laramie and Ft. Fetterman and was a cow-puncher for the Jim Shaw spread. He filed on a homestead between the Nylen/Gillespie and Shaw ranches.

They were married in the Howe home along the bank of the North Platte River and moved over to his homestead. Eleven children came along, seven lived to adulthood. Dad died of pneumonia in the winter of 1928 in Douglas. Dr. Shaffer came to the ranch and took him to the hospital. George Howe died in 1925.

The Pollock Ranch was located at the mouth of Indian Creek which had its origin up in the "Pine Hills" south of the ranch. Nearly every year we had to contend with flash floods which washed out fences, trees and flooded the meadows west of the ranch, even washing out the railroad tracks on occasion and the highway bridges.

The Pollock School was located north of the ranch and accommodated children for miles around. Good neighbors were the Nylen/Gillespie spread, the Shaw Ranch and the Wilsons of the Platte Valley Ranch. The Shaw/Grays ultimately purchased our ranch and still own it. Orin Junction was our closest place to buy groceries.

None of the Pollock family live in the area although John still lives in Converse County on his ranch south of Douglas. He and Maxine (Raeber) have children and grandchildren. George "Bud" died near Keeline, Wyoming where he had lived and worked on the Dan Smith Ranch. Margaret lived in Chicago most of her adult life and died there. She married Leonard Nylen of Douglas. Martha lived in California. She and Earl Silvers have children, grandchildren and great grandchildren. Dorothe lives in Hartville. She and John Chiamulon have children, grandchildren and great grandchildren, most of them living in the state. Natalie lives in Oregon. She and Howard Stoll have children and grandchildren. Howard died at their son's home in Laramie in 1981. Dona has lived in Las Vegas most of her adult life. She and Cedric Olson have a child and grandchildren.

Our life as children was much the same as other ranch families. As soon as school was out in the spring we began herding our band of sheep or helping in the hay field. Our mode of travel was team and wagon, horseback or depending on good neighbors for a ride to town. Cars were not plentiful and at best recollection we owned only one or two after dad died. Calving, branding, shearing sheep, tamping wool, butchering, raising a garden, gathering wild berries, fighting snow drifts to get the quarter of a mile to the Pollock School, piling into a friend's car and repairing flat tires about every mile to get to a local dance to hear the Gillespie boys play, neighbors gathering on a Sunday to freeze ice cream using the ice cut from the frozen Platte River in the winter and stored in the icehouse, having mother play the piano at dances in our barn before haying season, ice skating and most evenings spent at home keeping warm by wood and coal stoves, lights furnished by carbide and by kerosene and gas lamps, listening to phonograph records (no radios), doing lots of reading including the occasional pleasure of getting the "Denver Post" and reading and re-reading the "funnies"; a sometimes harsh life but typical of that era. Natalie Pollock Stoll

Porter, James and Family

James Ross Porter, born February 13, 1850, received a final homestead certificate May 26, 1920, from Commissioner of General Land Office, Department of Interior for S. 26 T34N, R69W. During homesteading days a one room tarpaper house and small shed were built, 40 acres of land were plowed and seeded, and the section was fenced. For a short time James' tenth son, Marion Grant, and wife, Queen, lived on the section.

James Ross Porter lived in eastern Nebraska and traveled extensively as an itinerant preacher, and later, being widowed, he traveled to his daughter's home in Santa Cruz, California where he died December 18, 1929.

November 19, 1921 a warranty deed was issued to David A. and Signa M. Porter, husband and wife. David was the seventh of James Ross Porter's twelve children.

The summer of 1922, David, Signa and their six children, moved from Morrill, Nebraska to live on the section. The improvements soon consisted of a water well, two-room house, a barn, chicken coup, bunkhouse, outhouse, approximately ten head of horses, 28 cows, 200 chickens, hogs, one dog, cats, a Model T Ford and farm equipment.

David had a health problem, but was able to be bus driver for the children who attended the rural Walker Creek School. The family farmed the land and became respected members in the Twenty Mile community, attending the Twenty Mile Community Church. On July 17, 1926 a baby daughter, Ruth, was born in Douglas, Wyoming. During the next 13 years the children grew toward adulthood. Daughter Marian became a teacher at the Pleasant Point Rural School, the three older sons, James, David and Donald, graduated from the eighth grade in the Walker Creek School, and son Paul from Douglas High School, the University of Wyoming and Leland Stanford University in California. Son Howard graduated from high school in Morrill, Nebraska and daughter Ruth from North High, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

David's health worsened and he died at his home May 6, 1932, leaving five minor children. Signa struggled on through the drought years of 1933-34. During these two years severe adversity had to be overcome. Drought took the crops, son Howard had surgery for ruptured appendix, daughter-in-law Audrey had surgery for gall stones and James and Audrey's 18-month-old daughter died. The government bought and shot the cattle, and one hot August morning the house burned to the ground. All of the family escaped the fire. The neighbors rallied around the family and soon a three-room house and furnishings were donated. The family continued to live there until Signa remarried in August 1935.

June 1935, Donald married Martha Hageman and they leased the section from Signa, who moved to Morrill, Nebraska, taking Howard and Ruth with her. Paul remained with Don and finished high school in Douglas, Wyoming.

The last ones to live on the section were Donald and Martha. Severe drought and grasshopper infestation convinced them to move on. After the war years they owned and operated the Porter's Blacksmith Shop in Douglas, Wyoming for 15 years.

Signa leased the grass to Paul and George LeBar who still hold the lease. Signa's second husband, George Porter, died in Morrill, Nebraska, March 20, 1937. She then moved to Minneapolis, Minnesota to care for her ailing father. She died September 30, 1972.

Donald tells three true stories about rattlesnakes during the 1920s. James Ross, the homesteader, was chopping wood, bent down to pick up a piece and a rattler bit his finger. He promptly laid the finger on the chopping block and with the ax, chopped off the finger. He rode to town on horseback and had the hand cared for and dressed.

The three young boys were in the yard, when they killed a rattler near the door. They later saw the mate in the yard. One boy took the shotgun and shot the head off the snake. The head shot through the air and the fangs lodged in the other boy's knee. Excitedly they took him in the kitchen, used a paring knife, cut open the knee, sprinkled on "Pinagnate of Potash," then took him to town in the car. The doctor said all poison was gone and the knee healed completely.

The two older boys were repairing the combine, one underneath on his back, when they saw a rattler beside him. He laid very still while the other boy tried to scare it away. Instead, the snake crawled across the boy's chest and neck, then crawled away. This was a rather exciting incident in his life.

Now in 1984, nearly 50 years later, the seven children have scattered to many states. All have married, and there are 17 living grandchildren, 50 great-grandchildren, and 14 great-great-grandchildren. The oldest and youngest, the two girls, have died, but the five sons are still living.

The section of land still belongs to the Porter family and is held in a living trust, with Donald A. Porter named as trustee. The farmed land has mostly returned to native grass, the earthen dam still holds water and many antelope roam on the land. There are no buildings or improvements left, only a few rocks that were used as a foundation for the house. There is a large sand rock near the place where the house stood. Through the years many members of the family have gone there and carved their initials in the rock. This has become a tradition as members of the family come back to Wyoming to visit the section.

Porter, Leo and Ruth

Leo Porter was born on May 28, 1896 in Indianola, Iowa and I, Ruth Wood, was born in Fort Dodge, Iowa on February 25, 1906. Our family moved to Broken Bow, Nebraska; and it was there I met Leo when he was working on a road crew. When I was 14 we were married at O'Neill, Nebraska. We then came to the homestead northeast of Douglas in 1921 that he had acquired from his sister and brother-in-law. We had a one room house with bare wooden floors. We made cupboards of wooden boxes and folding beds to conserve space. The annual wall-papering was done with clean newsprint. Until we were able to drill water wells we carried what we needed in pails or hauled it in barrels from the neighbors. The wells were not much of an improvement as the water was so bad it was only fit for the garden. The stock refused to drink it until a thick scum had risen to the top and could be blown aside. As poor as it was, it raised a good garden and we were able to can and dry many vegetables for the winter.

Leo worked at every job he could find to supplement the family income. At first he plowed fields for Tom McCarty and received a team of horses and a good milk cow for it. For a time we moved to Glenrock where he worked in the refinery cleaning stills. I drove a team of horses and sprinkled the Glenrock streets to keep the dust down. I was paid by the merchants for this work and carried my baby son with me as I worked. The water tank was a hardwood tank that was taken back to the homestead and in later years owned by my son-in-law, Dale Munkres, who donated it to the Pioneer Museum. It is on display there today, but it looks much smaller to me than when I was the 17 year old street sprinkler. When we came back to the homestead to live, Leo helped dig the basement under the old C.H. Hofmann mortuary, became a field assessor for a time, also the mail carrier for the Douglas to Bill, Wyoming route.

Times were hard and the work was hard, but we filled our lives with music. Leo was a fine singer and could play classical music beautifully on the violin as well as fiddling for the country dances. I played the guitar, organ and mandolin and the Lundberg brothers, Fred, Felix and Carl, also played for these dances. The Walker Creek School House was the scene of many happy times, as the community had "literary" meetings there where they would entertain each other with debates, readings, skits, singing and playing. Our children could be coaxed to sing and the audience was delighted when our little three year old daughter, Audrey, would sing alto to harmonize with me. One particular debate at literary was between Leo, who did not drink, and a neighbor who did. Leo held a whiskey bottle filled with tea and debated the merits of being a drunkard, while the neighbor spoke against it. We played baseball and annie-over and the children made stilts and other homemade toys for recreation.

Sometimes when we had free time we made a lunch and had a picnic anywhere there was water and trees. We always made a picnic of the trips to the timber for wood and would take lunches to the city park when we had business in town. Walker Creek was such a pretty place to go with trees and grass and the little creek running by;

and oh, how good the food tasted even though it might be the same thing we would have had at home!

In the early days there were families on every 160 or 320 acres or so and we had many acquaintances and nice neighbors. I remember the single men, Tom Armagast, Sam Gilman, Louie Munkres (Muncas) and Dave Smith. Families were the Harry Gillespies, Rube and Guy May, Eddie and Clare Gillespie, Bill Hall and brothers, Harry and Frank, Harry Mitchells, Phil Helbigs, Henry Arjes, Ernest Hagemans, the Alfred Edisons, Harry Parkers and the Cologera DiGiovannis.

After Leo's untimely death in 1933 due to a massive heart attack, I later married Louis Holboy, an oilfield worker. We moved to Washington state where he, too, passed away.

Leo's and my children are: Darrell (b. November 3, 1921, d. 1937), Audrey (b. July 11, 1924, married Dale Munkres), Vernal (b. December 6, 1929, married Allen), Bonnie (b. October 12, 1931, married Jacobs) and Leo Arlene (b. September 29, 1933, married Clark). Louis and my children are: Cassie (b. July 10, 1936, d. 1939), Wendel (b. January 15, 1938), Shirley (b. September 16, 1940, married Linke) and Marian (b. February 16, 1946, married Burge).

I am presently married to Alger Lundberg and live in Sunnyside, Washington. The homestead days were many years ago but they remain in my memory as the happiest days of my life. My children and I feel that the hardships we endured only made us stronger people and we would go through most of it again.

Potter, Robert F., Mary and Anna

Robert Francis Potter Jr. was born July 18, 1866 in Minersville, Pennsylvania, the oldest of four sons of Robert Francis Potter and Elizabeth Hodgson Potter. His father had been a very young soldier in the Union Army of the Civil War. After the war he went into the banking business in Minersville and was married there to Elizabeth Hodgson, whose grandparents came to New York state from England about 1820, moved to Pennsylvania and became U.S. citizens.

Robert Jr. was educated in Pennsylvania and was married there to Mary Knittle. They had two sons and two daughters born in Pennsylvania before moving to Wyoming in 1899, where Robert worked for the C.H. King Company in Douglas. His wife, Mary, died the first year they lived in Douglas, and the following year he moved his family to Casper where he worked for the Pennsylvania Refining Company.

In 1900 he married Anna Campsey Rohrbaugh, whose father, Dr. E. P. Rohrbaugh was one of the first physicians to practice in Casper, coming there in 1899 after practicing in Cheyenne, where he had moved in 1891 from Ellis, Kansas. Dr. Rohrbaugh was elected one of the mayors of Casper after it had become a thriving large town. He practiced medicine in Casper until his retirement.

After Robert Potter's marriage to Anna Rohrbaugh, he moved back to Douglas where he worked for the U.S. Land Office. He and his family lived in a ranch house just across the Platte River from town. They had one daughter born there; and in 1905, Robert moved his family into the town of Douglas, where he lived until his death.

There was an established weekly newspaper in Douglas at that time, "Bill Barlow's Budget," which was well known and popular with some; but there were other citizens of Douglas who did not agree with the policies of the Budget, and Bob Potter was encouraged to start another weekly paper which he named the "Douglas Enterprise." The first location of the printing plant and office was on South Second Street.

After the presses had been set up and the first editions were printed, the office and plant were vandalized by someone, the type thrown around and papers destroyed, a difficult situation for Bob. No one was ever apprehended or prosecuted for the damage, but there were definite suspicions about who the culprits were. Shades of the old west!!

Bob's older son, Robert III, was the typesetter for the paper; but most of the rest of the work, editing, etc., was done by Bob. His wife, Anna, helped with the management at first. She had worked on a newspaper in Casper before her marriage. The paper prospered and while it was never a gold mine, it made enough to support Bob and his growing family for years.

Several years after the birth of the "Enterprise," a new building was erected on the corner of Third and Center Streets across from Daniels Jewelry Store, and the newspaper plant was moved into the semi-basement and first floor of the new building. In 1913, Albert A. "Bert" Clough, who had been the foreman for the "Budget" for 13 years, came to work for the "Enterprise" and soon became Bob's partner. After Bob's death in 1915, Bert bought Bob's widow's share of the paper and became the sole owner. He published the "Enterprise" until his death. Later the Clough heirs sold the "Enterprise" to the "Budget," the two papers were merged and are published today under the "Budget" name.

Bob Potter was very active in all community affairs and did as much as he and his paper could to further the interests of the town. The state fair was held the first week in September in Douglas and was one of his particular interests. As the years passed, the fair prospered, more buildings were built in the fairgrounds and more exhibits and people came to the fair each year. The rodeo was a great attraction for all of the ranchers and cowboys who competed in it, and the sulky horse races were also very popular. The center street of town was lined with booths and stands the week of the fair and were run by the women of the various churches selling food and handmade articles. Every night there was a dance in Temple Hall.

Except for the time he lived on the ranch across the river, he did not own a horse, but he did have a Jersey cow for several years in Douglas. Two of the houses rented by the family had barns and fenced-in stable yards for the cow, "Beauty," who gave her owners many gallons of delicious milk. Bob and his two older sons milked the cow, and Anna and the two older girls made butter and cottage cheese from part of the milk. On special occasions, delicious ice cream would be made in the wooden freezer, the whole family taking turns turning the crank. When the mixture was "set" the ice cream was frozen, the dasher was pulled out, and the young children got to lick it!

There was one black family in Douglas then, living down the street from the Potters, and when Beauty was giving her all, one of the younger children was sent down, each evening with a bucket of milk for the family. In the summertime, there was a town herd, shepherded by one of the town boys, who took the cows out to graze on the empty land outside of town early each morning and brought them back at night. In the winter, Beauty stayed in the barn and ate hay.

When the founding fathers of Douglas laid out the town, they very wisely planned wide streets, with trees on either side. The trees were mostly cottonwoods that grew fast and gave the streets welcome shade in the summertime, when it could be very hot.

The winters were very cold and the ice that was made then for use in the summertime was one of the valuable assets of Douglas. The Platte River would freeze over to a great depth, six feet or more. The Slonaker Ice Company took their huge ice saws to a good part of the river and cut large blocks of ice that would keep the residents of Douglas supplied with ice all summer. The blocks of ice were stored in the company warehouse in sawdust until summer when they were carried in horse-drawn wagons up and down the streets of town, taking ice to each house. The ice man had a saw to cut off the right size block for the ice box of each house, which he carried in with tongs slung over his shoulder. There were always a group of children following the wagon, waiting to pick up the chips of ice after the cuts. How good and cold they tasted, no pollution in the water then!

The frozen river also gave the people of Douglas a wonderful place to ice skate and there were many who took advantage of it, skating for miles up and down the river without danger, on the thick ice. Bonfires would be built on the banks for the skaters to warm up when tired; and it was always a social occasion.

Another winter pleasure, for the kids mostly, were the sleds and sleighs that many people had. The horse-drawn sleighs took parties of people for rides on special occasions but the sleds were used every day. A kid that was lucky enough to have a rope could hitch onto the back of one of the wagons and ride as far as the horse went. And then there was David Hill! The Davids lived on a slight hill at the end of Center Street and as there were no autos going up and down the street then, it was a perfect place to slide down "belly buster" on a sled, climb back up and go down again. How fortunate the children in those days were to live in Douglas. The adults had to work hard, especially the women, but it was still a good life.

Bob Potter never owned a house in Douglas, but rented whatever was suitable for his family. As it grew, they moved into larger ones. His parents came out from Pennsylvania every few years and spent a year with the family, and that required a larger house each time. The last house he rented was on the north end of Sixth Street near the elementary school. It was a very nice, two story house, on a large lot with no other house near it so there was a large space for the children and their friends to play. Beauty was gone by then and there was no need for a barn or stable yard.

Before 1910, Bob's youngest brother, Louis B. Potter, came out to live in Douglas too and he lived there the rest of his life. He opened an insurance office which was one of the first in town and was successful.

Robert Francis Potter was a devoted son, husband and father as well as a good citizen of Douglas. When he died at the age of 49 in 1915, after abdominal surgery, many people were saddened and the town suffered a great loss. He was survived by his parents, three brothers, his widow, Anna and eight children, five of them very young. He had always been a devout Episcopalian, a member of Christ Church in Douglas and was buried from there.

The "Douglas Enterprise" was a monument to his work in Douglas and was published for many years under that name after his death.

Powell, Clifford and Mabel

Mabel Johnson came to Douglas, Converse County, Wyoming, in 1920 to visit friends, the Wilbert Oak family, and to look into the prospect of locating a homestead.

She found two relinquishments about 37 miles northwest of Douglas but wasn't able to file on them until 1921. She worked that summer for the John LeBar family and returned to Nebraska, near Potter, to teach school for two terms.

In March of 1921 she filed on said homestead because she liked the looks of the soil there. Also the natural water conditions were better than any others she looked at. She contracted Lee Fowler, a homesteader to her west, to build a homesteader's castle, and Raymond Baker, who joined her on the north, to fence and plow her acreage for her. She was to plow eleven acres, but plowed 12 acres in which she had planted corn, oats and potatoes.

Later in the year, she married Clifford R. Powell. When he came out he drilled a well by hand and found water at a depth of about 18 or 20 feet, but the water was full of minerals, highly colored, and was not good to drink or even cook with, so she hauled all her water from Lee Fowler's. Cliff also dug a good root cellar which worked well for her food storage.

Mabel's house was much more than a homesteader's shack, although it measured only 12' x 8' it was the bedroom, dining hall, and kitchen. She had the knack of making it delightfully homey. Cliff, being a carpenter, put up shelves, built a table and other accessories, thus transforming a crude building into a very comfortable place to live. She, like many others, had the heating unit and cooking facilities furnished by the practical "Topsy" stove, a small cast iron animal with a flat top ideal for pots and pans.

Sometimes in the summer months Mabel rode her faithful saddle horse, Ted, from Potter, Nebraska to Douglas. It took her three days for the trip. On her return trip, Cliff met her at the Six Mile Hill east of Douglas in a Model T Ford, where she dismounted and led the horse on into town behind the car. The horse was so delighted to be rid of his passenger he wanted to lead the car!

In 1922, Mabel's father, Malcom Johnson, filed on the relinquishment to her west and built his house just over the hill from her. After he proved up he made his home with his daughter until he passed away in the late 20s, leaving his homestead with her.

Mabel enjoyed her homestead days and could tell of the many fun times when she rode in the round up and brandings with Mrs. Joe Reynolds (Mary). She, like others, could tell of "fence trimmings" done by previously established "neighbors" if said fence closed a trail they were used to traveling.

After Mabel proved up she moved to Douglas where Cliff worked as a mechanic at the LeBar Garage for several years. They made any number of trips back to the homestead for the sheer pleasure of it before they moved the furnishings into town.

The Powells left Douglas in the 40's and lived in various places while doing carpenter work with the Spear Lumber Co. building different projects for the government during the war. They located in Provo, Utah and lived there until Cliff passed away in 1961 and was brought back to Douglas for his burial.

Mabel and Cliff had one son, Roger, now living in Bettendorf, Iowa and a niece, Patty Johnson, who made her home with them from early childhood until she married. Patty Johnson Gilmer now lives in Birmingham, Alabama.

Mabel sold her home in Provo and moved back to Douglas where she still resides in 1984.

Powell, George and Margaret

George W. Powell was born on a farm near Fairfield, Jefferson County, Iowa on February 22, 1847, the son of Enos and Catherine Harper Powell. His father was a native of Kentucky and his mother a native of Indiana.

The call to go west was strong and in 1864 he went to Colorado where he was a freighter for nearly two years. In 1886 he came to Wyoming Territory, first working for a freighting outfit out of Fort Laramie; later acquiring an outfit of his own, four oxen and a wagon. He soon added two outfits. These were used to haul freight and supplies to outposts or forts, such as Fort Laramie, Fort Fetterman and Fort Caspar. During this time he contracted wood, hay and beef to the forts. In some of these enterprises he was associated with John Hunton, who was also an early day pioneer who had ranches on Chugwater, LaPrele and Box Elder Creeks.

One winter when George was on his way to Fort Fetterman from Fort Laramie his outfit was attacked by Indians near the Old Horseshoe Creek Crossing. They ran off his oxen and burned the wagons. The men had to flee and hide, escaping only with the clothes on their backs. The snow was deep and the weather very cold. They nearly froze but found a cave to hide in. The only food they had for some time was rabbits and frozen bullberries. George finally made his way to Fort Fetterman and in the spring took employment as a freighter for the Post. In August of 1876 Powell started out from Fort Fetterman with hay for Fort Laramie when he met two riders who told him that the Heck Reel Wagon Train had been burned and men killed by the Indians. Powell turned back to inform the Post of the Indian attack and of the death of the wagon master, George Throstle, and Irish Pete. Powell then set out with a couple of men to get the bodies of Throstle and Irish Pete and bring them back to Fort Fetterman for burial. Throstle had been scalped by the Indians.

On March 27, 1878 George married Margaret Skogland, daughter of Peter Skogland, at Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory.

Margaret Skogland Powell was born in Sweden November 29, 1850. She came to the United States at the age of three months. Her family settled in Iowa not far from Dayton, Iowa where they farmed. At the age of 16 Margaret came to Wyoming to assist the family of an army captain's wife whose husband was stationed at Fort Steele.

During the years at Fort Steele, Margaret, or Maggie as everyone called her, attended many of the frontier dances and other affairs at the fort. She always told of the switching of the babies at a dance and what an uproar it made. At Fort Fetterman she met George Powell and they were married at Fort Fetterman, Albany County, Wyoming Territory, March 27, 1878.

The Powells' first home was on Box Elder where they stayed for a few months, then moved to LaPrele Creek where they established permanent residence in 1878.

Mrs. Powell was a true pioneer. She and George built an adobe house on the creek. On September 6, 1879 their first child, Georgie Maud, was born. Twelve years later their second daughter, Gertrude A., was born on November 24, 1891. Gertrude died in 1915.

Mrs. Powell was on the ranch alone with Maud while George freighted from Medicine Bow and Laramie City to Fort Fetterman. Once a year they would go to Laramie City for supplies. They went in the freight wagon. Mrs. Powell always had a canary and took the bird and baby Maud with them in the wagon.

Many travelers stopped at the Powell Ranch on their way through the country. Mrs. Powell always had a meal ready for them, and many lasting friendships were made. The men on the freight wagons who worked with George always started cleaning up the day before they reached the Powell ranch so they could see the baby. They brought gifts to baby Maud. A pin and locket are still worn by great granddaughters.

Mrs. Powell had many visits from Indians so she learned to shoot to protect herself. Usually the Indians just wanted something to eat. She told of one Indian who came after she had baked pumpkin pies in anticipation of the return of the freight wagons. She had just put the pies on the window sill to cool when an Indian came to the door. The Indian rubbed his stomach and made known he wanted something to eat. He was offered bread and meat, but he gestured toward the pies. Mrs. Powell didn't want to anger him so she let him have some, but he wasn't satisfied until he had eaten all of the big pie. He then went to the haystack to sleep and was gone when George and the freighters came in.

Powell took out the first water right on LaPrele Creek. His Powell Ditch #1 was a Territorial Right with priority to 1878. In 1884 he took out another water right and the ditch was named the Powell-Ayres Ditch. He brought the first alfalfa seed into this part of the country. The neighbors were afraid it was something bad, but after seeing the first crop of hay they too wanted alfalfa.

Mr. and Mrs. Powell made their home on the LaPrele Ranch for many years and in 1903 built a home in Douglas on North 5th Street. Mr. Powell served a term as a member of the city council. During that time our beautiful cemetery was plotted and lots sold to many of the prominent people. George had the bodies of his two brothers, Wm. H. and James M., moved from the old cemetery north of town to the new cemetery.

Mr. Powell started and operated one of the first saw mills in this section of the state. It was located in the Esterbrook Country, and many of the first ranch homes were constructed of or used some of this lumber. He sawed, hauled, and donated the lumber to build the Pleasant Valley School House in School District No. 6 which now stands on the state fairgrounds as a pioneer relic. He was a horse fancier and raised many fine Morgan horses in addition to sheep and cattle.

In 1905 Mr. Powell and Mart Madsen went to Cheyenne to be taken into the Masonic Order. He was a 32 Degree Mason. He enjoyed trips to Cheyenne to attend the Consistory until his health began to fail.

Mr. Powell disliked any kind of publicity and avoided having his name or picture in the papers.

George W. Powell passed away December 12, 1924 at his home in Douglas and is buried in the Douglas cemetery. Margaret died on January 4, 1941.

Georgie M. married Thomas Hutchison in 1897.

hills they had a fight with the Indians and four were killed. He cut their heads, hands and feet off and scalped them. He had removed the flesh from the bones by scraping.

"One of the scalps was a woman's. These relics, along with others, were later displayed at his drug store in Douglas. When he put his collection on exhibit at the first state fair at Douglas was when I discovered that he was the same fellow that I had met at the Hat Creek Stage Station in the fall of 1876."

Billy found work "whacking bulls" in Wyoming. Another incident he relates is as follows, "In 1879 when I worked for Williams, he had 14 strings of yoke bulls, with three wagons to a string. We loaded 1000 pounds to a steer. Our first load was for Ft. McKinney. One team we called the 'Tenderfoot' team and their names were 'Mike' and 'Paddy.' This name was always given to a new beginner, or the last man on the job. They were wise. When they came to a hill they would almost always stop and turn the yoke and face the rest of the team. Then the wagon boss would come along and holler 'A-Ha, Mike and Paddy' and the leaders would turn the yoke back and away they would go."

In 1884 Billy met and married Miss Alice M. Sherwin, a school teacher from Kansas. They settled in Tie Siding, Wyoming where he found work on nearby ranches and sawmills.

Grandpa and Grandma had six children. They were: Laura, born March 27, 1885, died on April 15, 1955; Jessie, born November 3, 1886; Homer, born January 8, 1888, married Beulah A. Hart (she died in 1981), died December 16, 1965, children are Dallas, Lorraine, Irma, Morris, Fred, Billy, Bobby and George; Warren, born June 11, 1889, married Elsie O'Brien, Warren died

Powell, William "Billy" and Alice

Grandpa was born April 15, 1856 in Moundville, Narquette County, Wisconsin on the old Winnebago Indian Reservation.

On March 18, 1876 he left home with a young neighbor boy and headed for the Black Hills where they had heard about the discovery of gold there.

Discovering that gold mining wasn't for them, the young men went to Cheyenne. Billy relates in an article published in the "Douglas Budget" the following incident that happened at the Hat Creek Station while on his way to Cheyenne, "When we got to Hat Creek we stopped for the night and John Steffen, who later ran a drug store at Douglas, was cooking for the road ranch. Steffen asked me to come up after supper and spend the evening with him.

"After his work was done for the evening, he hauled out from under his bed a gunnysack and poured out the contents on the floor. As his outfit had come out of the

January 1, 1928, children are Margaret (married Ralph "Red" Morris) and Blanche (married Donald Brannan), Elsie married Ray Bruce Goldsby on April 13, 1929; Clarence, born January 11, 1893; and Bertha who drowned with Grandma on June 4, 1895.

It was on June 4, 1895 while Grandma and her six children were visiting her sister, Mrs. Bert Elder at the Elder Ranch on LaPrele, that she and her daughter were drowned in a tragic accident. (See the Elder story for details.)

After the accident, Grandpa stayed in Douglas. Laura and Jessie were adopted out with the three boys staying with Grandpa. He went to work for John Amspoker at his livery barn. The family who took the oldest girl, Laura, soon moved to Missouri.

The two older boys went out each morning and brought the horses in, and then herded milk cows for the different people during the day. In those days everyone had a milk cow. Therefore, each morning the boys would go around to each one of the places and get the cow until they had all of them gathered up and take them out in the country to feed and then bring them all back in at night and deliver them to each owner.

My dad had a friend who liked to get up early and go with him to bring the horses in, but this boys parents did not like him to do this. They lived in a two story house and he slept upstairs. At night he would tie a string around his big toe and hang it out the window. My dad would ride up and pull the string to wake his friend up. He could climb down the trellis and go with my dad to get the horses and then be back in bed when his mother awakened him.

I don't know just how long Grandpa worked at the livery stable. He then took a mail route up Cold Springs to the Dawes Mine. I know by then the boys were pretty well grown, and in the deep of winter when the snow was very deep, he took it part way by buggy or wagon and then had to finish with a sled. As he had a bad leg for many years, one of the boys would take it for him when the snow was very deep.

Somewhere around 1922 he got smallpox very bad, and was put in the Isolation Hospital which was up against "D" Hill. Aunt Laura came from Missouri and took care of him. Then they hired him as caretaker there where he stayed until he passed away February 6, 1942. About the last year he lived he was bedfast and the other daughter, Jessie came from Missouri and took care of him.

In the fall before he passed away, by trial and error, we had found his two younger brothers and they came to see him. Grandpa was 86, Tom, 84, and Alex, 82. All were very hard of hearing. What a joy it was to listen to those three old fellows tell about those 60 years of their lives since they had seen each other.

Presba, Edna

Mother came to Douglas from Waterloo, Iowa about 1912 hoping that the dry climate would benefit the asthmatic condition with which she was plagued and to accumulate some land via the homestead route.

The homestead was two miles north of Douglas, on Antelope, a distance we drove in our horse and buggy every morning and evening so that Mother could keep her job as manager of a variety store (the first one in Douglas.) This we continued to do during the months we were required to live on the homestead each year. Every night Mother would hobble the horse and every night it would hobble away over the hill. That meant that Mother had to chase after it in the morning. This was the beginning of a long day.

One night, soon after we had moved into the homestead house, we awakened with something crawling on us in the bed. Mother jumped up, lit the lamp and ran for the kerosene can. To our consternation, the bed was full of bedbugs. We didn't sleep any more that night, but kept wondering where they had come from. Someone told us that many times bedbugs are found in new lumber and since our house was newly built, we settled for that explanation.

The owner of the variety store was Mr. W. E. Unland. The store was located next to the Kimball Hotel on North Second Street. Mr. Unland was a business man from Lincoln, Nebraska who came to Converse County to buy a ranch. He bought a place west of Douglas, (it was located immediately west of where the KOA campground is located in 1985), since he was not a rancher at heart, he opened a large variety store.

A few years later, using the homestead as collateral, Mother bought the book and stationery store owned by Minnie Barrow, situated next to the Budget office. Finally Mother was in business for herself.

Since she was always eager to branch out in uncharted areas, like the time she decided to raise Airedale dogs in the lot back of the store. This was an unpopular venture because the dogs howled mightily every time the town whistle blew. So that project was soon abandoned.

She always had great faith in the future of Douglas because of the natural potential in minerals and oil. She never bought a piece of property without first securing her share of mineral rights. She would not be surprised to see a gas well on her original homestead at this time.

Mother was a staunch supporter of the Democratic Party, when Democrats were few in the state, but this never daunted her enthusiasm. She was also a member of the Mayflower Society, having had an English ancestor who came over on the Mayflower, a fact she was very proud of.

Through her association with the public for so many years and her kindness and consideration for everyone, she made many lasting friendships.

In spite of ill health and other hardships, she never faltered in her quest for a better life for herself and her child. Here was a brave woman who dared to do. Mother died in 1945.

I, Merle Presba Hancock, was about twelve years old when I first came to Douglas with my mother. I received my schooling in Waterloo, Iowa where I lived with my grandparents. I married Coleman Hancock in 1922. Coleman was a telegraph operator at Orin, Wyoming. He was a joint operator for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad and the Burlington Railroad. We lived in Orin for eleven years. Coleman was elected to the State Legislature as representative in 1935. Later we moved to California to be with Mother. Coleman died in 1959.

Preuit, William and Ida Family

William Humphrey Preuit, commonly known as "Stub", homesteaded in the Shawnee area late in the summer of 1913. He came from a grain and livestock farm near Waco, a small town in York County, Nebraska.

At this time the trend was for young farmers to find land of their own. Many of the younger families became interested in moving west. In other words, they took the advice of Horace Greeley who said, "Go West, young man, go West."

That fall, Stub and two other men from about the same territory built on their separate places. The buildings were only finished on the outside. The interior was just studded where the rooms would eventually be. Due to harvest time at home, they returned to York County for the winter.

In early spring an emigrant car was loaded with items for the homestead. Machinery, plows, planters, horses, cows and even a crate of chickens, along with the household goods were placed on the train. The emigrant car on the Burlington Railroad left Waco for the adventure in Wyoming.

Arrangements were made for the family to follow and a few weeks later Stub's wife, Ida, and four children were put on a passenger train in York. It was a very dark and rainy night. The children at that time were myself, William Richard, age seven; Archie Orland, age five; Ethel Katherine, age four and one half; and Charles Albert, age six months. Archie's sixth birthday occurred the next day, March 31st, on the train. As I, William R., was very young at the time, I don't remember the particulars of the trip very well but I do remember we had a time changing trains at Chadron when we switched to the Chicago and Northwestern. The two depots were some distance apart and it was a struggle for us with our boxes and small children. I remember the train was very short and how the track ran up and downhill on its way to Shawnee.

I do remember arriving at our destination. It was afternoon and the sun was shining very warm with a good stiff breeze. Shawnee then was only a cinder platform. A post with a sign read "Shawnee." A little cabin, which was the home of Dan Woodward, sat about one half mile away and it appeared to be deserted. Dad was to bring a surrey to meet us but due to some time changes, no one was there. As we strained to look, the heat waves in the clean air played tricks on us. Shortly the conductor said, "Lady, we don't like to leave anyone out here with children all alone." Quickly my mother replied with tears in her eyes, "You don't need to. Just turn this train around and let's all go back to Nebraska."

After a few minutes we could see a team of horses turning up some dust as they came over a divide a few miles away. It was then the parting came. The conductor motioned for the train to go. My mother, then seeing nothing but large hills and rolling prairie with plenty of cactus, sagebrush, and what we called soapweed, thought about the level land in York County, about all the tall corn, the lush grass, all the fruit trees and the giant cottonwoods. Then the tears really gave way and to the best of my knowledge the five of us all felt sorry for each other.

The nearer the surrey came, the faster it got until we were all united. After all the happy greetings and questions, we were loaded up with our boxes and trunks and started for the new home seven miles southwest of Shawnee. One thing I can remember so vividly was the fence on the railroad right-of-way. There was no gate. We just parted the wires to get in and out.

The road to our new home was across the prairie. There were no fences in sight. Sometimes the road was just a faint trail and sometimes just a cow path.

Arriving at the homestead was another thrill. Our new home was a small frame house set on native rock, 18-24 inches above the ground. There was no foundation, just the rocks to hold up the sills. It was also on a rocky knoll with one of the packing boxes serving as a front step. It was probably located on one of the best rattlesnake dens in that part of the state. All of us kids were warned about the snakes every day. A long-handled hoe was kept at the door. The rattles were always cut off the snakes that we killed and after a year, a quart jar was filled with them.

Although the house had lap siding on the outside, there was nothing inside but the rafters and studs where in the future, there would be two rooms.

Tar paper shacks were put up for the chicken house and other small buildings as the summer progressed. Logs were hauled from a stand of timber several miles to the north for a windbreak for the cattle and horses. Fuel for cooking and heat for the cookstove was also hauled from that same timber to the north. The dead jack pine made a very hot fire even though it was common to have a chimney burn out.

It also was common for a few neighbors to go to the hills north and dam up a small creek. Then they would dig out coal for fuel. It was of a very poor quality and in a few days after getting it home, it turned to slack.

To sharpen the plow lays, the plow was brought up to the front door where the lays were removed from the plow and heated in the cookstove. They were then pounded out on the plow beam.

After the first few summers on the prairie, there was a great change in our mother's attitude about Wyoming. She called our attention to the cactus blooming after a shower in the spring. She was so proud of a patch of native Bluebells which covered nearly an acre that shared the hilltop with our few buildings. We hunted berries of various kinds to make jelly, driving in a wagon many miles to the south to find them along a little creek bank. It would take us a full day to make the trip. I recall how she dressed jack rabbits and in the winter fried down jack rabbit hamburger. I remember how adept she became with a rifle when coyotes came for another chicken. I especially remember how strong she was when our father went back to Nebraska to husk corn in the fall to make money for our food and clothes.

Transportation was very poor. The only doctor was in Douglas, 25 miles west. The railroad was very cooperative in travel. If you were sick you could always catch a ride on the caboose by flagging down the train. Ethel was operated on for appendicitis in Douglas and the folks made several trips by caboose.

In the first two years there was no store of any kind in Shawnee. The mail and all the groceries were brought from Lost Spring several miles east. I remember getting crackers in large boxes, dried apples, dried prunes and many other groceries from the Sears Roebuck catalog. It was the practice for neighbors to take turns going for mail and groceries in the lumber wagon.

By the second and third year, many homesteaders moved in and the community really began to grow. A school was built so after a year or two at home we were back in school. A Literary Society was formed and many pleasant evenings were spent at the school. During these times Shawnee was growing. A grocery store was started by a man named Haas; a lumber yard opened and an elevator was built.

Years later after proving up on the homestead, the family purchased land at Shawnee. Some neighbors came and jacked up the shack, laid timber under it and laid it on a wagon to be transported over the prairie to the new site. Archie and I drove a buggy carrying water and dinner. Archie, always the driver, crossed a washout and was thrown out and a wheel ran over him. It gave everyone a big scare but Archie was unhurt and there was no damage.

At the edge of Shawnee, we set up business again. More was built onto the original building. The town continued to grow. We had a bank, a hotel and even a newspaper, the "Shawnee Record," printed in the town. I set type by hand after school and on Saturdays.

The town had a movie picture on Saturday evenings and two or three days a week a barber came from another town and cut hair. At one time there was a doctor who lived and practiced there. He ran a nice drugstore at the same time. An addition was built onto the school which sat on the hill east of town. A cemetery was laid out one mile north of town and I remember the first burial there.

Kenneth Woodrow was born July 20, 1918, making the fifth child in the Preuit family.

After we moved we had more cattle and more farming. Archie, by now, liking the farming end of the operation, helped Dad with that and I helped him with the cattle business. The cattle were on open range to the north, to the east and to the west of town.

Dad dug a silo at Shawnee and it was filled with all kinds of chopped forage for cattle, including tame sunflowers and even Russian thistles. There wasn't much corn because of the drought. He did, however, grow some fine potatoes but because of freight problems, it was a poor business. A good business that kept the family going was hauling oil rig timbers from the railroad to the north for oil drilling. Dad and a neighbor also loaded many a carload of sand on railcars to be shipped to other towns.

During this time many relatives left Nebraska and moved to Wyoming, settling in various places. Most settled around Wheatland and after a few visits, it was decided we too should move to Wheatland. In the early spring of 1921, teams and wagons left Shawnee for Wheatland. A covered wagon was used and the cattle were driven behind. Our mother and smaller children were taken by relatives in a Model T touring car.

After arriving in Platte County, we settled seven miles southwest of Wheatland near Rock Lake. The family continued irrigated farming, growing beets and raising many mules. In December of 1922, another boy, Chester was born and in August, 1924, another girl, Betty, was added to the family, making five boys and two girls. It was a typical farm family growing up, going to school in country schools. After eighth grade we went to high school in Wheatland. We grew beets, using lots of horses and mules. We continued to raise lots of cattle.

When the depression of 1929-30 was taking its toll on agriculture, Dad became interested in farm programs. He made several trips to Washington to formulate programs and was instrumental in putting them to work in Wyoming.

W. H. was a member of the State Board of Agriculture for some time. He was state chairman of the Democratic party for a few years. He was elected to the Platte County Board of Commissioners for several terms. He was a member of the board of the Wheatland Irrigation District at the time of his death. He and my mother were both members of the Christian Church of Wheatland.

March 21, 1937, Ida, Mrs. W. H. Preuit, still a Wyoming booster, passed away and was buried in the Wheatland Cemetery. In 1940, Kenneth and Chester were inducted into the army and spent four and one half years in the Pacific Theater during World War II.

Still farming and in failing health, Stub passed away on November 7, 1949 and was buried beside his wife in the Wheatland Cemetery.

In the many years following, the family turned in different directions. The oldest, the writer of this story, lives near Waco, Nebraska. Archie passed away in 1971. Ethel, the oldest girl, lives in Wheatland near the family home. Charlie passed away in 1979. Ken, who is retired, now lives in Fort Collins, Colorado, after living at Wheatland for many years. Chester, now retired from the postal department, lives in Rupert, Idaho. Betty, the youngest girl, passed away in 1979 and is buried in Guernsey, Wyoming.

The entire family, in their different homes and locations still have a very fond memory of living on the homestead in that little shack all by itself, alone on the windswept prairie.

Pringle, Theodore "Lee"

Although Theodore Pringle was buried at Custer, South Dakota in 1931, he was a pioneer resident of Douglas for nearly half a century. The exact date of Pringle's birth is not known, but it is believed to have been about 1864 in Center Point, Iowa. Lee was never married but he was survived by a nephew and two nieces. Mr. Pringle grew to manhood in Iowa and spent his early adulthood in South Dakota. He came to Douglas from Deadwood.

By October 3, 1886, the tent town on Poverty Flats had melted away, and the new town of Douglas counted 1600 souls. There were 3 newspapers, 3 banks, 12 large general stores and 12 smaller concerns, hotels, restaurants, lumber yards, livery stables, drug stores, two dance halls and 21 saloons.

In association with Bob White, Lee Pringle opened a saloon on North Second Street in 1887. An advertisement in a 98 year-old Douglas newspaper reads as follows:

WHITE AND PRINGLE
Dealers in Pure Whiskey and Fine Cigars

Sometime later, Mr. White evidently withdrew from the business since it became simply "Lee Pringle's".

In 1906, Pringle completed a new building to house his business. It was an elegant and pretentious establishment. In keeping with its ambiance it was named The College Inn and has recently been listed on the National Registrar of Historic places.

Entering through the outside door, one finds himself in a small foyer. An ornate carved archway fitted with a pair of stained glass swinging doors opens into the barroom which is about 30' in length. At the far end, a similar archway with swinging doors divides the barroom from the lounge which is located in the rear of the building. The floors were tiled with marble which was ground to a powder and re-cast into squares. Each is decorated with a four-color scroll pattern. In the entry way, as well as in the back hallway is one tile bearing the initials TP, and the date 1906.

The wall behind the back bar is graced by three massive mirrors extending from the marble-slab counter top to the elaborate frieze, a distance of about six feet. The fixtures, made by Brunswick, Balk, Calendar Co., were imported from Chicago. The company coded each piece, large or minute, so that the local carpenter could fit it all together when it was delivered in Douglas.

The bar, back bar, the paneling and the carved archways were all made of mahogany. A stuffed golden eagle perched atop a pillar on either side of the archway which marked the entrance to the barroom. Music for both the original bar and the elaborate new College Inn was provided by a Violano nickelodeon, which was also imported from Chicago. It was made by the Virtuso company, and operated on batteries until electricity became available. The hours were measured for Lee Pringle and the patrons of his establishment by a Seth Thomas clock with a 30 day movement. Advertising posters proclaimed that "We handle nothing but the best goods in Wine, Liquors and Cigars".

The lounge in the rear was fitted with 10 private booths built along the one wall. Each was divided from its neighbor by a mahogany panel about six feet in height, and the entrance to each was closed by drawing a heavy green drapery suspended by rings from a shining brass rod. The walls of these cubicles were covered with embossed leather. An ornate cast iron table flanked by a built-in bench on either side furnished the booths. A "call button" in each activated a call box in the barroom, so that services could be rendered the occupants. The rear hall led to a door through which persons could enter or leave without being seen by those engaged in gambling and drinking in the barroom. This door opened on the alley behind the Inn.

Females engaged by the saloon as barmaids, or the "fallen lilies" plying their trade were commonly seen in the barroom, but it was considered very unseemly and unladylike for a female member of a respectable family to enter a saloon. Therefore, if the prim and proper ladies of the town felt inclined to imbibe a bit, the College Inn offered them a darkened entrance to a secluded booth where they could enjoy the privacy they desired.

One can imagine the ladies garbed in floor length gowns of lawn or taffeta, or in walking suits of moire or serge, in a variety of muted colors; the wide-brimmed hats were adorned with willow plumes of ostrich feather or genuine birds, stuffed with wings outspread, and yards of wispy veiling.

Their dapper escorts, in suits of dark colors, boiled shirts with celluloid collars, bowler hats atop their slicked-down hair entered the dimly lit lounge with their ladies on their arms.

On the second floor of the College Inn, accessible by a door on the street level were nine lavishly furnished sleeping rooms. They were ranked as "the best in town". A tenth room had bar service, equipped with a dumb waiter to the bar below, and was designed for gambling.

Theodore Pringle drove a beautiful team of horses hitched to his fringe-topped surrey about the town and countryside. Though he disposed of his saloon business in 1918, he retained considerable property interests in the community. He was a well-known colorful character in the history of Douglas.

Puckett, Hardin Family

Though the information about the Puckett family is very limited, the history of the early inhabitants of the Orin community would be incomplete if they were not mentioned. Mr. and Mrs. Hardin Puckett came to Wyoming from the vicinity of Fort Collins, Colorado some time between 1900 and 1910. They homesteaded just west of Orin, south of Highway #20.

They had four children, Vina, Jimmy, Ernie and Fanny. Mr. Puckett and his two eldest children all homesteaded near one another.

The Pucketts were industrious, hard-working people, spending their daylight hours laboring in their fields. Their evening meal, usually served about 9 p.m. marked the end of their day. Mr. Puckett, worn out by the day's work, always fell asleep before the meal was over.

A small patch of land which Mr. Puckett owned was sub-irrigated. Here he raised watermelons. Frequently the children from the town would go there to steal the melons, all the sweeter for having been stolen.

I, Earl Gaylord, remember an incident that happened with the Pucketts very distinctly. The Pucketts was one of our favorite places to go. One time, Fanny Puckett was visiting at our house. We got the Ford started to take Fanny home. We got close to the Puckett place, where there was a gate that had to be opened. Fanny got out of the car to open the gate, and about the time she was opening the gate, Mom, Grace Gaylord, who was rather new at driving, lost control of the car and ran through the gate that wasn't open. The wire entangled Fanny and tore all her clothes off but didn't harm her. This was really embarrassing for a young lady of her age standing out there without any clothes on.

Mr. and Mrs. Puckett eventually returned to Fort Collins to live where Mr. Puckett died in 1935. Jim Puckett stayed on, living on the original place after his parents left. He married Violet Phinney. They were the parents of one son, Dick. Violet died in 1962.

Putnam, John J. and Myrtle

My father, John J. Putnam, came to Lost Springs, Wyoming in 1906, as master mechanic for the coal mines. The main office was in Lost Springs with other mines at Inez, Glenrock and Gebo. In 1908 he homesteaded just south of town, on the hill, about a mile from the railroad tracks. The town grew fast, as all boom towns do, but when he first came to Lost Springs, there was a depot, consisting of two boxcars. It was the only shelter for miles around.

My mother Myrtle D. (Paxton) came in 1911. She loved Wyoming and the wide open spaces. She was an artist and always marveled at the changing colors in the skies and the landscape. She used Laramie Peak as a weather vane, and said she could always tell when weather would be changing. In 1912, they built their new house on the hill. It is still there. The Wrights were very close friends and built on a hill just northeast of town. Mother and Margaret would wave each morning to greet one another.

Transportation consisted mostly of the railroad and horse and buggy. Mr. O. L. Walker had one of the first automobiles. In reading my mom's diaries, one of the highlights of the day was his taking the folks for an auto ride. The diaries are written mainly in little books given by the Walker Lumber Co. each year. The only other car I can find mentioned is the mortician's, and it was referred to as the limousine.

The weather wasn't always very pleasant. Winters seemed more severe and longer than now. Dad used to tie a rope around his waist and attach it to the clothes line to go from the house to the barn. Blowing snow could change all sense of directions.

My sister, Ruth, was born in 1914. The mines were closing down and the town disappearing, so Dad bought the John Arnold Ranch in 1915. It was located south of Glenrock on Deer Creek.

There were many beautiful friendships made, and many events told about Lost Springs and how they hated to leave, but a new home, new friends and a very full life awaited them in the Glenrock area.

I, Joan, was born on November 7, 1918. Ruth and I were raised on the Deer Creek Ranch, and graduated from the Glenrock High School. Dad was County Commissioner for one term from 1921-1925. Both Mom and Dad were active in lodge work, Masons and Star. They lived the rest of their lives in the Glenrock area.

John J. Putnam was born in Monroe County, Iowa in 1872 and died in Glenrock in 1944. Myrtle D. Putnam was born in Monroe County, Iowa in 1880 and died in Glenrock in 1967. Ruth Putnam Philbrick died December 8, 1960.

Ramirez, Luis and Asuncion

Maria Asuncion Guerra de Rodriguez was born in La Calera, Yrapuato, Guanajuato, Mexico, August 15, 1888.

Her parents were Pedro Pacheco Rodriguez and Maria Micaela Guerra Rodriguez.

She had one brother, Fidencio Rodriguez and one sister, Felipa Rodriguez Cortez of Buffalo, Wyoming.

On June 9, 1909, she was married in the Catholic Church in Santa Rosalia, Guanajuato, to Jose Francisco Luis Aguirre Ramirez.

While in Mexico, Asuncion and Luis worked in the Hacienda Santa Rosalia. Asuncion earned five cents a day as a maid, and Luis earned eight cents a day as a peon.

Asuncion was very much aware of the time when Pancho Villa raided the town where she lived. She remembered Pancho Villa so vividly. He was not a very tall person. She remembered his black horse, a beautiful animal. His halter was studded with silver concho beads and his saddle was covered with silver.

Pancho Villa, as she recalled, was dressed in a black caballero suit trimmed in white, and his hat was also black and white with a silver concho hat band.

He would raid the towns for food, money, liquor and young ladies. His favorite hangout was any family home where he would be treated like a king. When he had his fill of everything, he would leave a few pesos on the table and disappear into nowhere until the next raid. This was quite an experience for Asuncion. She was one of the few that saw the famous Pancho Villa.

Asuncion's favorite memory was when her husband Luis first came to the United States, he would send her little gifts like ribbons of all colors and embroidering and crocheting thread.

In the summer of 1916, Asuncion, Luis and Sofio, their first child, came to the United States on a freight train as immigrants to the "land of opportunity."

They arrived in Galveston, Texas where Luis went to work in the cotton fields. From Texas, Asuncion and family travelled to Topeka, Kansas. They then travelled through Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado, New Mexico and Wyoming.

In 1917, Asuncion and family moved to Casper, Wyoming with Apolonia and Joaquin Martinez (Maria Ramirez Maes' Godparents).

Luis worked in the Casper refinery and later on for Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad. Meantime, four more children were born: Leonar, Maria, Gerardo, and Apolonia.

In 1927 Asuncion and family moved to Careyhurst, Wyoming. Her husband worked on the railroad with Mr. Nelms. Asuncion sent her family to school at Careyhurst, Wyoming. We had to carry our lunches, which were refried bean burritos. We walked about a mile to school among weird creatures, especially snakes.

In the early winter of 1930, Asuncion and family travelled to Los Nietos, California in a 1927 convertible. Luis found a job in a textile factory.

Six months later, Asuncion and family returned to Casper, Wyoming, because Luis did not like California.

Asuncion and family lived in Casper, Wyoming for awhile, and then Luis decided he wanted to try the beet fields. Luis got 50 acres of sugar beets at Mortons Ranch. Asuncion and family worked for a Japanese farmer. Luis figured that an acre a day was enough for a day's job. They worked from 3 a.m. to 6 p.m. every day, including Sunday. Asuncion and youngest daughter Polly would take breakfast, lunch, and water to the beet fields daily. Mid-day she would send Polly with a water bag of lemonade as a treat.

Asuncion cooked on a coal and wood stove. She washed clothes in a wash tub with a scrub board. She would iron clothes with two hand irons (made of solid iron) on a table. She also baked homemade bread. She just put everything together, and it came out perfect and delicious. She didn't need to follow a recipe.

Asuncion would chop wood, carry coal, carry water and take care of her family.

On April 3, 1933, Asuncion and family moved to Douglas, Wyoming, where Luis tried his hand at ranching, which turned out to be a very sad experience.

Luis was employed by the city to help build the American Legion Building for a dollar a day and relief assistance, which was bacon, flour, grapefruit, cabbage and kerosene.

In order to get extra money for Asuncion's extra household needs, Luis would collect copper, milk bottles and egg cartons to sell to meet the demands of the family.

Asuncion was such a good cook, she made everything look like a banquet. She was also very good at mending, making patches look professional.

In 1930, Asuncion and family moved to Wheatland, Wyoming and worked in beet fields under a Russian farmer. He wouldn't let them have food or money until a full day's work was completed. The family lived on oatmeal for a week, no sugar or milk.

Asuncion's favorite holiday was Christmas. Early in the summer she would buy a pig and fatten it for Christmas. A week before Christmas, Oracio (son-in-law) would butcher the pig.

Asuncion would start by setting up the Nacimiento (the Nativity). She would put a wooden frame on the wall and decorate it with pine and glass ornaments and lights. She then would fix the altar for the baby Jesus.

She made the baby Jesus' dress all by hand because it was so small. Sometimes she would crochet the bonnet.

On Christmas Eve, she dressed the baby and sat Him on a platter full of candy. At midnight she would pick one or two persons as sponsors to lay the baby on the candy platter and pass Him around.

Everyone would kiss the baby and take a piece of candy. Then He would be put to rest on the altar until January 6, when the same sponsors would sit Him up until next Christmas.

Asuncion would prepare a big dinner earlier in the day. The menu was tamales, bunuelos, hot chocolate, etc.

Asuncion was not a fashion doll. I do remember a picture of her. She was sitting on a chair wearing a black skirt, white blouse with ruffles, black high button shoes, and a black straw hat with a rose on the side. She wore her black hair in a chignon. She made her own dresses and her trademark was her very highly starched aprons. She never went anywhere without her apron.

After Luis died on December 2, 1966 she lived in the Brownfield Addition by herself for many years and raised chickens, sheep, ducks, turkeys and dogs as pets.

Asuncion moved to Casper, Wyoming in May 1983 to live with her son, Jerry Ramirez.

November 1983 (Thanksgiving) her family from Douglas went to spend the holidays with her. She wasn't feeling very well then and she became very ill in the days that followed. Maria Asuncion Guerra Rodriguez Ramirez died December 16, 1983 at the age of 95 years young.

One son and three daughters survive her. She will always be remembered as a member of the Guadalupe Society and for her highly starched aprons and for raising her family.

Rasmussen, Niels and Marie

Niels Christian Rasmussen was born August 26, 1889 in Davinde on the Isle of Fyn, Denmark. He had five brothers and four sisters. At the age of 18 he had enough money for passage to the United States. He sailed on the ship named the United States and arrived at Ellis Island in 1909.

His Uncle Hans Peterson lived in Lexington, Nebraska and he went there to work for him. Wanting to speak and write better English, he got a job with a family named Jensen, they spoke only English and he learned faster. At the age of 21 he leased a farm and worked it for three years. He heard of some land in Maryland so he found a farm there and bought it. He only kept it a few months and sold it.

Niels got a job for a while selling aluminum cookware. He hired a man named Linn Craig to drive him around, since he didn't drive. When Craig decided to go to Colorado, Niels went with him and helped him build a home for his family.

In Colorado he hired out to a lumber company in Terryall and hewed railroad ties. While in the mountains he went to work for the Strickners, and they told him he could get a place of his own by squatting on land that someone had not proven up on. That he did and stayed there until the start of World War I, when he sold out and went to work for a contractor in New Raymer, Colorado until he was drafted in the army. He went to France but before he had to serve at the front, the war was over.

He arrived in Wyoming in 1919. In Cheyenne he met Billy Irvine. When Niels told him he was coming to Douglas to see about the homestead he had filed on before the war, Mr. Irvine said his son needed help on his ranch in Chugwater, so he went there and worked for Pax Irvine for several months.

When he arrived in Douglas he went out to see about his homestead. It was a very dry year and no grass on Antelope Creek. He could see that it was not what he had in mind so he returned to Douglas to see what he could find to do. George Powell was looking for someone to break horses, so Niels hired out to him for the winter. He stayed to put up hay for Mr. Powell. While he was doing that Mr. B. J. Erwin came over and asked if he would like to lease his place, so Niels went over there.

In 1923 Niels married Marie Olivette Poirot. She was teaching school and boarding with the Holse family. They were married on a Wednesday and on Saturday they were putting up hay. Marie was the daughter of Emile and Nevada Poirot, a family who had been in Douglas a long time. They worked on the Erwin place several years, then he had the chance to lease the Powell place so they moved there. In 1927, Marie's nephew, Thomas Charles, came to live with them, and in later years they adopted him.

In 1935 they bought the Hamilton place and leased several others all around them. The years were pretty lean but they came through them still believing that farming and ranching was the best way. In 1943 he bought the land in Downey Park that Dr. Harp had owned and sold the Hamilton farm to the Chamberlain twins.

They moved into Douglas and while Niels was working on the mountain place, Marie worked for the library and later for the gas company. In 1947 they bought a home and moved to Douglas. Tom came and worked with Niels and in 1952 Tom married Jo Ann Lee. In 1953 Niels bought the Urie Slonaker place on LaPrele and Niels' dream finally materialized of owning land in the mountains and a place on the creek below. Tom and his wife lived on the place and Niels and Marie came in from Douglas every day. Niels has a saying, "That you weren't married to anything but your wife" and when the price was right, sell. In 1958 he sold the LaPrele ranch to Elmer Cowell and a couple of years later the mountain place to Arthur Horr. Tom and Jo Ann moved to Glenrock and Niels and Marie retired to their home in Douglas. They have three grandchildren, Niels, Tommy and Karyl.

Niels and Marie celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary June 13, 1983. On February 11, 1984, Marie died. Niels still lives in the home on Fifth Street and was 96 on August 26, 1985.

To his grandchildren there is no one like him anywhere. He has been a storyteller, teacher, friend and most of all "Gramps." If ever there was a self-made man it is Niels C. Rasmussen.

Read, Frederick and Mary Family

Frederick E. Read was born Nov. 26, 1867 in Surprise, Nebraska. Mary Margaret was born June 1, 1871 in Easton, Pennsylvania, the daughter of Charles and Mary Brunner.

Mary was a former teacher, having received her education in eastern Nebraska, where she moved when she was a girl of nine.

On November 26, 1893 Fred and Mary were married in Surprise, Nebraska. Five children were born to them: Charles Davis, born October 6, 1897 in Surprise, Nebraska and married Iole Cambell December 5, 1923; Alice Elizabeth, born May 30, 1895 in Surprise, Nebraska and married Louis Newell November 6, 1918, died May 16, 1982; Willa Harriet, born November 26, 1900 in Surprise, Nebraska and married Howard Plummer; Edna, born in Morrill, Nebraska on September 24, 1907 and married John Johnson; Frederic "Fritz" S., born in Morrill, Nebraska on April 8, 1912, died on December 24, 1961.

In 1902 the Read family moved to Scottsbluff County, Nebraska, and a few years later homesteaded in the Dutch Flats community north of Mitchell where they made their home until coming to Wyoming in 1916. They made their home on the Gore Place on Upper LaPrele Creek before moving to a ranch two miles southeast of Douglas where they lived until moving to town in their latter years.

Mary died on May 31, 1951, Fred on Mar. 1, 1952.

Fritz died Dec. 24, 1961 at his ranch home two miles out of Douglas. His death was due to furnace fumes. Evidently a malfunctioning damper was the cause of the fumes. Fritz was known throughout the community as an outstanding musician, having played in several bands.

Redenbaugh, Clarence and Clemmy

I, Claude Redenbaugh, was born at Blue Jacket, Oklahoma, July 1, 1905, the son of Clarence E. Redenbaugh and Clemmy Harris. Dad was born in Coffeeville, Kansas. My mother was born at Creighton, Missouri.

My grandfather's name was Milton Redenbaugh. He and his brother, John, came from Holland and settled in Kansas. Then he went to Oklahoma and from there to Fresno, California. To my knowledge they were the only two Redenbaughs that ever came to this country.

My grandmother's name was Rebekah Studabaker. She and her two brothers also came from Holland.

John Studabaker went to California during the Gold Rush in 1849. He did not mine much gold, but he did see a need for the miners to transport their ore. So he invented the wheelbarrow. There have been many inventions, but the wheelbarrow will be here forever.

Returning from California, he and his brother moved to South Bend, Indiana and started a wagon factory. They built the Studebaker Wagon. In later years it was turned into the Studebaker car.

Dad moved to Douglas in 1909 from Oklahoma, known at that time as the Cherokee Nation. He homesteaded 30 miles southwest of Douglas, east of Downey Park, known as Hay Press Meadow. The reason it is called Hay Press Meadow is because the soldiers from Fort Fetterman built a road there and cut and hauled hay to the fort for their horses. The old hay press was still there when we moved there.

Many ranchers cut and hauled hay and sold it to the fort. There is a tale about some of the ranchers who would put rocks in the bottom of their wagons and then cover them with hay, then weigh and sell the hay to the fort. Then they unloaded the hay and drove up to a pile of rocks and unloaded them. The pile of rocks was as high as a small house.

In early days there was a surveyor who came here; his name was Kraft. He was always starting some project that was never finished. One was a ditch on Muddy Wagonhound flats on the Ben Middleton ranch. It was quite a large ditch - a small canal. John Amspoker did the work. As far as I know, he was never paid. In many of his ditches he made, water would not run in them.

George Carothers' dad tells a story on Kraft when he worked for Guthrie brothers as a cowboy. After Kraft surveyed the ditch, and the cowboys made it, they found out the water would not run in it. The cowboys decided to play a trick on Kraft. After dinner the cowhands went out in the yard and started putting up a scaffold with ropes and pulleys. Kraft wanted to know what they were doing. The cook told Kraft they were putting up a scaffold to hang him. Kraft left quickly and headed for Douglas. The cowboys never intended to hang Kraft. They only wanted to put a scare in him, which they did.

In 1918 Dad bought the John Marsden ranch on Wagonhound Creek. Part of it was on Sheep Mountain. The reason it was named Sheep Mountain is that in early days there were lots of mountain sheep there. Mr. Marsden said, to his knowledge, he killed the last sheep there. Mr. Marsden settled there in 1884 before the town of Douglas was built.

In 1941 Dad bought the old Frank Rogers' place on Latham Creek which is now owned by Dr. Kingrey.

Mother died in 1950, Dad died on July 9, 1966.

You have all heard the story of Al Packer, the man eater. Packer prospected and lived in a canyon on the ranch, on a creek called Spring Creek, now called Packer Creek. Packer was captured by Malcolm Campbell, a law officer that lived in Douglas for many years. The canyon Packer lived in is now called Man Eater Canyon.

I never had much schooling. Most times I attended country schools, having to ride horseback from three to five miles each day to attend school. One of the old log school houses is still standing, located on the Oregon Trail on Wagonhound Creek. No one knows how many years it has been standing there.

Many changes have been made since I came to the town of Douglas. One building that I first saw when I came here was the old Northwestern Depot, 67 years ago.

In 1944 I married Mary Grace Garrett, nee Polette, of St. Louis, Missouri. Having sold my ranches and property, I am now retired.

Top row: Ralph Reed and Etta Reed.

Reed, Jacob and Nancy

The desire to acquire land for their son, Ralph, brought the Jacob Reeds to Wyoming. Land was located north of Flatop in eastern Converse County, and the family moved from Atkinson, Nebraska in 1916 to homestead on it. Ralph, the only son, was born on February 8, 1894, an older sister, Bessie, in 1892, Etta in 1900 and the youngest daughter, Dorothy in 1907, all being born in Nebraska.

"It was a very forlorn and lonesome country with lots of open space," Etta Reed Hoffman remembers her first year in Wyoming. "I didn't like it at all." Soon after, things changed as more people homesteaded around them.

The Reeds built a barn and dances were held regularly with Etta and her father playing the violin. Later when the Jim Herricks built a larger barn, the dances were held there with the music furnished by Carlos Miller playing guitar and Etta playing violin. Mr. Reed told Ralph and Etta that the first one to learn to play the violin could have his instrument. Etta was the winner. She remembers the many happy hours that were spent while the family sang and played musical numbers, "We were a very musical family."

Church was held every Sunday in a building on the Reed homestead, with traveling ministers conducting the services.

Etta relates that she was the horse wrangler for the family, having to wrangle their horses from among the Longhorn cattle that roamed the open range at that time. Most of the cattle belonged to the Waneks who lived to the east.

At first the shopping was done in Lost Springs, with fourteen gates to open and shut to get there. Later the family shopped in Douglas.

School was established close by with Ralph Baker as one of the first teachers. The school was known as the Reed School.

Mrs. Reed (Nancy Elizabeth) became ill with cancer shortly after the family's arrival in Wyoming and passed away despite trips to Texas for treatments. Mr. Reed was heartbroken and never completely recovered from the shock of her death.

Selling the homestead to Ralph, Jacob moved, with his daughter, Dorothy, to a place close to Shawnee. He died on January 20, 1926 at his home after efforts failed to get him to a doctor during a severe snow storm which raged at the time.

Ralph married Sylvia Young, daughter of Andrew and Hattie Young in the 1920's. His death from a tragic accident on December 23, 1932 was a terrible blow to his young wife and children. While getting coal from a local mine north of the Raymond Beaver homestead on Walker Creek, Ralph was struck by a falling chunk of coal, killing him instantly. Needless to say, it was a sad Christmas for his family. Sylvia later married Marion Whiting, Jr. She died in 1941.

Dorothy married Nile Pickinpaugh. They moved to Riverton using a covered wagon and taking a milk goat along to have milk for their young children.

as told by Etta Hoffman

Reed, William and Frances Family

William "Will" I. Reed, son of George and Mary Frances Farrell Reed, was born in Oakland, Iowa on December 20, 1890. The family moved to a farm in Artesian, South Dakota where they were engaged in farming and raising livestock. Will served in the Balloon Observation Corps in WWI. However, the war ended before he was sent overseas. George Reed and his sons were involved in many sports, especially baseball, boxing and wrestling.

Frances was born on April 3, 1889 at Osborne, Kansas the oldest daughter of William Henry and Georgia E. Schofield Walrath. The family traveled by wagon teams and train in 1890 to Denver, Colorado where her father owned and operated a meat market. Always seeking newer and bigger horizons, her father moved the family to Mitchell, South Dakota in 1916 where he was the manager of the Kings Ranch.

As a small child, Frances loved to visit at her Grandfather Walrath's farm at Edgerton, Wisconsin. Her love for insects, frogs, fish, animals, and especially poultry, would play an important part in her married life. She stayed with her grandparents while finishing high school, where she graduated at the age of 16. She taught in rural schools in South Dakota where she had as many as 38 students in grades one through eight. Frances disliked teaching and after four years enrolled in nursing school at the Florence Crittenton Home in Sioux City, Iowa. She graduated as an obstetrical nurse and returned to the family home in South Dakota where she nursed for Dr. McComb. Frances would sometimes accompany the doctor in his horse and buggy on house calls and stay with the family until her services were no longer needed. If she arrived on a maternity case before the doctor, who was sometimes delayed, Frances would often deliver the baby. She and Dr. McComb did not lose any patients during the flu epidemic of 1918. Frances was presented an honorary service award from the Douglas American Legion in 1983.

William I. Reed married Frances E. Walrath on November 3, 1919 at Woonsocket, South Dakota. They lived on a farm at Artesian, South Dakota where they farmed and raised livestock. Frances supplemented the family income with chickens, ducks, geese and selling eggs. Five children were born to this union; twins, Ellis and Earl, born September 19, 1920, Wesley, June 20, 1922, Murray, December 11, 1923 and Richard, April 4, 1925.

These were the years leading into the great depression. As the prices for livestock and grain were so meager, they began looking for greener pastures. They moved by train to Cumberland, Wisconsin where they raised dairy cattle, and Frances was in the poultry business again. Will earned extra income by going to Iowa in the fall and winter to pick corn. News of land to be homesteaded in Wyoming prompted Will and a neighbor to spend the summer of 1928 working in the Douglas area and visiting his brother, "Babe," who had already filed on a section of land the previous year. Liking what he saw he returned home, sold their livestock, farm equipment and some household goods and moved to Wyoming in 1929.

They came to Wyoming in a Model T Ford by way of South Dakota. They left the four oldest boys with their aunt while they came to Wyoming to file on a homestead and find a house to live in. Much of the land was already claimed in 1929 and their section was in more than one parcel. They found a 12 x 24 building four miles west of the homestead which they bought for $100.00.

They returned to South Dakota to bring the boys to Wyoming. Their Airedale dog "Peggy" rode all the way to Wyoming on the running board of the Model T. Ford. They arrived in Wyoming October 9, 1929 with $35, five boys and a box of shells. Will was a good shot and the neighbors would buy shells for him to shoot antelope for them. They stayed with Will's brother Babe until the men and neighbors could move their house to the homestead site. Wood was hauled by team and wagon from the Cheyenne River and some coal from the mouth of Duck Creek. Attempts to dig a well were unsuccessful and water was also hauled by team and wagon in the summer. Snow was melted in the winter all the years they lived on the homestead.

The boys attended the Tony Funk School which was five miles from the homestead in 1929. Will took the boys and their cousin, Violet Reed, to school in the Model T Ford until Will went to work in the spring. The children then walked to and from school every day. Anna Lynch, a Dry Creek native, taught their school her first year of teaching. They attended the Meadowlark School which was located a mile and one half from the homestead in the fall of 1930. Their teacher was Mrs. Lewis Funk and students attending were the five Reed boys, Jack Funk, Helen, Kelly, Leonard and Viola Shelden.

The spring of 1930 found Frances hatching chickens for neighbors. She had three incubators and traded baby chickens for many things including a team of horses. They planted part of the ten acres to navy beans and, needless to say, they traded beans, sold beans and ate beans. The land was not suitable for farming and Will worked away from home most of the seven years they lived on the homestead. He herded sheep, farmed for neighbors and whatever other jobs he could find.

They bought sheep in 1936 and moved to the Dry Creek Community. They moved back to the homestead for a short while, then sold it to Rhea Tillard. They then moved to the Walker Creek Community where they continued in the sheep business. In 1938 they moved two miles east of Douglas and the boys attended Douglas High School. Will operated the Ross mail routes to the Ogalalla Ranch from 1938 through 1942. He carried mail, passengers and freight three times a week. The family moved to Douglas in 1942.

Murray and Wesley served in the navy during WWII and Richard was in the army during the Korean War. Will and Frances were divorced in 1946, and Will moved to Walla Walla, Washington where he died in 1957. He is buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Frances lived in her own home until 1975 when she fell and hurt her hip. She has been a resident at the Michael Manor Nursing Home in Douglas since that time. Frances is 95 at this writing and spends many hours reading books. Ellis retired from the Wyoming Highway Department in 1984 and resides in Casper. Murray and Richard also live in Casper and are retired. Wesley still lives in Douglas and keeps busy with his various enterprises.

Earl graduated from Douglas High School with the class of 1940. From the time he was 15 he worked summers, doing farm work, lambing, and herding bucks. After he was out of high school, he worked at various jobs. When he had saved enough money to buy a bunch of old ewes he went into ranching, first with Lee Fowler and then on his own. He leased and later bought the Jim Blackman place in the Dry Creek Community.

He married Jewell Pellatz in 1949. Earl learned to shear sheep with machines and sheared his own and neighbors for several years. Their boys sheared too as they got old enough. Earl always liked to hunt and spent lots of hours denning coyotes and night calling predators. For a few years he had trail dogs and hunted bobcats and coon. The last few years he has gunned from a "chopper."

Earl and Jewell are both active in community and county affairs with 4-H and Hunter Safety being their favorites. They have four children: Larry Wayne married Billie Ann Boulden, children are Kristen Marie and Brendon Wayne; Thomas Lee married Beverly Ann Shelden, children are Monte James, Coralee Beth and Elizabeth Ann; Bruce Francis; and Mary Katherine.

Reeder, Dan and Eva Family

The sun slid down the western sky until only a ray of half light was left. Up north an old coyote sent up his mournful cry. A petite young woman with two young children was sitting on the bank of little Cottonwood Creek, a tributary of North Box Creek. She squared her shoulders, took a deep breath and did her best to prepare herself and her children to be torn to bits by a pack of wolves or at least be scalped by savage Indians. That morning she and her husband had awakened and seen what they thought were small deer but which were actually antelope. In like manner, they saw what they took to be wild turkeys but which were actually sage chickens. She knew she was in very wild country from the strange new things she was seeing. Darkness came abruptly as it does in Wyoming but still the woman tried to be brave.

The smallest child, a little girl, by this time was asleep but the boy was still awake. "When is Daddy coming back?" he asked. "I don't know, soon I hope" the woman answered with a sigh. At that time, as if on cue, from the east came the sound of a hard working motor and headlights cast a ray over the top of the hill. Of course there were no roads at that time and the car was bumping along over sagebrush and cactus. All three started toward the headlights crying. The little girl wailing the loudest of all because she had been sleeping with her head in her mothers lap and had been unceremoniously dumped on the ground when the woman jumped up. In addition, she had stepped on a cactus which was enough to make anyone cry.

The reason I happen to know all this is because I,

Richard Reeder, was the boy and the woman was my mother and the little girl, my sister. The reason we were in this predicament was because Dad had gone into town to get lumber to build our homestead shack. They had filed on the land the day before in Douglas and since we all couldn't ride in one Model T Ford with a load of lumber, we were left behind for the day. It had been a mighty long day for Mom who had never been more than three miles from a town before in her life and certainly not on a lonely prairie with two small children. However, when Dad got to the place they had chosen for a camp he put everyone at ease with his sympathetic and soothing words. In short he said, "What in hell could hurt you out here?" He could have been wrong because later after our small house was completed, Texas Longhorns had a trail in back of our house that they followed to go for water in Box Creek.

Mother, Eva Farris, was born July 1, 1891 and raised in the small town of Shelby, Nebraska, 70 miles from Lincoln. She had gone to Lincoln to help Aunt Nett and Dr. Methany, who were friends in Shelby and that is where she met Dad.

Dad, Dan Reeder, was born in Trenton, Missouri May 31, 1890 and was a motorcycle racer and mechanic. At one time he held the world champion speed record for motorcycles. This was when the mechanical age was in its infancy. I don't know the details of their romance, suffice it to say they were married at ages 18 and 19 on May 25, 1909 in Lincoln, Nebraska. I came along three years later and my sister, Ruth, four years after that. Whatever decided them to homestead in Wyoming we will never know, but I'm sure they were young, full of adventure and thought that it was there they would make their fortune. Neither of them knew anything about farming or farm animals but by necessity they found out. As a matter of fact, I remember mother telling Dr. Methany just before we left for Wyoming, "That when we make our fortune I'll buy you a Stradivarius." The doctor was a violin enthusiast and played beautifully.

We came to Wyoming in our Model T from Nebraska. Filing on the homestead on June 27, 1917 had been delayed a few days because when they located where they wanted to file and had been looking over the area the old Ford went klunk, bong and stopped. Dad, being an auto mechanic and a very good one, crawled under the thing and took off the pan and found that the poor old Ford had a broken crankshaft. Mom, Ruth and I sat while Dad walked about three miles and found a couple of homesteaders who had a team of horses and a wagon. Their names were Roy Hart and Bud Olson and their homestead was north of where we were planning to locate.

They came and got us and took us up to another homesteaders place, a Mrs. Parrish. She was a widow woman with two boys named Orvel and Duke. She let us stay with her and the next morning Dad started to walk to town, which was 30 miles, more or less, and since walking was not the least bit crowded and no one came along he walked all the way.

Dad was pretty tough in those days but he stayed in town that night before starting back because he figured he would probably have to walk all the way back and sure enough he did. He stayed with the rest of us that night with Mrs. Parrish and right after breakfast he walked down to where the old Ford was resting. He took out the motor and replaced the crankshaft, it took all day. By the time he had finished it was dark so he crawled up in the seat and went to sleep. The Ford didn't have a starter on it so he cranked and cranked and along about noon it finally started. It just had to because by that time he had not had any food since breakfast the day before and he didn't have enough energy to walk the three or four miles back to Mrs. Parrish.

Now, having secured the lumber and with everything as close to normal as it ever got, Dad and Mom started to figure where to build their house. Dad wanted to put it down near the creek where there was lots of water and Mom wanted it up on the hill where she could see. So we put it up on the hill where she wanted it.

How in the world Dad managed to haul enough lumber to build that homestead shack on a Model T touring car I'll never know. But in those days he did a lot of things that amazed us.

The building started as soon as we had breakfast cooked over a campfire and went amazingly fast. Of course, it was small and had tar paper on the outside but it was home to us. We drank water out of the creek and boiled it until Dad could dig a well.

We had no more settled in our new home than Dad looked up toward the north and informed us "Well, I guess we are going to be held up, here comes a masked rider". Sure enough, there was a masked rider bearing down on us at a slow walk on an old bay horse that couldn't manage much more than that. The masked rider rode up to us and said in a high voice, "My stars, I didn't know anyone was down here." The masked rider then introduced herself, "I'm Maude Goldsby, and I have a homestead about three miles north of here." With that she removed her mask and explained that she had to wear a mask while she was out in the sun because she freckled so badly. She was a lovely young woman with beautiful red hair. She said she had a kid brother named Bruce and he was going to homestead when he was old enough.

I well remember our first Fourth of July in Wyoming.

We had just gotten the shack finished so that we could live in it and Mom wanted to go someplace on the Fourth of July. Dad explained very patiently that there was no place to go but Mom was so upset that she spent most of that day crying. In Nebraska, where she had spent her youth, there was always something special on the Fourth of July; baseball games, the town band and fireworks. It was a big celebration. However, Dad wasn't used to all that type of celebration so he went on with his work and let poor Mom cry.

Shortly after that Dad decided that we needed a team of horses complete with a wagon and harness. Of course, he couldn't work horses without harness so he cranked up the Model T and headed for town. There was a livery stable in town run by Ardie Slaters and that was the first place Dad stopped. Mr. Slater told him that he would need to go talk to a man named Anderson who had horses for sale. Dad hunted Anderson up and sure enough he had horses. He ran about 100 head and Dad looked them over and said "I'll take that one and that one." They were a couple of little brown mares three and four years old. Frank Batton and some other cowboys roped them out of the bunch and got them tied up to the corral. Dad still didn't have a wagon or harness so the men took him and found an old wagon and some harness. For good measure he bought a saddle too.

It took quite a while to get the horses harnessed since neither one had ever had a rope on them before and weren't even branded. But due to the "know how" of the cowboys they managed to get them hooked to the wagon and their boss told a couple of cowboys to help Dad through town and over the river bridge which they did.

After they had gotten across the bridge one of the men started feeling sorry for the "green horn" that didn't have any better sense than to hook two unbroken broncos together. He said "Look, when we turn these horses loose they're going to run". Dad said "Hell, I've ridden a motorcycle a hundred miles and hour. I know they can't run that fast". So the cowboys turned the horses loose and then ran and Dad just sat on the wagon and let them run. He got them turned into Mortons Lane by using all the strength in him and pulling them to the right; they finally slowed down to a trot and then a walk.

Everything was going along fine when a man came along in a Model T and yelled "Hi." The Model T was bad enough but with the man yelling "Hi", no bronc would stand still for that and away they went right through the fence and over the railroad track, made a left turn for the other fence and back out the same hole they had torn in the fence in the first place. However, they did stop for the fence on the other side of the road and Dad got off the wagon and tied them up solid to the fence and went back and tried to patch the place where they had torn the fence down.

He had a bad time getting the mares pointed in the right direction again and he never got the wagon home that night. The two little mares just gave up about four or five miles from home. So he took the harness off of them and put it in the wagon, put the saddle on one mare and tried to lead the other. She wasn't halter broken and the one he was trying to ride wasn't saddle broken either. But he tied the lead rope to the saddle horn and started out. The one he was trying to lead pulled back so hard she almost pulled the saddle horn out of the saddle, which frightened the one he was trying to ride. However, she finally buckled down and dragged the other mare until she got the idea that she was supposed to come along.

They got home about dark and Ruth and I, like kids will, rushed out to pet them. Fortunately, they were so tired they didn't even try to raise a fuss. Dad put hobbles on them and turned them loose. They weren't used to hobbles, so next morning they didn't look too good, but one thing about it, they had to get gentle because we never stopped petting and using them. We named them Nell and Doll.

The only time we ever got milk other than condensed milk was in town or from the neighbors. The neighbors always gave us milk when we visited but that wasn't too frequently. However, since cattle were all over the range, Dad decided there had to be a cow that was part Jersey or something in the bunch. So he went out looking for a milk cow. He found one in a group that acted gentle but she wouldn't let him get close enough to milk her, so Dad decided to rope her. Not having a throw rope was no particular barrier to him, he simply tied a couple of halter ropes together and went forth on old Doll. The old cow in question wouldn't move away from him too far but she wouldn't stand still and let him put a rope over her head either. He had to swing it and every time he did that, it would scare the mare and she would jump and he would drop the rope. He was afraid to tie it to the saddle horn because old Nell had almost torn it out by its roots when he was trying to lead her. So he did the next best thing. He tied it to his wrist and that changed his luck. The first time he threw it he made a catch. It wasn't the cow but a nice big sagebrush that wouldn't budge an inch.

Doll didn't know she was supposed to stop when he said "Whoa" and kept going. Dad did a sort of flip flop and before he hit the ground was cussing all the cows and horses black and blue in the state of Wyoming.

This was only part of our first summer in Wyoming. After Dad sent Mom, Ruth and myself back on the train to Lincoln he took the two horses up to the Goldbys for the winter and walked back to the house with halter in his hands. He was nearly home when he came across a herd of Longhorns. He thought he would scare them like you normally do range cattle and made a run at them, flopping the halters, but one of the Longhorn steers didn't scare. As a matter of fact he took umbrage and started chasing Dad. Fortunately, Mother and Dad had put up a small amount of fencing that summer and Dad could run fast. He just barely made it under the one wire fence and that did stop the steer but the steer kept running up and down the fence bawling and wanting to get at Dad. I wish there was room for more because the Reeder's had many interesting times, good and bad.

Ruth went to high school in Douglas, graduating in 1934. She left Douglas in 1937 and went to Denver where she found work with the U.S. Government.

Mom and Dad sold their place in 1939 to the Lee Fowlers. Mom, Eva Farris Reeder, was born on July 1, 1891 and died on January 2, 1975. Dad, Dan Middaugh Reeder, was born on May 31, 1890 and died on February 24, 1983.

Reese, George Sr. and Grace Family

William L. Reese was born in Wales, England in 1831. He was a carpenter and built ships. When steam was invented and with the coming of steam ships he became unemployed. They decided to come to America after making inventory of the family financial status. It was thought best that William come first with the family to follow later. He, being a carpenter, found immediate employment in Boston. In 1872 his wife and six children, including my father-in-law, George Reese, Sr., joined him in Lynn, Massachusetts. Crossing the ocean, the family traveled at steerage rate which was the lowest rate.

Imagine the joyful meeting when his wife and six children joined him then after a 23 day journey across the Atlantic on Princess Elizabeth, a coal and wind driven ship. They rushed into the inspection process accorded all immigrants. They were anxious to see the new home that he had for them.

The family took up a 160 acre homestead south of Logan, Kansas, a town without a railroad. They built a half dugout home and at first they didn't have a horse, or couldn't afford one. They obtained a couple of steers or oxen to put in their first crops.

The Reeses were often asked why they left such a beautiful country on the British Isles and a home by the sea for one in a rugged pioneer country. They would always repeat an old English axiom, "The more ancient the belief, the more fabulous it becomes."

George L. Reese Sr. and family were living near Logan, Kansas in 1913 when they read in the Logan Republic that Bill Dieleman, a former resident of Kansas was settling homesteaders in Wyoming. They wrote to Bill and made arrangements. George Sr. came to Wyoming in the fall of 1913. Bill met George at Lost Springs, they went to look over the place, then to Douglas to complete the papers to file on the 360 acre homestead. He spent the night with them.

On April 4, 1914, Mrs. George Reese Sr. (Grace) and her children: George Jr., Charlie, Leola, Raymond and Leonard came to Wyoming on the train. Cousin Bert Pilcher and John Sweeting, Bert's step-father, came with the emigrant car half full of cattle and eight or ten horses, wagon and tent. They unloaded the stock in the Lost Springs stock yard, hitched up the horses to the wagon and journeyed to the homestead south of Shawnee. Shawnee was nonexistent at that time.

John and Bert looked at the homestead joining the Reeses but didn't file on it. They stayed a few days and returned to Kansas, later Bert came back to Wyoming where he and his family made their home in Wheatland, he worked at road construction for many years.

There weren't any fences until one came to Milford McKibben's homestead.

In 1919 Reeses left Wyoming and went back to Kansas where the children attended high school and later Charlie attended Grand Island Business School. Then the Reeses heard how it rained in Missouri and they moved to Mountain Grove, Missouri where I met them.

On March 5, 1931 Charlie and I were married and journeyed to Wyoming in a Model T Ford. Arriving at Glendo we cut up through where Glendo Lake is now to the south end of the homestead. George and Leonard were plowing with two teams with one bottom plows.

George Sr. and Raymond had come from Missouri earlier in a covered wagon trailing the eight horses; a few weeks later in another Model T were Grace, George, Jr., Leola and Leonard.

When the family arrived every building on the homestead was gone with only the windmill remaining. They repaired the mill and built a house. George Sr's job was to haul a barrel of water from the mill to the house.

We bought two milk cows; and when Leola and I went out to milk, the cow kicked my bucket of milk over, after that Charlie helped milk.

Homesteaders and renters left little by little in the 30's. We rented and bought more land. We went to sales and bought bucket fed calves and increased our herd.

George Sr. died on June 17, 1949, Raymond on December 27, 1979, Leola on December 28, 1982 and Charlie in 1984.

Charlie and I have two children; Charles V. was born on August 14, 1938, he married Cheri Fredric on June 14, 1964, they have four children. Rita Ann was born on September 14, 1942, she is married to Gerald Koeplin and has two children.

Reese, Henry and Alice Family

Henry Reese was born in Hamburg, Germany in 1872. In 1888, at the age of 16, he came to the United States traveling alone. His first stop was at an uncle's place near McCook, Nebraska. He worked there and other nearby places for $20.00 a month until 1896. At this time he headed west into Wyoming ending up in Converse County.

He first worked for the CY Ranch as a ranch hand. This was the Carey Ranch between Douglas and Glenrock and was generally known as Careyhurst. He lived the typical life of a cowboy, working hard for $25.00 a month and riding into Glenrock horseback for a Saturday night of fun, drinking, dancing and playing penny-ante poker. Henry learned to play poker and developed a natural card sense which became one of his recreational outlets in later years. Being unable to save money at this kind of life Henry went to work in a coal mine near Glenrock. He worked four days and made a grand total of $8.20. Not liking this type of work he soon got a job herding sheep for the John Higgins sheep outfit near Glenrock. For the first time he was able to save some money. He decided to save $500.00 and invest in a poolhall. After reaching the $500.00 goal he changed his mind and went for the thousand dollars with the intention of buying some sheep.

He reached his $1,000.00 goal and then had an opportunity to buy a thousand head of sheep from Ed Smith for $2.50 a head. Not having enough money he tried to borrow the balance from the local banks but was unsuccessful. However his disappointment soon vanished when it developed that Ed Smith owed a bill to George Bolln's store. So they worked out a deal whereby Henry paid Ed a thousand dollars and assumed his bill at George Bolln's store, gave George a mortgage on the sheep and then went to work herding his own sheep. At first he ran his sheep on open range and government land and soon was able to hire a herder.

Later he bought a 240 acre homestead from Ed Datesman on the head of Shawnee Creek, which included a log cabin with a sod roof. Using that as a base of operations he was able to gradually acquire additional acreage and established a going sheep ranch east of Douglas on Shawnee Creek.

About this time he met Elise Schmidt who had just come over from Austria the year before. Elise was working with her mother Julia Schmidt helping in the operation of a cafe in Douglas. In July of 1906 they were married in the Jacob Jenne residence in Douglas. To this union were born four sons. The first two babies died in infancy, Henry Jr. was born on June 29, 1909 and Arthur was born on January 17, 1912.

Henry was an active sheepman for many years. He also established residence in Douglas buying a home at 6th and Center. Henry was active in community affairs, serving as city councilman during which time many city improvements were accomplished.

Elise or Alice as she was generally known was active in the Douglas Women's Club and a choir member of St. James Catholic Church.

The ranch survived the depression, although it was difficult and times were hard. During this period Henry and the two boys attended the ranch with occasional help during lambing and shearing. Times gradually improved and in 1935 Henry Jr. married Luella O'Connell. They had two daughters, Norma and Julia. Luella was a Chadron, Nebraska native and was teaching school at Shawnee.

In 1940 Arthur joined the Wyoming Highway Patrol which had been in existence only a few years. Henry managed the ranch with guidance from Henry Sr. who lived in Douglas, but was still very active.

In 1943 Arthur enlisted in the Marine Corps and served in the South Pacific for almost two years. Returning home and completing his enlistment, he rejoined the highway patrol.

Arthur married Grace Haggerty of Rock Springs while stationed there. They had two boys, Michael, Arthur and a daughter Pamela.

Alice Reese passed away on May 19, 1959, Henry Sr. followed two years later on Sept. 29, 1961.

Henry Jr. continued operating the ranch until his death on August 18, 1967. Subsequently, the ranch was sold. Arthur remained with the highway patrol retiring in 1977 as assistant director.

Reeves, Clyde, Blanche, and Hazel

Clyde Franklin Reeves was born January 15, 1884 at Garrett, Illinois, the eldest of four sons to Harry and Isabelle Reeves. He moved with his parents to Murray, Iowa in 1893 where he grew to manhood and was married to Blanche Luce on September 20, 1909. They had four children; Gerald, Bernice (Mrs. Paul Scott), Arlene (Mrs. Ted Waters) and Pauline.

He came to Wyoming in 1916 and homesteaded three miles south of the Dry Creek Store. He later managed the Fiddleback Ranch on Box Creek. Blanche cooked for hired hands.

Blanche passed away October 24, 1953 and the daughter, Pauline, passed away in 1934.

He moved to Douglas and kept his homestead. Clyde and Blanche were good neighbors, always ready to help when their friends had a new baby, sickness or death in a family.

Clyde had a good memory. He could remember when all the children were born in the community, also when different events happened.

On November 19, 1957 he married Hazel Scott Johnson. He died October 17, 1963 at the age of 79 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Reichelt, Fred and Angie

The AR Ranch, originally 320 acres, was homesteaded in 1919 by Angie Sprague. Angie's mother, Mary Jane Sprague, homesteaded on another acreage nearby. Angie had been born in Salem, Missouri on September 8, 1890, and had come with her mother to Wyoming.

The Spragues engaged the services of Fred Reichelt to assist with the management of the ranch. He came to Wyoming in 1928 to serve in that capacity and remained in Wyoming to make it his permanent home. Angie Sprague and Fred Reichelt were married later. Angie had a daughter, Virginia, by a previous marriage.

Before he settled in Wyoming, Mr. Reichelt was connected with the Missouri Pacific Railroad for 18 years working as a switchman and Assistant Yard Master. During WWI, he was a member of the Railroad Battalion in charge of troop trains at Jefferson Barracks in St. Louis, Missouri.

As the years passed the Spragues and then the Reichelts increased their original holdings to include eight sections of deeded land capable of supporting 250 head of cattle.

Virginia Reeder married Clarence Beeler April 12, 1924. The couple were the parents of three children, Gloria, Eva and Donald. Clarence died in 1973 and is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

The Reichelts moved to Douglas to make their home in 1953. Angie passed away on February 14, 1960. Fred died 13 years later on September 4, 1973. Both are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Angie had a daughter Virginia by a previous marriage.

Reid, Charles Sr. and Eliza Family

Eliza Ann Collings was born December 25, 1853 to Peter and Nancy Collings. The fifth child in a family of ten, in Terre Haute, Indiana. All ten were born in Jackson and Vigo Counties, Indiana.

Charles Reid was born July 5, 1851 in Montgomery, Alabama.

Eliza Ann Collings and Charles Reid were married in Colorado Springs, Colorado, October 7, 1880. Their first child, Charles Henry, was born in Alamosa, Colorado, May 25, 1882. They ran the Halfway Station on the Ft. Fetterman Road at 22-Mile on the Laramie Plains. I, Margaret Bolln Curry, can remember Grandma telling about going to Ft. Fetterman for supplies, down a long bumpy hill in a spring wagon. Uncle Charlie bounced out the back and some Indians picked him up, riding away. They brought him back in a few days and traded him for a few pieces of silver. Grandma was busy in the way station; and lacking toys, she would put molasses on Uncle Charlie's thumbs and forefingers and give him a feather to play with from one hand to the other, keeping him amused for quite some time.

In the early spring of 1884, there were heavy snows up to the roof of the station. Steps were dug out from the front door to the top of the snow. Grandma had gone out for some exercise and when returning, slipped and fell all the way down, landing on a rock slab in front of the door. The next morning, March 21, 1884, George Cornelius was born with the assistance of a snow-stranded couple. Grandpa Reid was snowbound at a neighboring ranch.

They moved to Fort Fetterman from 22-Mile and then to a ranch about 30 miles south, on the LaBonte, which he called the Lazy SJ in 1886. While living there, Margaret Nancy was born on August 8, 1887 and Florence on October 25, 1890. Mrs. Messenger took care of Grandma both times. Florence weighed between 2½ and 3 pounds and was wrapped in cotton batting, placed in a cigar box and put on top of the warming oven. She was always a small child and could usually be found by looking for the big dog, her constant companion.

In 1892 Grandpa Reid sold the Lazy SJ to Archie Rutherford and moved to Douglas. They bought a rooming house on Second Street and called it the Reid House. It is known now as the Converse Hotel. They also bought a restaurant from an elderly couple, by the name of Warner and grandma ran both while grandpa spent most of his time with sheep business. (from the Pioneer People, published in 1962; by Laura Reid).

Tents and tepees were used as living quarters on the range for sheepherders. In 1893 Charlie Reid designed a canvas covered wagon with built-in equipment such as stove, cupboards, bed, table and seats. Frank George and Tom Cook, local blacksmiths with Harry Ruhl and Gus Peterson as helpers, had a board shack for a blacksmith shop, which had to be torn down to make way for the Burlington Railroad some years later. These "smithies" constructed a new kind of home, on the running gears of a wagon provided them by Mr. Reid. This was the first sheep wagon in Douglas. In the spring the completed wagon was pulled in front of the Reid House to be loaded with supplies. Many people inspected it, among them, John Morton, who had the second wagon made with several improvements, the major one probably was replacing the canvas flap style door with a tight fitting canvas covered frame on hinges. In April Mr. Reid pulled his new "Home on the Range" to Rawhide as headquarters for lambing camp. To the joy of the trusty sheepherder, wherever the sheep went, this convenient wagon went for him to live in.

Grandpa Reid wintered his sheep at Scottsbluff, Nebraska. He contracted pneumonia while there and died March 15, 1899. He was buried in the Poverty Flats Cemetery and later moved to the Reid-Ullman-Bolln family plot in the Douglas Cemetery.

After Grandpa Reid's death, Grandma sold the Reid house and bought a ranch on Mill Creek, approximately 25 miles from town towards Laramie Peak, from Joseph and Flora Callais, June 11, 1902. She later added more adjoining land from Thomas G. and Martha A. Bruner. These two parcels of land were original land grants to Callais and Bruner. Grandma moved the sheep to this ranch. One of the men working for her was George Ullman, born September 25, 1868 in Germany, who she married at the rectory of the Catholic Church, Douglas, September 15, 1902. They acquired additional land and lived there until 1919 or 1920, when they moved to Douglas. The ranch was later operated by Charles and Laura Reid. The Ullmans built a house in the 400 block of South Fifth which they later rented, moving to a smaller house at 226 South Fifth. Grandma Ullman passed away July 26, 1939 and Grandpa George Ullman passed away December 4, 1946. The ranch was sold to Cliff Peterson, who owned the adjoining ranch originally owned by the Foxtons.

Reynolds, Joe and Mary Family

Joe Reynolds was born in 1885 in South Dakota where his parents had homesteaded in Charles Mix County. Joe was the sixth of nine children raised on the farm located in the "breaks" on the west side of the Missouri River of southern South Dakota. His early life was spent in the immediate area of the family home where he did odd jobs and herded cattle on the unfenced range land. In 1909 Joe and three friends headed for Wyoming where they hoped to get work on the Pathfinder Dam construction project. The four had pooled their money for tickets on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. Those tickets got them as far west as Orin Junction. Out of money and still a long distance from their destination, they hired on as cowboys with the Keeline roundup crew who were shipping cattle from Orin Junction at the time. The four men, Joe, Dick Emery, George Marty and Jack Sulley, never made it to the Pathfinder Dam site but remained in the cattle business the rest of their lives. Joe soon went to work as a cowboy for J.M. Carey and Sons at their Careyhurst Ranch west of Douglas where he was employed until 1917 when he homesteaded on the Cheyenne River in Converse County. World War I caused a shortage of cowboys so Joe worked part time for Careys until 1920. During Joe's cowboy years he rode in the vicinity of Casper, Midwest, Gillette, Newcastle, Lusk and Douglas and for several years "run the wagon" for Careys.

Mary Lane Slichter Reynolds was born on a homestead west of Fort Fetterman, Converse County in 1895. Her mother, Mary Cass Lane, died shortly after Mary was born and John and Sarah Slichter, nearby neighbors, raised her and adopted her three years later when her father, John Lane, died. John Lane had come from Virginia to work as a crew boss for the Black Diamond Coal Mine owned by the C & NW Railroad near Inez just west of Douglas. Joe Reynolds and Mary Slichter were married in 1915 and lived in Douglas until suitable housing could be built on the homestead in 1917. Mary Reynolds had grown up a dedicated horsewoman and helped with the riding and other ranch work until she was 80 years old.

Joe Reynolds bought his first cattle and brand from Bert McReynolds who had his camp near Joe's homestead. Since the open range was rapidly becoming private property Joe began buying homesteads near his own and leased pasture for his growing herd of cattle. In 1928 he bought a 400 cow herd from the Higgins estate of Glenrock and leased their former summer mountain range south of Glenrock. He then summered all his cattle in the mountains south of Glenrock and wintered them on the Cheyenne River north, about 60 miles separated the two ranges.

In 1930 he bought the Duck Creek Ranch division of the John T. Williams Sheep Co. which was eight miles from his home ranch. The mountain lease was abandoned and all efforts were directed toward adding to the two ranches he and the banks owned. After the purchase of the Shorthorn cattle from Higgins, Joe bought only registered Hereford bulls. In 1942 he put together a small herd of registered Herefords to supply bulls for his commercial cattle. Joe's lifelong interest was cattle and the ranching activities associated with them. For many years during the '20s and early '30s Joe was a rodeo arena judge at the Wyoming State Fair in Douglas, Cheyenne Frontier Days as well as other locations. Joe was a Mason, Shriner and for many years a member of the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association executive committee. Joe remained active in the ranching business until he was 84 years old and spent the remaining years in Michael Manor in Douglas where he passed away at the age of 87 in 1972.

I, Walter J. Reynolds, was born in 1916, the only child of Joe and Mary Reynolds. I was a little over a year old when my parents moved to the ranch location on the Cheyenne River. I attended rural and Douglas grade schools and high school at the Prep. School on the University of Wyoming campus in Laramie. My recollection of those years is of cowboys and horses, trailing cattle and building fence and homesteaders selling out. I graduated from the Engineering School of the University of Colorado in 1938. Those were not the best of times so there were few jobs for college graduates, or anyone else for that matter. For about a year after I got out of school I surveyed for the Federal Soil Conservation program in much the same area my father had cowboied in 30 years earlier. He enjoyed reminiscing about events near or at the sites where I staked reservoirs. In 1939 I joined my father in the ranching business. The same year Evelyn Ireland, daughter of Harve and Mary Ireland of Douglas, and I were married and started living on the Duck Creek Ranch.

World War II caused drastic changes in our ranching. Engine driven equipment replaced teams and trucks replaced trailing. We sold our work horse mares and saddle horse mares, about 40 head, and eliminated most of the chores normally associated with ranches and farms.

For many years I was president of both the Douglas High School Board and District 17 School Board. I have been chairman of the Converse County Republican Central Committee and member and president of the Wyoming Game and Fish Commission. I have been a member of the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association executive committee since 1955, served as chairman on many subcommittees and also as the 32nd president of that organization. I have been a member of the board of directors of the American National Cattlemen's Association. For seven years I have been a member of the State Water Quality Advisory Board.

Evelyn and I have three children who are all engaged in cattle ranching. Karen, Mrs Lowell Goemmer of LaVeta, Colorado, has two sons. Sherry, Mrs. Don Dukat, of Gordon, Nebraska, has two daughters and one son. Jeff is part owner of and lives on our ranch northwest of Douglas. Jeff's wife, Cindy Burks Reynolds, is a great granddaughter of John and Sarah Slichter who adopted my orphaned mother.

Rice, Charles and Almina Family

Charles Rice would have been able to trace his family back to Simsbury, Connecticut during the time of the Revolutionary War. From there, his grandfather, Joseph Rice moved his family to the frontier of the time, Trumbull County, Ohio in the heart of what was known as the Western Reserve. Again, the family looked to the West when his father, Lorenzo Dow Rice left Ohio and moved the family to Osage, Mitchell County, Iowa. Charles grew up on a farm there and later studied to be a carpenter. Charles was probably introduced to Almina Howard by his brother, Ammon Rice. Ammon had married Almina's sister, Amanda in 1866.

On Feb. 27, 1879, Charles and Almina were married at LeMars, Iowa. Shortly after, Charles obtained the position of Post Carpenter for Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory, and the necessary packing and purchasing was made for the long journey by ox-team. The journey was undoubtedly crowded as Almina's mother, Anna (Young) Howard and two children came with them.

The children of James and Anna (Young) Howard played an important part in the beginnings of our young country around Converse County, Wyoming. Not only did Ammon and Amanda (Howard) Rice settle here, but another brother-sister match, William Howard and Georgia (Rice) decided to make Converse County their home, and established ties here. Many will also recall Almina's sisters, Almeda, who married Frank "Sodcorn" Gore, and Ellen, first wife of Sam Slaymaker, Converse County's first assessor. (Note: Ellen married #2 J. R. Slaughter, and when she died in 1899 was buried in the old Douglas Cemetery north of Douglas. There is no marker for her grave). The father, James Howard, who had remained in Iowa followed the family to Wyoming. Evidently James became ill shortly after arriving here in Wyoming and he became one of the pioneers buried at Old Fort Fetterman, Wyoming.

Charles soon found the atmosphere around the old Fort unsuitable for raising a family and moved his family to a log cabin in Spring Canyon, about 15 miles from Fort Fetterman. Indians lived close by and Charles, coming home on the weekends from the Fort made it a point to remain friendly with the tribe. One boy always waited for Charles under a tree, and was always rewarded with a bit of candy. When he failed to appear one day, Charles rode over to the camp to learn the boy had died.

When Fort Fetterman was abandoned in 1882, Charles was offered a post at Fort McKinley near Buffalo. He chose instead to homestead on Beaver Creek in the LaPrele Community of Converse County. This place became a stage-stop, and often a "resting place" for travelers using the Laramie City to Fort Fetterman Road. Charles continued to work as a carpenter and his skill as a blacksmith came in handy for both his own and travelers' repair work with wagons and animals. Many of the coffins at the old Fort were built by Charles, and all of them in the little community cemetery at Beaver, Wyoming were made by Charles and lined by Almina Rice.

The Beaver Post Office was granted May 15, 1887, and Charles became the first Postmaster with the family kitchen serving as the post office. Later, Mrs. George Cross would take over this duty. The family moved from their log home to the new two-story home built by Charles about 1890.

Charles and Almina had three daughters; Anna (born 1879), Myrtle (born 1884), and Mable (born 1888). All the girls attended the old Beaver School, made of logs, near the ranch. Anna married Ethbert "Bert" Stanford in 1902, Myrtle married Leon Sutphin in 1903, and Mable married Al Lass in 1909.

The younger daughter, Mable became seriously ill, and the Rices took the oldest grandchild, Stanley Lass, to raise. After Stanley married Mary (George), they lived for a time with the elder Rices. Mary can recall driving to the mail box each day to check for mail and on the way back would offer Grandpa Rice a ride to cool off from the hot summer sun. He never took her up on the offer as "Grandpa Rice did not believe in Women Drivers!"

Charles and Almina decided to sell the ranch in 1938, and from there moved to Glenrock, Wyoming. They enjoyed trips to property in Oregon and to relatives around the state of Wyoming. In 1940 they celebrated their 61st wedding anniversary with family and friends wishing them the very best. Charles died in Dec. 1940, just a few months before a 62nd wedding anniversary, and Almina died in 1944. Both are buried among friends and family in the Glenrock, Wyoming cemetery.

Richards, Clare and Agnes Family

Clare Allen Richards "Slim," was born October 21, 1889 while his parents were moving from Rockport, Missouri to Colorado. His parents had stopped the mule team pulling the covered wagon for a rest and so that he could be born.

He lost his father at a very early age, and was raised by his stepfather and mother along with three half brothers and three half sisters. He did a lot of mischievous pranks as he was growing up, being remembered for teasing the girls with snakes and pulling their hair.

He attended a country school in Colorado and completed fourth grade. At the age of eleven he had to quit school and make his own way. From 1900 until 1909 he did anything and everything, from thinning and harvesting sugar beets to working with a number two shovel on the railroad.

In 1909 Slim came to Wyoming on the Colorado-Southern Railroad which at that time extended to Orin Junction. He was hired by then Governor Carey to work on the CY Ranch.

In 1913 he was hired by Gilbert Brothers to help build the Burlington Railroad overpass at Orin Junction. He then went on to help them extend the railroad to Casper. His job during this time was to drive a six horse to 20 horse team, pulling an excavator as all dirt work was done by team. The wages, considered good, were $2 a day.

In 1915 Slim, Wheeler Eskew and John Flynn drove string teams of 14 horses from Douglas north along the Ogalalla (Ross Road) hauling freight for such ranchers as Metcalf and Nellie. The round trip took seven days and Slim recalled hauling lumber for some of the buildings still standing in that country. The roads were often muddy, and to get across some of the worst spots, the horses had to be unhitched from two wagons and hooked to one. This process was repeated until all three wagons were across, and on their way.

September 1918 saw Slim leave Wyoming to join the army and serve in World War I. He attained the rank of PFC in the medical corp and served at Fort Leavenworth and Fort Riley, Kansas and Fitzsimons Army Hospital in Denver, Colorado. By November 1919 the war was over and he received an honorable discharge.

On returning to Wyoming, he discovered the Gilbert Brothers were erecting the huge oil tanks in Casper. Again working for the construction company, and using the teams of horses, he helped level the ground where the tanks were to be set, and was in on the construction of the huge earthen dikes which surrounded the tanks. From Casper, the construction company and Slim moved to Tank Farm between Glenrock and Orpha, doing the same type of work. The dikes are still there, along with the water tower.

In June of 1924 Slim married his long time sweetheart, Agnes Pearl Brewer. Following his marriage, he worked for many of the area ranchers, among them Bill Smith Sr., Frank Amspoker and Mortons, Inc. He spent many months herding sheep and telling tales to his children when they came to visit him.

Slim and Agnes had ten children, eight of whom are lives in Douglas. Roy lives in Glenrock and has three children. Clarence lives in Idaho and has three children. John made his home in South Dakota with his wife and four children. Mary is currently in Mississippi and is the mother of four children. Alice is in Lamont, Wyoming. She is the mother of six children. Harry lives in Orpha and has two children.

Slim retired to Orpha where he worked in his garden. He passed away February 23, 1973.

Richards, DeForest

In 1886 DeForest Richards moved to Douglas from Chadron, Nebraska and began a life that would lead him down the roads of business, banking and politics, and finally end in the governor's chair in Cheyenne.

Born in the East (Charleston, NH) in 1846, the second son of Reverend and Mrs. J. DeForest Richards spent his early adult years in Wilcox County, Alabama. There he was elected sheriff at the age of 22 and served two terms as county treasurer. He retired from politics and bought a tannery, which would prove to be a disastrous venture, ending in bankruptcy. After two years of work as a shoemaker (making use of the skins left from his tannery business) he had repaid all his debts and began a mercantile business which finally brought him financial security.

In 1871 he married Elise Jane Ingersol of Camden, Alabama. They had two children, a son, J. DeForest II, the third Richards to carry the name DeForest, and a daughter, Inez Elise, born in 1873.

During a visit with his family in South Dakota in 1885, DeForest decided to enter the banking business in the boom town of Chadron, Nebraska with his brother Bartlett, a well-known Nebraska cattleman. The bank was a success and the Richards' name was to be important in banking circles in Nebraska and Wyoming for years to come.

By 1886 the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad had reached Douglas, Wyoming and the Richards brothers decided to open the First National Bank here. The bank was erected in three months on property purchased for $1,250.00. (In 1887 Richards built a family home at Fourth and Cedar in Douglas and today this stately house is home to Mrs. Charles Saul.)

The untimely arrival of the disastrous 1886-87 winter brought stock losses so heavy that Richards realized something must be done by the new bank to rebuild the local economy. Not only were the ranches suffering, but their plight had left many area merchants with little income. DeForest and his associates began trailing sheep from Oregon, to be sold to local stockmen, and financed by the First National Bank. This chain of events helped to build prosperity unknown before in this area of Wyoming but this was not accomplished without problems. "The Cleveland depression of the 1890's occurred. One evening the bank directors met and urged Mr. Richards to bring foreclosures against all the indebted sheepmen. Finally, Mr. Richards definitely refused to follow the advice of the directors. He maintained that to foreclose on the sheepmen would not only ruin them, but would break the town's businessmen and the community. Thereupon, the directors placed their resignations on the table and left the room. As the last director reached the door, he turned around and said, 'Richards, if you don't foreclose the antelope will scratch their backs on the corner of your bank.' But Mr. Richards did not institute any foreclosures. He worked hard, weathered the storm, brought the bank through without asking government help, saved the sheepmen and the businessmen. The community flourished and no antelope appeared."<sup>1</sup> One cannot help but feel that DeForest's failure in business at the beginning of his career gave him the empathy and courage to make this stand.

At this time, politics seemed to again become the focal point of his life. Richards served as Mayor of Douglas and was elected to the State Senate. By 1892 he was described as a dominant political figure in Converse County. In 1892 his political aspirations led to a race for the governorship. At that time the nomination was decided at the Republican State Convention and Richards lost out on the tenth ballot. By 1898 he was ready to enter the race again and began his campaign by traveling the entire state by buckboard. It was a rather ambitious task in that day, but one which he seemed to enjoy.

Richards won the governorship by 1,394 votes and was re-elected in 1902 by a very large majority. At the beginning of his second term, during April of 1903, he died suddenly in Cheyenne of a heart attack. Perhaps the most fitting tribute was offered by Fennimore Chatterton, who had accompanied Governor Richards on that long buckboard ride during his first campaign. "He had the staunch, moral and courageous character of a long line of New England ancestry. He was always kind, generous, an unswerving and loyal friend; the real test of true manhood. He was an able, successful business manager and state administrator. He was ever ready to extend a helping hand to the unfortunate."<sup>2</sup>

During his term in Cheyenne, Governor Richards helped to make the production of oil, natural gas, coal, uranium and other natural resources subject to taxation in the State of Wyoming. He also initiated a reclamation project on the Platte River which irrigated several hundred acres of land in Converse County. According to historian Clyde M. Brundy, "No Wyoming administrator ever did more for tillers and grazers of the land."<sup>3</sup>

J. DeForest Richards II was destined to become head of the Richards enterprises after his father's death in 1903. He became president of the First National Bank in Douglas and in 1910 we know he was cashier at the Omaha National Bank. Unexplainably, there doesn't appear to be any family record of him after 1911.

In contrast, daughter Inez Richards' life has been well documented, and even today, she has a memorial in Converse County. The Inez Road, to the west of Douglas, was named for her. The road intersects Interstate 25, which carries thousands of travelers past it daily, most of whom have no knowledge of the life that inspired its name.

In the fall of 1895 a romance began between 22 year old Inez and Bartlett Richards, her father's brother. Her parents approved the match, and they were married in Berlin, Germany on February 8, 1897 in the presence of the DeForest Richards family. The couple returned to Nebraska, but the newspapers made no mention of the family's trip or the marriage — only that Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Richards had returned.

Inez and Bartlett raised four children; Longley (1898-1974), Kathleen (1902-1904), Bartlett, Jr. (1901-1978), and Elise (1904). Bartlett was already one of the major cattlemen in America, but their life was soon to be shaken to its roots.

In 1906, Bartlett and his partners were indicted and brought to trial on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government and perjury. In a very controversial move, the government had decided to begin prosecuting those who fenced government leased lands, in an effort to "cut the cattle barons down to size."<sup>4</sup> Richards was convinced of his innocence. His land dealings were done on advice of counsel, and everything he had done had been common cattle industry practice for years. There was considerable shock when he was convicted and jailed. Inez Richards, in an attempt to protect her children, never told them where their father was.

Bartlett died in prison at the age of 49 in 1911. Inez received the news by telegram as she traveled on a train to visit him. In 1923, Inez Richards left this part of the country for the last time. All she had been able to salvage from their once considerable fortune were proceeds from the sale of a house, one insurance policy, and a small amount of oil stock from wells located on the 77 Ranch near Manville, Wyoming. During her remaining 53 years, Inez Richards never really accepted what fate had dealt to her family. Her life, once so full and secure, had ended a bitter experience.

Richardson, Robert and Sada Family

Robert Douglas Richardson was born October 18, 1869 at Rolla, Missouri, the son of Jasper A. and Altamor Huffman Richardson. On December 14, 1894 in St. Louis, Missouri, Robert married Sada Del Carolyn Dawson, born May 15, 1872 in Gentry County, Missouri, the daughter of James Gilruth and Rachel Wagner Dawson.

Robert came to Wyoming from Fremont, Nebraska in March 1908 to file on a homestead. Billy Spaugh took him around to show him the land in a horse and buggy. My father located some land one and one quarter miles west of Keeline on the north side of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. After filing he went back to Fremont and engaged what was called an emigrant car bringing a team of horses, cows, chickens, and household furniture. He and two sons, Paul and Howard rode in the car to take care of the stock on the way. Mother and the rest of the family consisting of me (Grace), Opal and Beauty came on a passenger train. We arrived at Keeline and stayed in a house called Grout until our house was built. It was built one quarter mile east of where it should have been located because the survey was moved one quarter mile west.

Our first well had a windlass and long bucket about five feet long by five or four inches in diameter with a rope attached. It was let down to fill with water, then we turned the windlass and up came a bucket of pure cold water. Later came a Samson windmill and pump and the wind pumped the water. What a luxury! But water was still carried in a bucket and after using the water, it had to be carried out. Father fenced his land and farmed, putting in tomatoes, small corn, wheat and oats, barley, rye, squash, pumpkin and turnips.

Sister Ruby was born on Feb. 2, 1909. Also the same year a school house was built at Keeline where all of us older children got our education. Mrs. Ellie S. Watson was the first teacher. She taught all eight grades, ninth and tenth all in one room. She was a widow with three sons, Joseph, Judson and Ernest. Joseph became a school teacher, Judson a lawyer and Ernest a doctor.

M. E. Church filed one half mile west of us. They stayed with us while their house was being finished. Years later Minerva Church married Judson Watson.

For fuel Father hauled large logs out of a canyon at the Chalk Buttes, north of us about seven or eight miles and coal from the Onyon Coal Mine at Shawnee, Wyoming by team and wagon.

All our machinery was horse drawn: walking plow, harrow, disk, riding plow, potato digger. The potatoes were picked by hand. We raised all our vegetables to have during the winter. They were put in pits. After the vegetables were put in pits it was covered by boards, straw and soil.

Mother raised a large garden and in this was several long rows of horseradish. My brother, Howard, and I decided we wanted to make some up. So we dug and dug while every once in a while saying we sure liked horseradish, well, we ended up with almost a number three wash tub of roots which had to be washed, scraped and ground. But it never all got made up as it stings your eyes and nose till you can't see but it was good on our fresh pork.

On December 21, 1910 Pearl was added to our family.

Our father put in oats this year on good virgin soil. They made 65 bushel to acre. That was a good growing year with plenty of rain. But most years were dry and made times hard. In 1912 the blizzard came, killing thousands of cattle, freezing them. After the storm the ranchers hired men to skin them. My father and brothers worked at it. This being the year after Converse County was divided. Niobrara being a county in 1911.

There were many disappointments. Like the year Father had a nice field of grain which lacked about three days of being ripe enough to cut, we had a hail storm that pounded it into the ground in 20 minutes. Next morning father plowed it under and put in oats that would make hay. What faith!

We had a carriage, two seats, two lamps and a fringed top drawn by two horses. It was called a surrey.

Father went to Shawnee and cut nice long logs to make a corral and enough to make a log building, putting in cement tanks. He put in three first, one deep enough to hold five gallons of milk to cool; the other two were more shallow for putting butter and other things that had to be kept cold. The water in the tanks was out of the well. This building was where a beef or pork was hung to keep it cool or in the winter froze.

One time Father and Mother went to Lusk on business and left us children at home. Well we had a young horse that wasn't broke and we wanted to ride. My brother, my sister, Opal, and I got busy and made up gunny sacks into a form of small girl. We stuffed it with straw, saddled up the horse and tied the dummy on the saddle. When our parents were about one quarter mile from home, we turned the horse loose. He went up the lane bucking and running. Of course Mother was so frightened as she thought it was my sister on the horse. That is an example of some of our entertainment that we made.

Many winters there were revival church meetings at Keeline. If the weather was bad and there was a lot of snow, Father would hook up a team of horses to a big sled with a wagon box filled with straw covered with a tanned cowhide and lap robes of the same to cover us.

There would be hot bricks or stones put in to keep us warm if it got extra cold. There were also dances held on Saturday nights quite often. Keeline grew to be quite a little town of a drug store, grocery, garage, filling station, elevator, hardware, lumber yard, bank, church, school and hotel. The hotel had a large dining room, kitchen and room on the first floor where there was a player piano. On the second floor were bedrooms. In those days traveling salesmen traveled by train and would stay overnight. I worked there but couldn't be persuaded to work in the dining room because I was too shy. We had two passenger trains from the east and two from the west every day.

Della the last child was born August 20, 1915. About this time Father bought a Studebaker.

In 1916, a company began drilling for oil. Paul and Howard had two good teams of horses; they hauled pipe out to the site. Shortly afterward they joined the marines but didn't see action as the war was declared over.

In 1918 during the flu epidemic, Mother and five of us girls were all very sick. Father and Opal never got it, so they took care of us and did all the other chores.

That fall Father had many acres of potatoes to pick. Because of the war, his pickers were all young women.

Howard married Louise Martinez in 1918 while still in the service in California. He died in March 1982 in Grass Valley, California. Paul married Vilda Detter (one of the potato pickers) in Douglas in August 1919. He died November 21, 1974 in Bullhead City, Arizona. On February 14, 1922, I married D. F. "Dave" Wilson in my parents' home in Keeline. Opal married Robert A. Lincoln on November 26, 1922 also in Keeline. She now lives in Fallbrook, California.

Father had 75 acres of potatoes to pick that year. Dave and his friend Charles Huntzinger went from Douglas to help. The potatoes were picked, hauled into a large drive through cellar, and unloaded. The disappointment was that Father could only sell a few of them.

In 1923, Mother went to town driving the horse and buggy. The horse was frightened by a motorcycle and ran off. She suffered a broken ankle in the accident; it healed correctly.

After a crooked deal, Father lost his place and the family moved to Douglas where Father died August 1, 1938. Mother died June 13, 1962 in Scottsbluff. Both are buried in Douglas.

Ruby married Allen Jackson in Douglas; in 1936, she married M. Luckenbill. She died in 1941 in Rock River, Wyoming. Pearl married Curtis Cady on July 7, 1927 in Douglas. She lives in Casper. In 1931, Della married Curley Jordan; in 1950, she married Ward Nance and lives in Douglas. Beauty married Frank Martinez in California. She died May 8, 1982 in Oceanside, California.

After living in Douglas until 1937, we moved to Lusk where Dave bought out Sam Langford and built up a plumbing and heating business.

Dave lost his first wife in the 1918 flu epidemic. His children by her are Louise Ollie (Mrs. Eldon L. Hasson of Hillsboro, Oregon) and Earl Wesley (died August 7, 1972). Our four daughters are: Ruth Merle (Mrs. Hubert Snow of Evanston, Wyoming); Grace Ellen (Mrs. Gene Powers of Yankton, South Dakota); Lorraine (Mrs. Henry L. Wasserburger of Lusk); and Davenne Myrtle (Mrs. Dean Glandt of Cheyenne).

Dave passed away February 6, 1972; and I have carried on the business since then.

Rickabaugh, Lewis and Mary

Lewis Irwin Rickabaugh, the third son of the family of ten children of Jeramiah and Amelia Anna Estep Rickabaugh, was born in Centre County, Pennsylvania, on August 5, 1858. His father was born April 3, 1829 in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania; and his mother was born in Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, September 27, 1835.

While Lewis was a small boy, his father went to serve the Union, Company F, PA Inf, during the Civil War. The father returned from the war safely.

On December 26 and 27 of the year 1879, two boys and two girls of this family died with diphtheria.

In 1883 most of the Rickabaugh family moved to Pueblo, Colorado. Father Jeramiah and sons worked in the steel mill.

On August 9, 1890 Lewis was married to Mary Emma Snook in Pueblo, Colorado. She was the daughter of Levi W. and Clarissa Lehr Snook. Her birthplace was Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, January 12, 1855. Her father died when she was a very small child. Her brother, Henry Charles Snook, had married Lewis' sister, Mary Etta Rickabaugh, in 1881, and they had moved to Pueblo also in 1883.

Because of poor health, Lewis moved with his family to Douglas, Wyoming in 1907. By this time, Lewis and Emma had two sons, Charles (14 years old) and Clarence (12 years old). His mother, Anna, and the Henry Cyrus Miller family moved from Pueblo, Colorado to Douglas around this time, too. Mrs. Miller (Rhoda Alice) was a younger sister to Lewis.

From the DOUGLAS BUDGET, 'When Douglas Was Young' column it states: . . . During the year 1907 over 400 homestead entries were made in the Platte land district, 240 of which were located in Converse County . . . Mr. L. I. Rickabaugh announced that he will run the town herd this summer. Everybody will be glad to see the herd in competent and careful hands . . .

Lewis I. Rickabaugh and Henry C. Miller had homesteads just a few miles south of Douglas.

Amelia Anna Rickabaugh died on Dec. 18, 1914 at Douglas.

During World War I, Charles served his country overseas. Soon after his return home, he was married to Beulah Hazel May on June 4, 1920 at Torrington, Wyoming.

Clarence was married to Leora Mildred Towne, Dec. 3, 1922, in Douglas, Wyoming.

Charles and Clarence earned their living as automobile mechanics, and for a time in the early 1930's were partners in a garage. Clarence later owned and operated a garage located on North Second St. (the Moose Lodge is there now).

Lewis I. Rickabaugh passed away on Sept. 16, 1926 at Douglas of natural causes. His wife, Emma, then lived mostly with son, Charles, until her death in Douglas on Oct. 28, 1934. The homestead was sold to Herman Wulff.

The Charles Rickabaugh family moved to Los Angeles, California in 1936.

Clarence died on December 16, 1964. Leora died on October 27, 1959.

Riehle, Jacob and Lena Family

Jacob "Jake" Riehle was born in 1878 in Immenhausen, Germany, a small farming village, and grew up with a dream of a land of opportunity.

In 1901 after serving two years in "Kaiser Bill's" army, he headed for America. Missouri was his first stop. After two years of "batching", Lena Junger, also of Germany, came to be his bride.

By 1916 the lure of "free land" to be homesteaded in the west called him. In the spring of 1917, after selling his farm and gathering together an emigrant car of machinery and livestock, along with Lena and seven children, Mary, August, Pauline, Anna, Herbert, and the twins Raymond and Rowland, (Dora and George to be added later), he moved to the homestead north of Douglas. The only transportation was horses and a "lumber wagon." They very hurriedly built two small buildings for shelter, to live in temporarily, the house to be built later. These were eventually to be used for a chicken house and tool shed.

The land was kind to him and grew a good garden, lots of potatoes, vegetables, and some crops, which continued for several years, but his desire was always to run more livestock.

Fencing the open range, by the homesteaders, left the large outfits with more stock than range. The Fiddleback Ranch, under Vic DeMott, chose to put some of their sheep out on shares of which Jake took two hundred head. To him this was his "dream come true", and his roots were firmly planted.

One of Jake and Lena's main concerns when they moved was church and schools for the family. They were instrumental in establishing the O'Leary School three miles southwest of their home. Here the older children attended school under the able teaching of Angeline (O'Leary) Tillard. This was to be followed a few years later by the Coolidge School two miles northeast, all to be brought together in the fall of 1929, along with several more small schools, to create the Dry Creek School at its present location, three miles northwest.

They helped start a Sunday School at the Fairview School, four miles north, which they attended.

During the flu epidemic of 1923 their five year old daughter Dora died. Due to the fact of not having a car and other very sick members of the family, Jake was the only one that was able to attend the funeral in Douglas.

In 1924 (a momentous occasion) they purchased their first car from John LeBar, a Model T Ford, a touring car with side curtains, much improving their mobility.

In 1927 the people of the community built the Dry Creek Hall on land donated by Dr. H. G. Lynch. Dr. and his wife, Rhue, were very active in the Fairview Sunday School. With the establishing of a community center, the Sunday School was moved there, and named Dry Creek Sunday School. Through the years Jake and Lena and family attended regularly and were very active in the Sunday School, and at the present time their children, grandchildren and great grandchildren have followed the example set for them.

In May 1928 Mary and Ernest Steinle were married and she moved to his homestead on the Cheyenne River where she still lives. They raised three children, Bill, Carl, and Betty Steinle Slagle, as well as cattle and sheep. Bill and family and Carl and family still ranch on their home place. Betty and her husband Earl and family ranch twenty-five miles east.

Just before the "Great Depression of 1929" Jake bought a herd of lambs, to grow into ewes, for nine dollars each. Then the lambs he produced, he sold in 1931 for $1.90 and in 1932 for $2.20 per head — tough times. In 1934 again came bad droughts and grasshoppers. Mature ewes sold for $2.00 each, but they just hung on and hoped for better times ahead which were to come.

In February 1934 Anna married Gerald Ford and moved to Montana but returned to this area later. In 1943 Gerald died. Later she married Roy Jarmon.

In May 1935 again the rains came and with it grass stirrup deep. Also August married June Good and with their two children, Wayne and Donna, they ranch on the home ranch. Wayne and family, with his parents, along with his uncle George still ranch the old homestead. Donna and husband Clayton Dixon and their two boys operate a ranch north of Lance Creek, Wyoming.

In 1936 and again in 1940 sadness came with first the loss of Herbert and then Rowland.

In 1940 Pauline married Bill Roesch and moved to a ranch in the sandhills near Whitman, Nebraska. Along with the normal problems of raising cattle and two boys, she enjoyed writing poetry and painting, one of which hangs in the Pioneer Museum in Douglas. Herbert and family live in Mullen, Nebraska and B. G. and family in Montrose, Colorado. After a long bout with cancer in 1964 Pauline passed away.

World War II eventually moved Raymond to the east coast where he followed the sheet metal work. There he married Katherine Shaffner. Their daughter Judy and her husband Jim Arva live near them in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

In 1944 Jake and Lena quit active ranching and in 1947 moved two miles north of Douglas, where they lived out their time. Anna still lives on this place.

Jake and Lena felt they had seen the area come a long way and felt very richly blessed with family, friends and neighbors and were happy and satisfied in their move to Wyoming. The land they had is still operated by their children. It's a long way from Germany to present day Wyoming, but they never had a regret with their moves, only satisfaction and love for America, Wyoming, and their community.

Jake died on Dec. 12, 1967, Lena died on May 18, 1959.

Robertson, Wm. H. and Julia

Wm. Robertson's father, Andrew immigrated from Scotland in the eighteen seventies and was an early day sheriff in Rifle or Meeker, Colorado. Julia's parents immigrated from Germany and established a farm north of Sidney, Nebraska, which is still being farmed by family members today.

Wm. H. married Julia Ernest, daughter of Joseph and Julia Ernest on May 5, 1908.

Mr. Robertson and wife homesteaded in 1927 about three miles south of the old Verse Post Office, fifty miles north of Douglas. Moving from Nebraska, they were one of many families moving west, victims of the "Great Depression" and the wave of bank failures nationwide. He built a fourteen by fourteen rough board building known in those days as a "tar paper shack." The family of five lived in this for several years. Water was hauled in barrels from the nearest waterhole and strained through a flour sack. From this beginning a fair sized ranch was built. The property is now owned by the Peabody Coal Company.

Of the four children, Doris, the oldest was born at Omaha, Nebraska in 1909. She taught school for the homestead children in a one room building some distance from the ranch. She rode horseback to the school. She is now a widow and lives in California.

Durward was born in 1911 at Omaha, graduated from high school in Broadwater, Nebraska and homesteaded near the ranch. He organized his own drilling business after WW II and was one of several drilling contractors who founded the Wyoming Drilling Contractors Association in 1965 in an effort to upgrade drilling practices in Wyoming. He married Clara M. Owen, February 12, 1941. They are members of the Congregational Church and have two children living, Evelyn A. Earlachner of Findlay, Ohio and Sandra J. Poirot of Buffalo, Wyoming.

Wm. H. Robertson, Jr. was born in 1913 at Medicine Hat, Alberta, Canada. He served in the Navy in WW II and homesteaded near the ranch. He taught school for several years in Converse County. He was employed by the Wyoming Highway Dept. until retirement. He married Grace S. Spracklen in 1940. They have two daughters, Betty and Rose Lee (twins).

Kenneth J. Robertson was born April 29, 1922 at Dalton, Nebraska and served in the navy in WW II. He was a member of Oakland, California Police Department until retirement. He now lives at Bridgeport, California. He has four children, Larry of Sidney, Australia, Chrissy, Joan and Jimmy of California.

Wm. H. Sr. died in Sept, 1960. Julia married Pat Oliver in 1962.

The homestead days were hard on children; and two of the homesteader's children are buried on the ranch. Not long ago I stood on a spot in a remote part of the ranch where I had knelt 50 years before as a couple buried one of their children. They were too dazed by poverty and the terrible drought of 1934 to provide for their children; and they were burying the youngest in a rough wooden box lined with a piece of old quilt. As I stood in silent reverie I wondered if the one who lay here might, if given a decent chance at life, have today become a great man or even president. It was a sad realization that wind and sage and sand were all these little souls would ever know.

Robins, John and Ella

One of the first pieces of information on John Robins is the remembrance that Charles Reid had printed in "Pioneer People of Douglas and Converse County, Wyoming 1886." "John Robins and Gordon Fitzhugh Sr., proved upon homesteads on Wagonhound Creek about ten miles south of Douglas. One homestead shack served them both. The partition was over the boundary line of the homesteads, Mr. Robins occupying one end, Mr. Fitzhugh the other." Courthouse records show that Mr. Robins received his patent on October 2, 1890. Dennis Daly lives on the land in 1985.

The "Douglas Budget" of December 18, 1895 printed the wedding plans of John H. Robins and Ella Mills. "Cards are out announcing the marriage, Christmas Day at the ranch of Fred George of LaBonte, of Mr. John Robins and Miss Ella Mills. The groom is one of our leading business men whose friends are legion and the bride is a handsome and accomplished school teacher."

Ella came west from Wisconsin to be with her relative, Mrs. Fred George.

After selling his ranching interest to John C. Gamel on December 31, 1895, he went into the livery barn business in Douglas.

An article in the June 15, 1898 edition of the "Douglas Budget" relates of Robins' sale of his interest in the livery stable. "Mr. Frank Tinkham, late of Harrison, has purchased John Robins' interest in the Elkhorn stables and the firm name will hereafter be Hazen and Tinkham."

The Robins family moved to Nebraska in the spring of 1899 and located about 15 miles north of Rushville. Later they moved to Rushville.

John died in Rushville in August 1934. Ella married Tom Sutherland and moved to Hoquiam, Washington. She passed away on January 3, 1944 and is buried in Rushville.

Their children were: Hilbert (b. September 12, 1896, Douglas); Ethel (b. 1897, d. 1897); Lila (b. 1899); Mae (b. 1907); Lorraine (b. 1908); and Avalina (b. 1910).

Robinson, Thomas and Nettie Family

Thomas P. Robinson, son of William and Johanna Robinson, was born December 23, 1881, in Rockford, Illinois. At age sixteen he moved with his parents, two brothers, and two sisters to Belgrade, Nebraska. He helped his father farm here for several years.

On February 28, 1906, Tom married Nettie McCormick, daughter of Frank and Mary McCormick of Belgrade, Nebraska. She was the oldest of eleven children. There is still one brother and two sisters alive, the oldest being Francis McCormick in a nursing home in Fullerton, Nebraska. He was one hundred years old July 14, 1984.

After they were married, Tom and Nettie bought a farm at Greeley, Nebraska. They had three children — Helen, born February 19, 1907, Tom Jr. born March 19, 1913, and Merle, March 1916.

In April of 1916 Tom Sr. and his father Bill left Nebraska in a covered wagon with seven head of horses to go west. A saloon was for sale in Fort Morgan, Colorado, and Tom was going there to try to buy it. In a month they reached Cheyenne, Wyoming. Nettie and the three children came by train and met them there. At this time father Bill Robinson returned to Nebraska by train. Tom, Nettie, and the three kids (Merle being six weeks old) continued on in the covered wagon. Upon reaching Fort Morgan they found the saloon they had hoped to buy was already sold. Being a happy-go-lucky man, this did not discourage Tom. He had a farm in Nebraska paid for and $3,000.00 in his pocket. So they just decided to travel around for awhile, stopping wherever there was a creek with a fish that might bite. Tom and Nettie both loved to fish. They circled around by Denver, then up through Baggs, Wyoming, and in August ended up out of Glenrock at the Tom Martin ranch on Deer Creek. Getting tired of traveling and a little weary, they decided to stop here for awhile.

It was haying time at the Martins and they needed help. So Tom went to work for Martin helping put up the hay. For his pay he was given a white saddle horse named Bob. This horse was to become very useful to the Robinsons in the next few years.

Fall was fast approaching. Tom and Nettie decided it might be well for them to take a homestead. In order to prove up on a homestead at that time you had to break up 40 acres. The first of September Tom left his family at the Martins, and he started out to look for a suitable place to file on a homestead. He chose a place 15 miles north of Douglas, this was to be his home for the next 48 years.

Lumber was hauled with team and wagon from Douglas; and Tom and another homesteader close by, Clyde Hammond, started putting up a three room house. They barely got it finished and moved in before the winter storms came. Fuel had to be hauled from the timber which was 16 miles away.

Since there was no school anywhere close Helen did not get to school that first winter. The next fall, in 1917, Tom leased the Jamieson place about three and one half miles north of Douglas and the family moved there during the school year so Helen could get to school. She rode the white horse, Bob, back and forth to school every day. The Robinsons lived on the Jamieson place for two years.

Soon more homesteaders with children came. A small school house was built on the Robinson land about one half mile from their house. Here Helen and Tom Jr. both attended school. Later the Robinsons built a small house in the Brownfield Addition at Douglas and the family lived there during the school term. Tom went to work for a well driller and after a short time was able to buy his own rig and go into that business for himself. He drilled many, many wells for people in those early days.

Tragedy struck the Robinson family in 1922. Tom was away from home drilling a well. Nettie, being in a hurry to get lunch for the children, used kerosene to start a fire in the cook stove. There was an explosion and fire, but Nettie was able to wrap herself in a blanket and put the fire out. Helen, the oldest, was not at home at the time and Nettie walked one half mile to the nearest neighbor who took her to the hospital. But she was severely burned and lived only two days. Her body was shipped back to her home in Nebraska for burial.

In December the next year, Tom took his three children to Nebraska to spend Christmas with the relatives. While there the youngest boy, Merle, now seven years old, caught a cold that developed into pneumonia and he died. He was buried beside his mother at Cedar Rapids, Nebraska.

Tom, Helen, and Tom Jr. returned to the Wyoming homestead and Tom continued his well drilling but also got some livestock and started into the ranching business. During the early 30's there were many problems and hard times for the Robinsons. It was during this time the government paid the ranchers to kill livestock because of a grass shortage. Tom watched the slaughter of about 100 head of sheep and then stopped the officials. That winter the Robinsons wintered around 2800 head of sheep. Tom Jr. said that was when he learned you could winter sheep on sagebrush and very little corn.

"T. P." Robinson, as Tom Sr. was often called, lived his life to the fullest. He was extremely ambitious and seemed to thrive on hard work. But this did not keep him from taking time out once in awhile for a little fishing or a good game of poker. He was indeed a gambler at heart.

While many of the homesteaders proved up on their land and then decided to go back where they came from, Tom stuck it out. He gradually bought a homestead here or there that joined him — always having to borrow the money. The word retirement was not in his vocabulary and he continued working on his ranch right up to the time of his death on Christmas Eve, 1964, at age eighty-three.

Helen Robinson graduated from Converse County

High School and taught school before marrying Tom Eberspecher in February 1926. They had seven children, all living at this time—Tom, Jean, Helen Lee, Bill, Kate, Merelene, and Mike. Tom Eberspecher passed away April 7, 1976, and Helen on August 2, 1982. These seven grandchildren of Tom Robinson Sr. own the land and continue to manage that part of the ranch where the original homestead house still stands.

Tom Robinson Jr. married Ella Edwards in 1934. She was the daughter of Con and Blanch Edwards, who homesteaded four miles south of the Robinsons in 1923. Tom and Ella still own the land that was the Edwards' homestead along with other lands in the Robinson ranch. They presently live on the August Swanson place that Tom Sr. purchased in August 1947. They have one daughter, Dorothy Robinson Butler, who resides in Kentucky. By virtue of continued involvement of Tom Robinson Jr., the Robinson Ranch is the oldest established homestead in the Walker Creek area still occupied by the original non-native homesteader.

Rogers, Clyde and Viola Family

Clyde J. Rogers and Viola G. Swank Rogers and two children, Dennis K. and Evelyn F., moved from Barnard, Kansas to Converse County in 1926 to a homestead site located north of Douglas in N½ Section 14, Township 36 North, Range 71 West that had been staked the previous year. The homestead was proven up on November 19, 1928. The mode of transportation was a Dort car that my father had built from spare parts. The cab was made of wood and canvas. The homestead house was a one room building approximately 12' by 16'. The bed Evelyn and I (Dennis) slept in was built so it slid under the folks bed when not in use. In front of the house was a cellar dug into the ground. We used this frequently during severe electrical storms. The nearest neighbors were the Glen Bakers, about three miles away.

I attended school along with four others in a small building at Box Creek School near the Baker homestead. Most of the time I rode a horse to and from school.

In December 1928, Kenneth was born on the homestead. I walked to the Baker place for help in deep snow that covered the fences while my father (Clyde) went for the doctor in Verse, Wyoming to come out.

The homestead was sold to the Fiddleback Ranch in the spring of 1929. We moved to Douglas and my father got the bid for the Orin Junction bus route for high school kids. In October 1929, we moved to Orin into the caretaker building for the hotel at Orin. In May 1930, we moved to the place on the North Platte River that was called the Howe place. It was owned by Willard A. Saul of Douglas. My father purchased this place in 1931 and was in the bee business for a few years.

In the summer months, he tried his luck at prospecting for gold in the Black Hills and the Big Horns. The largest gold nugget he found, the size of the end of my little finger, is still in the Rogers family to this date.

In 1953, after serving ten years in the armed forces, my wife, Phebe (Norton), and I and our two daughters, Carolyn and Georgia, moved to the ranch.

My father and I started clearing sagebrush from the land with a machine devised and built by my father, installed an irrigation system, and built the place up to what is known as the Rogers Ranch at Orin.

In 1971, Phebe and I bought the Ford-Lincoln-Mercury franchise from Raymond and Alice Messick, now known as Rogers Ford.

I served on the Board of County Commissioners from 1966 to 1970, served on the Douglas Housing Authority and Irwin Towers Board from 1969 to present, served on the Converse County Airport Board from 1979 to present, on the board to keep the Law Enforcement Academy in Douglas and helped secure the land for the academy, served on the planning boards for the new library and the Converse County Courthouse, was one of the original members on the board to bring the National High School Rodeo Finals to Douglas and served on the host committee from 1978 to present.

Viola died on Dec. 19, 1978, Clyde died on May 8, 1980.

My wife, Phebe, is a Past President of the American Legion Auxiliary and Converse County Cow-Belles. In 1968, she became the Wyoming State Fair Parade Marshal until a few years ago. From 1968 until present, she has been in charge of the grandstands for the Wyoming State Fair. Phebe was the Secretary of the Bicentennial Committee. In 1981 and 1982, she was in charge of the grandstands for the National High School Rodeo Finals.

In 1973, after four years in the air force, our older daughter and her husband (Carolyn and Greg Stinson), moved back onto the ranch. Since that time, more improvements have been made and the Rogers Ranch has expanded more. Carolyn taught school at Shawnee from 1974 to 1976 and is presently teaching 6th grade at the Douglas Middle School.

Our younger daughter and her husband (Georgia and Gary Rightmire), and their son Ernest Rightmire, moved to Orin in 1976. Gary is presently working for Rogers Ford.

Rothleutner, Albert and Karolina

The Rothleutner heritage started with Albert Rothleutner coming from Austria in 1882 to escape the religious persecutions in Germany. He first settled in Ewing, Nebraska before coming to Douglas. He owned and operated the flour milling factory.

In 1884 he took Karolina Thramer for his wife in the small mission chapel in Ewing, Nebraska. As most young couples, the family started right off with the birth of their first daughter, Lena born in 1885. In 1887, another daughter was born, Maria. The third addition brought their first son, Joseph in 1889. Hatti was the fourth child born in 1891 and Jennie in 1893. Anna came in 1895, Frank in 1896, and Rose was the last of the 19th century, being born in 1899. The 20th century brought a girl, Lany in 1902, a boy, Albert in 1905, another girl, Agnes in 1908, and the last boy, Max in 1911. This completed the prolific family of 12 children.

Frank, after graduating from the sixth grade, took various jobs to help in the supporting of their growing family. Frank, being a very strong and masculine man for his 17 years of age, carried paddies of cement on his shoulders up the ladders to the brick layers who were finalizing the construction of the tall steeple of St. Peters Cathedral in Ewing. This hard and strenuous labor was later to prove beneficial in the need for strong men to break horses in the new pioneering Douglas.

The oldest daughter Lena, was the first to break away from the family nest. She along with her husband, Charles Dailey moved to Douglas. Charles got work at the Land Office in 1915. Charles wrote telling the rest of the family about the free land in Converse County to be had by homesteading it for only a filing fee.

Joseph at age 27 and Frank at age 17 took a great interest in adventuring to the new territory. In 1916, they both took on the challenge of the two week trip to Douglas by team and wagon. The following spring they filed for homestead claims 65 miles north of Douglas, at the base of Cow Creek Buttes. Life in 1917, at Douglas was a young, rough, western, cow-punching town where the people had to be determined and tough to match its perils. Life on the new homestead would prove to be even tougher. Joe and Frank found that the first winter batching together to be the test of a lifetime.

They dug a cave in the sheltered side of the mountain to escape the vicious demands of nature's bitter cold. A tarp cut the wind out of the entrance to the cave. Many days the men spent cutting the large pine trees in preparation for the dream of building a home in the spring. This dream became a reality in 1917 when the house was finished. In the spring of the next year, the first project was to figure a way to supply and hold water for the dry summer months to follow. The men chiseled a large hole in the limestone rock and lined it with cement and rock. The cistern being about 12 foot by 12 foot. They took roofing tin and made a cover to keep the collected rain water clean and the varmints out.

In 1918 Albert Sr. traveled to Douglas with three of his daughters to file for homestead claims of their own. Albert purchased the old Braffel farm west of Douglas on the Cold Springs Road (Max and his wife, Helen, live on the farm today). This was to be a home base for his wife and younger children. Their livelihood came from operating a dairy farm. Two of his daughters, Hatti and Maria, filed claims on the land bordering their brothers, Frank and Joe, out along the Cheyenne River, Meadow Creek and Hog Back, staying close together. The family helped each other in supporting their needs to survive and develop the untilled land.

Hatti married Bert Tony, a ranch hand. Maria married Ray Dailey, Charles Dailey's younger brother.

In the fall of 1919 Albert returned to Ewing to bring his wife and the rest of the children to Douglas, for their first Thanksgiving in the untamed Wyoming territory. The German speaking family depended on the Jesuit Mission Fathers to help them in their spiritual needs in this new pioneering town.

The mode of travel for Frank and Joe in the early 1920's was made by train and horses the 65 miles to Douglas. The semi-annual trips took them over gumbo dirt trails, zig-zagging along section lines for the two day expedition. The two men looked forward to their escapades to town to pick up supplies and enjoy a few days of entertainment. The cowboys in town especially looked forward to seeing Frank. He was known as one of the top notch wild horse breakers. Before rodeos became commercialized, the main attraction was between cowboy and horse. Down at the local rodeo many a bet was placed on Frank against the wild horse.

In the middle 1920's Frank carried the mail on horse back from the post office at Bill to the fifty odd homesteaders living in the Dull Center area.

Each fall at shipping time in the early 1920's, after Frank had increased his cattle herd to about 200 cows and 1000 head of sheep, he trailed the cattle on horse back and the sheep on foot the 65 miles to Douglas. Frank carried all his food for himself and two dogs in a canvas wrap on his back.

In 1928, Frank at the age of 31, decided it was time to pursue a lonely man's dream to take a wife. Searching through the Lonely Hearts Club, he wrote to Chillicothe, Ohio and received the sweet smelling perfumed letters from Elizabeth Clara Whithrow. In the fall of that year while Frank was shipping the stock to Sioux City, Iowa he took a side trip to Ohio to check out this lady who wrote the most enticing letters he ever read. Clara really caught Frank's eye. Her stepmother, having younger children of her own, was anxious to get the older girls out of the crowded family nest. Frank went home till January and couldn't get the young woman out of his mind. So after more letters, which later he found out the stepmother had written because Clara being only 16 at the time wasn't experienced enough to ensure a catch, he married Clara on January 18, 1929 at St. Mary's Cathedral in Chillicothe, Ohio.

The train brought the young couple to Douglas to meet Frank's parents and family. After a night's rest they began the two day trip by freight wagon and team to the desolate north country. Frank's bride, even though she came from a poor family, was not prepared for the uncivilized barren land in north Converse County. Not even a bathroom; it took some getting used to! No running water either! Frank's bride was young and had stamina to work hard and was willing to learn with Frank's help.

On December 31 of that same year the first son, James Leo, was born. Since this new little fellow called for Mom's attention at home, Frank was left to tending the herd himself. The dresser drawer with a feather pillow made a perfect bed for the little guy. He was snug as a bug that winter.

The next year Mary Jo came along and took over his dresser drawer. That summer of 1933 was a dry year and there were many varmints hanging around for water and food. Leo being about two years of age was playing outside when an eagle swooped down to attack him. Luckily Mother was hanging out the wash and rescued him. This called for the putting up of chicken wire over the chicken pen to protect their meat, eggs and children out at play.

The third year William arrived. This called for some drastic changes to be made in the little shack. The 20 x 24 shack got smaller and smaller along with the hardships of washing laundry and diapers by hand. It was an unending job heating water on the wood burning stove. Frank, with the help of his sisters and brothers, moved about six miles down the hill and built a one room log cabin.

In the next three years two more boys, Robert and Frank came along so this meant adding on a second hand chicken house to furnish bedrooms. The new bedroom addition had the luxury of having the wall paper redesigned every 3 or 4 months with the old Denver Post. This was collected from an old neighbor friend in town. The walls were then clean and the children would read the cartoon funnies at nap time.

This was the year that Clara got her first appliance. It was a hand operated wringer washer.

In Dec. 1936, Clara had ordered their usual Christmas clothes out of the Sears, Roebuck catalog. They had forgotten to order the hard sugar candies the family liked so much and dried fruit, so Frank took their 1929 Model T and went to town on one of his buying trips. In the meanwhile Clara with some of the older children took it upon themselves to get the tree for Christmas. Clara, being eight months pregnant with Dave, found a low bushy tree with many smaller stalks. Clara and the kids were no match for the hardy sticky pine with their small hatchet. They wacked and wacked the tree until it looked like the porcupines were at it and couldn't make up their minds where they wanted to chew. I don't think Clara struck twice in the same place on her determined swings to down the tree. After hours of exhausting work and sun-down, the disappointed family went home with a few small branches. On Christmas Eve when Frank arrived home the few branches were an awful excuse for a tree so off to the mountains Frank went, he got the biggest tree they ever had.

After a line of four boys, Carolyn, a beautiful blonde haired little girl, was born. She was the apply of Daddy's eye. In 1939 Mother Nature sent twins. A girl Joanne and a boy John were welcomed into the family. As the family grew in size and age, Leo was given a .22 gun for his birthday to help provide food for the table. The summer of the 40's brought warm days and playful young boys to proudly demonstrate their accuracy in the handling of the gun. Leo had all the younger children line up with apples on their heads for the demonstration. Needless to say the watchful eye of Mother was never too far. She gave a lasting and hard learned lesson, in responsibility to the young man. In Mother's fright and panic the gun was thrown into the bottom of the 10 foot deep cistern full of water never to be retrieved even to this day. The gun still lays rusted in its place, as only a memory of yesteryear.

In 1941, a sickly and scrawny little girl was born, Theresa. This brought the family to 10. The next year a namesake, Hatti, came along named after Dad's sister, who died earlier that year and had no children of her own. The last boy, a bouncy Fred, made 1944 a good year and 1946 the last of the Mohicans, Barbara, finished the family for a total of a lucky 13 children.

As more people moved there were many a barn dance and party held in the loft of the big two-story barn, that went up with the help of all the neighbors. That old barn with its loft of hard wood floors became a great dance hall. There are few words to describe the fun, laughter, joking and even a little tipping of the jug, to raise their spirits even higher, that were had at the dance. Home made tater whiskey did its job well.

Jumping out the loft door with a sheet for a parachute was a challenge for the kids, and all the rides that old milk cow had to put up with, and bless the little calves who taught us kids how to hang on for a good ride.

Albert Sr. died on May 22, 1951, Karolina on January 18, 1940.

As the years went by it was difficult to make a living on one section of land so Frank began buying out his sisters and brothers one at a time, then the Ike Dull homestead and Esau homestead. Many loans later they ended up with 7,004 acres of deeded land and 7,000 acres of federal land.

April 29, 1972 put a close to the life of Frank and on August 15, 1972, Clara died, bringing an end to all their hard endured labors of life.

In 1972, after 45 years of hard toil and sweat of his brow, it seems ironic that the same government which gave him the opportunity to start the ranch in 1917 forced the children of Frank and Clara to sell it because of high inheritance taxes.

Rupe, Thomas and Alice Family

Since there are none of the elder members of the Rupe family now living in Wyoming, establishing correct dates has been a problem. The information about the early '20s and '30s was furnished by Jesse C. Rupe of El Paso, Texas.

John Tusing Rupe (my great grandfather) lived in Bethany, Missouri. I, I. B. Rupe, can recall seeing him only one time. My father and mother (Tandy and Lucille Rupe) took my two brothers and me to Bethany for a visit. I seem to remember him as being quite gruff and had a full beard almost to his waist.

My grandfather (Thomas N. Rupe) owned a jewelry store in Franklin, Nebraska. My uncle (Everett L. Rupe) was living in Franklin when he and a friend (Lem Mulhern) decided to come to Wyoming. This was in the early 1920s. Mulhern filed on a homestead on Lake Creek, north of Tin Can Lake, approximately 60 miles northeast of Douglas. Everett worked some for Mulhern on his homestead and along about this time Everett got his younger brother Otho (Toots) interested in coming to Wyoming. The year that Toots came to Wyoming is not certain. Between the two boys they talked their older brother Don into coming to Wyoming and filing on a homestead. I believe this was in the Verse community.

Things were not going very good for my grandfather in the jewelry store so the boys talked their parents into moving to the homestead on Lake Creek. The youngest son, Jesse, tells about his first visit to Wyoming. This was in 1926 while he was going to college. He rode a train to Douglas and then caught a ride with the mail carrier to Bill, Wyoming which at that time was about 15 miles northeast of present day Bill almost on the Cheyenne River. His parents then met him at Bill and took him home to Lake Creek in a team and wagon.

About this time my dad and mother and two brothers and I made our first trip to Wyoming. I remember our car was a '26 or '27 Pontiac. The roads north out of Douglas were all dirt. On the way to the homestead we got bogged down in a big mud hole right at the entrance of the lane leading to the D. W. Ballard ranch. The weather was warm and the car windows were down and the minute the car came to a halt the mosquitos swarmed in. My mother was bitten so badly that she spent the entire vacation in bed. If I remember correctly, it was the late Emmet Ballard who pulled us out of the mud hole the next morning with a team of horses. While Emmet was working at getting us out of the mud his younger brother Otis was balancing himself on the top wire of the fence and his feet hooked on the next lower wire. All of a sudden he lost his balance and flipped over face down in the mud. This was the time that my brothers and myself became acquainted with Otis, who was my age, and with this acquaintance developed into a lifelong friendship. He is now Park County Coroner and owns the Ballard Funeral Home in Cody, Wyoming.

Shortly after this period my grandfather and grandmother moved to a location about three miles east of Bill and erected a log house, which to this day is still standing and is owned by Bill Steinle.

Late in January 1929 my grandfather was alone at the house. My grandmother was in Denver visiting Don who was working there. Everett was in Racine, Wisconsin visiting Tandy and family and trying to find work. Toots was working out some place or other. The water well was a hand dug well about one half mile from the house. My grandfather was on the way to the well after water when he met the mail carrier who carried the mail from Bill to Dull Center. The mail came on Tuesdays and Fridays and the carrier was then on the way to Bill. An hour or so later he was on the way back to Dull Center with the mail from Douglas and it was then he found my grandfather who had suffered a stroke and was down on the road. The mail carrier carried my grandfather into the house and put him to bed. Then he started looking for Toots and found him at the Ross Owen place. Any other day of the week my grandfather would have frozen to death. Shortly after this Jesse made a deal for a 40 acre place near Bloomfield, Iowa and my grandparents moved there.

My father (Tandy) was a printer by trade; and early in 1932 the depression was in full bloom, and he lost his job and there were no jobs in his trade available. Then, in March 1932, the Tandy Rupe family moved to Wyoming. I remember coming through Douglas at night and going on to my grandfather's place where Everett and Toots were then living. The next time I saw a town (Douglas) was two years later and I rode a saddle horse up Center Street as we had just finished trailing a bunch of cattle to the railroad stockyards from Bill.

The log house that my grandfather built was a one room building. The cook stove was in one end, a pot bellied heater in the middle and Dad and Mother's bedroom was in the other end of the house separated from the rest of the house by blankets strung on a wire stretched across the room. I can still see my mother standing over the cook stove in the middle of July canning a 350 pound hog that my dad and uncles decided had to be butchered then.

We used to have some real good times in this old house. The neighbors from miles around would gather there quite often. Everyone would bring different foods and there was always an ice cream maker for homemade ice cream. During the daylight hours games were played outside and then when evening came the rugs were rolled up, the furniture moved out of the way, corn meal was spread on the floor and the dancing started. One of the neighbors, Gay Ford, played the guitar, my uncle, Toots, played the jew's-harp and the harmonica and my brother Tom played the banjo.

My dad and mother were divorced about this time (1934), and he moved to Iowa. Everett and Toots also gave up trying to make a living out of the dry land farming and also moved to Iowa in 1934. Toots died there in 1935. Don and his family moved to Idaho where he is now living. Times were pretty tough at this time and my mother worked as a cook for different outfits in the area. My brother Tom joined the CCCs, and Jacque and I were farmed out to various families who very generously shared whatever they had with us. This was real western hospitality.

My brother Jacque and I were lucky enough to be able to attend the Dry Creek School which was located where the present day Bill now is.

My mother married James A. Bowers of the Dry Creek community in June 1935 and with their help Jacque and I were able to attend high school in Douglas and graduate. Mother died in 1975.

In 1940 Jacque joined the National Guard in Douglas. This unit was called to federal service in February 1941 and then was sent to Ft. Lewis, Washington for training. Jacque died at Ft. Lewis on May 30, 1942.

Tom married Helen Pickinpaugh of Shawnee, Wyoming and they had two boys, Larry of Kansas and Maurice Jacque of Douglas. Tom and Helen were divorced and he later remarried. He now lives in Douglas with his wife DeLores.

I married Yvonne "Boots" Septer of Douglas, we had two boys, James Dean of Douglas and Oren Thomas, who lives with is wife, Sherlyn, and family, in Casper. I and Boots also had a daughter Judith Ann who died July 20, 1949 at the age of four. I retired from the U.S. Postal Service in 1982, and Boots and I make our home in Douglas.

Russell, Edwin E. and Velva

Reno Russell, father of Edwin, was born in Illinois, receiving his elementary schooling there. Though he never attended a school of veterinary medicine, Reno learned to practice, having a natural talent for treating sick animals. He was raised in a farming community, so there was a demand for his service. Eventually he made his living practicing veterinary medicine.

The Russell family migrated to Manville, Wyoming in 1910, making part of the trip in a covered wagon. Reno rented a house three miles west of Manville and engaged in the practice of veterinary medicine. Five years later Reno took a homestead claim near the Chalk Buttes in Niobrara County. In 1918 Reno sold his homestead and moved his family into Lost Springs where they lived for a year before moving on.

Edwin Earle Russell was born on March 28, 1902 in Chicago, Illinois. He received his common schooling in Manville, later taking correspondence courses to complete his education. When he was old enough he found employment at various ranches, among them being the Moore Ogalalla Sheep and Cattle Company, the Josey Harris outfit north of Lusk, the Frank Brooks ranch south of Jireh and at the old "77" ranch under Tom Fackler, foreman.

At the age of 16 Ed came to Douglas to work as an apprentice to Jack Kirwin who was well known throughout the area for his leather work and who operated a shop on Center Street in the rear of the William Gerlach building. Ed's starting wage was $3.00 per week plus his room and board, the room being the leather workshop where he made his bed on a leather cutting bench.

In 1919 Jack Kirwin had in his employ a Frenchman named Art Brozett who was skilled in leatherwork. Brozett had previously been a circus performer. Before the opening of the Wyoming State Fair that year, Brozett had fashioned a set of miniature harness for a team of pigs. He kept the pigs in a small pen behind the harness shop. Before the fair opened and within two week's time, Brozett had broken the pigs to drive and to pull a small wagon. People came from miles around to see this unique team and to pose for pictures with it. Art engaged the local photographer, Marsh, to take pictures of visitors to the state fair standing beside the team and wagon. These photographs sold for two for a quarter. Business was brisk! Brozett drove the team in front of the grandstand for the entertainment of the audience.

There was a carnival on the fairgrounds. One woman who was working there became interested in the team and wagon. She approached Brozett with a business proposition. In return for the team of pigs, harness and wagon she would agree to give Brozett $200 in cash plus the deeds to some lots which she owned in the city of Thermopolis on the condition that Brozett would go with her to that city after the fair was over and remain there for two weeks. During this time he would teach her to drive the team. Art agreed to the proposition and departed with the pigs and the lady. Two weeks later he returned to Douglas wiser and poorer. He brought no money and no deeds. He did have a suit of clothes and a case of beer.

Ed was apprenticed to Kirwin for three years during which time he began to make articles on request. He fashioned bridles and soon was filing orders for belts, bill-folds, briefcases, purses and other custom made articles, each of which bore individualized designs, beautifully shaded. Ed's raised leather stamping is well known throughout the United States and in some foreign countries.

When Ed made a trip to Illinois to visit his mother in 1925 he met Velva Bryant, daughter of Sylvester and Alma Miller Bryant. Velva was born on November 20, 1905 in Clarion, Iowa, the eldest in a family of four children; Velva, Harry, Ernest and Leslie. Velva's father was a native of Illinois, her mother a native of Iowa. They were married in 1900 in Clarion, Iowa, moving to Wisconsin to farm when Velva was three years old. Later the family moved to Iowa where Sylvester was engaged in the cement business. When Velva was in the eighth grade the family moved to Illinois where Sylvester once more operated a farm and where Velva completed her high school education. After her graduation she was employed in the telephone office in Rockford, Illinois.

In honor of her son's visit, Mrs. Russell gave a party to which she invited numerous guests, among them being Velva and her mother. Ed jokingly says that he and Velva met for the first time in the bathroom of his mother's home. The house was rectangular, with two doors in each room connecting it with its adjacent neighbor on either side. Thus when Ed, on his way to the kitchen, entered one bedroom from the living room then into the bathroom, he met Velva who had come from the kitchen into the back bedroom and on into the bathroom.

For about two years after their first meeting, Ed and Velva corresponded and then they were married in Chadron, Nebraska in January of 1927, after which they returned to Douglas to make their home.

Two children were born to this union, Earle Ray and Alvada Imo. Earle married Nona Dixon. They are the parents of two children, Scottie and Echo. Imo married David Harned and to them were born two children, Esterbrook and David.

Shortly after his marriage Ed took a homestead on Twenty Mile Creek northeast of Douglas. The claim, located at the head of Cedar Draw, was homesteaded for Fred and Harry Manning. For a time Ed ran some cattle with the Manning outfit. After three years, in which he did not satisfy the proving up conditions, he relinquished the claim and then re-homesteaded the same land. This time he completed the requirements. His dwelling was partly dug out of a bank having a sod roof and front in which he placed one window and one door. He sold the claim to Harry and Fred Manning for $100 some time later.

Jack Kirwin retired in 1932. At this time Eddy established his own business; and in June of 1933 he moved to a location on North Third Street. The building which he occupied had been the original Converse County Jail, built in 1888. It housed prisoners until 1919 when improved penal facilities were constructed near the Converse County Courthouse on Fifth and Center Streets.

The building was 24 x 44 feet, having a chrome steel cage which was divided into two cells with eight bunks and a corridor. The jail room was separated from the sheriff's office and the kitchen, which were located in the front part of the building, by double iron doors. The jail room was lined with native two x six inch planks, resulting in a six inch wall, ceiling and floor and having eight inches of bricks on the outside. The rear windows were equipped with steel bars, brought through the walls and bent over on the inside. It was considered practically impossible for a prisoner to escape from the jail.

On one occasion, however, there was a near escape. It concerned a prisoner from Buffalo, Wyoming, a burly man who reportedly spent several nights loosening a couple of floor planks, intending to tunnel then to freedom. Ben Campbell, an old trapper, lived in the building south of the jail. He had a pet bear which he kept chained in the alley behind his place. When the prisoner finally completed his tunneling and broke through the last of the soil the first thing he saw was the bear which, according to the story, sent the criminal scurrying back through his tunnel to the safety of his cell.

In addition to such notable prisoners as George W. Pike, Tom Horn and Ed Ellis, the jail served as a place of safety for Ben Jones and William Walker, the two witnesses of the murders of Nate Champion and Nick Ray during the Johnson County War of 1892.

At one time the jailer, Tom Cook, required the prisoners to carry water in buckets from the Platte River to water the cottonwood tree which was growing in front of the jail. This served two purposes, the tree thrived from regular watering and the prisoners got their exercise.

Ed retired from his business in 1978. He and Velva live in their home on Fifth Street. He still enjoys his hobbies, having extensive collections of antiques such as mule and ox shoes, sleigh bells, ranch dinnerbells, kerosene lamps and an excellent collection of spurs. One pair of spurs, inlaid with silver and made by Kelly Brothers and Parker of El Paso, Texas, belonged to Buck Lucas who held the title of World Champion Cowboy for three years. Buck purchased the spurs from the firm for the sum of $65.00. Occupying a place of prominence in his home is the last saddle which he made. Ed was a master craftsman and justly proud of his work.

Ed is a member and past president of the Lions Club. He is a Mason and a member of the Shrine at Rawlins, Wyoming, as well as a member of the Eastern Star. He was master of the Masonic Blue Lodge in 1940, 1944, and again in 1966. He served as patron of the Eastern Star. Mrs. Russell is a member of the Eastern Star, serving as matron in 1949.

Active and interested in community affairs, Ed was one of the Pony Express Centennial riders in June of 1960. His photograph appeared in the Douglas paper, "The Enterprise," taken as he passed the Dave Johnston Power Plant, riding at full gallop to complete his portion of the ride. Eddy was 58 years old at the time this photograph was taken.

Rutherford Family

Archibald Aymer Oliver Rutherford (born in 1868 in England) came to America in 1892 to be with his brothers, William and M. B. O. They also had a sister, Meta O., who married Giles Strangways in 1899 in Douglas.

The Rutherford Brothers lived southwest of Douglas on Reid Creek or Rutherford Creek, as it is sometimes known, in the 1890s. Charles Reid Sr. sold them the place in 1892 but according to the state water right records Rutherford was granted a water right in 1885.

It is known that Archibald died on February 22, 1899 in Douglas. According to Mrs. Charles Reid Jr., Rutherford made a winter ride to town (30 miles) and took his evening meal at the Reid house. Feeling ill, he asked the Reids' 17 year old son, Charlie, to take his saddle horse to the livery barn while Rutherford went to the Berry rooming house for the night. It was learned the following morning that the young rancher had died of pneumonia during the night.

The courthouse records show that the Rutherfurds sold their land on Reid Creek to LaBonte Livestock Company (Saul) in 1909 for $18,500. They were involved in lands on the Morton Flats later and moved to Utah after leaving Wyoming.

Sadler, Rollie and Gladys

Rollie Edwin Sadler was born at Litchfield, Nebraska, Sept. 10, 1891. He was educated in a sod school that he, himself, helped to built at the age of eight years. Rollie lived all his early years at Litchfield.

In 1915, Rollie went to Huntley, Montana to visit a friend. He got a job there as a ranch hand and was made foreman of the cattle ranch about a year later.

Rollie registered for the draft in 1917 during World War I. At about the same time he and his father and two of his friends filed on homesteads in northeastern Converse County.

Rollie was called into the army at this time but later was discharged on account of poor eyesight. Rollie was not discouraged by this and he very much desired to serve his country, so he memorized the eye chart and passed the physical to join the Merchant Marines. Rollie served his country well from 1917 to 1918 during World War I as a trainer of new sailors on the U.S.S. Brookdale. It was a coal-fired cargo carrier as well as a training ship for sailors. Rollie had a lot of experiences on this ship. He said "During one four day blow when the wind blew up to 85 miles an hour, the new recruits got so sea sick they didn't even have enough steam left to boil coffee".

When the war was over Rollie was honorably discharged but he decided to rejoin when called back. He made several trips to Hawaii and around the Horn and back to New York City. Rollie was awarded a commendation for bravery for his heroic efforts in assisting with the salvage of the U.S.S. Elkhorn, a ship damaged during a violent storm when coming from Hawaii to Seattle. Rollie was really proud of this award.

Rollie then left the Merchant Marines and returned to the Converse County homestead. His first home on the homestead was a tent so the first thing he did was set about building a house.

They had to make $800 worth of improvements on the place and live there three years to prove up on a homestead. Rollie turned in as improvements a dike, fence and other things for livestock raising purposes (under the Livestock Grazing Act). To fill out his $800 worth of improvements, Rollie also turned in $50 worth of dead prairie dogs as an improvement. This caused quite a laugh and some raised eyebrows at the land office as they questioned this as an improvement.

"Well, said Rollie, if you ever tried to make a farm on top of a prairie dog town, you'd understand why $50 worth of dead prairie dogs is an improvement".

The land office allowed that if this was the case they would surely have to put it down as an improvement all right, so they did allow it.

After they had some homes built on the homestead they rigged up a Ford truck with a chain drive and returned to Nebraska. Then Rollie together with his father, Lewis E. Sadler, mother Izora B. Sadler and sister, Ferne E. Sadler loaded up what camp and household equipment they could and started back to Wyoming. The roads were all dirt roads and trails then and they were about 10 days making the trip.

About the only way to travel on the homestead in those days was to walk or ride a horse if you were lucky enough to have a horse. Even if you had a car or truck, there was no gas supply. For this reason, they always kept a five gallon can of gas buried in the ground so they'd be able to make a trip to town in case of emergencies.

The Sadlers spent most of their time on the homestead making improvements and raising potatoes, beans and other garden vegetables so as to be able to live. There were no jobs to be had at that time. Finally they were able to get a cow or two and a few hogs and chickens and that helped out.

When working horses in the early days, runaways were not uncommon. One time when Rollie was cutting logs in the buttes, the horses became frightened and ran away. Rollie was pinned between the wagon and the truck and the skin was all torn from the back of his hand. There was no time or money to go the 70 miles to Douglas to the doctor, so Rollie and his sister, Ferne sewed the skin back on with string from an old violin. It healed all right but there is still a scar there today.

Life was rugged on the homestead, but they still found time for fun. They visited one another and helped each other with work. They also had parties and dances. It was not unusual for the young folks to ride 20-25 miles on horseback to attend dances and parties.

Gladys and Rollie Sadler

In 1926 Rollie and Bill Good took an old well rig and went down around Lance Creek and over in the Buck Creek hills and drilled wells. Some people paid in money and some with cows and chickens but it all helped out.

In 1934 Rollie had to move the cattle and horses to Morrill County, Nebraska due to a drought. He trailed them back in 1935. Again in 1939, he moved the cattle to Gillette due to another severe drought. There were some very hard times then.

On August 29, 1935, in Douglas, Rollie married Gladys B. Alexander from Bayard, Nebraska. They spent the next 28 years on the ranch.

In 1963 they sold the ranch which they had built up to 6,400 acres of deeded land and 2,000 acres of leased land. They moved into Douglas where they still live.

Rollie's father and mother had moved into Douglas in 1939. His father, Lewis C. died in 1944 at the age of 82. His mother, Izora B. Sadler died in June 1967 at the age of 98.

Rollie and Gladys live in a nice home in Douglas where they have many relics and collections from the homestead days. Rollie is a great story teller and looks and acts much younger than his 94 years.

Salzman, Alfred and Jennie

Both William Salzman and Sophia Bay Salzman were born in Germany, later immigrating to the United States. William was a miner by trade and eventually made his way into Colorado, working in the mines, one of which was in Cripple Creek where they mined for gold. Alfred William Salzman was born to William and Sophia on May 29, 1887 in Pueblo, Colorado.

William did not earn a large salary working in the mines so at an early age Alfred was obliged to go to work. He began his years as a wage earner as a bus boy in a cafe. Later, he went into training to become a chef which was to be his lifetime profession.

Alfred, "Alf", Salzman met Jennie Daddaw in Denver, Colorado in 1914. They were married the following year.

Jennie Daddaw, born November 17, 1892, was the daughter of William Francis Daddaw and Ida May Hayes. William was a school teacher, Ida May his pupil. They were married on July 23, 1883. There were four children, in addition to Jennie, in the Daddaw family. In 1893 diphtheria claimed the lives of the father and three of the children, leaving the mother, one son, Edgar, and Jennie to survive.

The first Salzman home was in Guernsey, Wyoming in 1915 where they operated the Commercial Hotel. Jennie and Alf were a working team with Alf acting as the chef and running the kitchen and Jennie acting as waitress, desk clerk and supervising the cleaning of the hotel rooms.

Alf and Jennie were the parents of three children: Edwin, born April 11, 1916, Evelyn Dorothy, born August 22, 1917, and Shirley Irene, born February 4, 1926.

The Salzman family moved from Guernsey to Riverton to operate a cafe for a time. Then they decided to try homesteading and took a claim in the Rawhide Buttes area south of Lusk. To earn enough money to live on, Alfred went to Lusk to find work leaving Jennie and the children at the homestead alone.

On one occasion a heavy snow storm occurred. The roof of the little house caved in, dumping snow all over the bed where the family slept. After the storm was over, Jennie climbed up and re-roofed the hole to protect her family from the elements.

The homesteading days of the Salzman family were short-lived. They moved to Lusk where they engaged once more in the hotel and cafe business, acquiring the Niobrara Cafe and later the Northwestern Hotel and Cafe.

In 1921, when Edwin, the eldest child, was ready to start school, Alf and Jennie traded their homestead claim for a home in Lusk. Alfred gave up his hotel business after a time and went to work for the railroad in the capacity of cook. His job kept him away from his family for long periods of time due to the fact that he prepared the meals for a bridge crew working from Lusk eastward into Nebraska. Therefore when the proprietorship of the Silver Cliff Hotel in Lusk became available, Alf returned to the hotel business. After the birth of their third child, Shirley, Jennie was in poor health. So once again, the Salzmanns gave up their business. This time they moved into Douglas for about a year moving to Glendo in 1927 to manage a cafe. In 1928 Alf moved his family to Guernsey where he bought a home and worked at the Burlington Cafe. In 1929 they leased the LaFayette Cafe in Douglas and the family moved to that city renting out their home in Guernsey. A year later they returned to Guernsey to live. Alf was employed as a hostler's helper in the Burlington Railroad roundhouse.

Once more ill fortune befell the Salzman family. Alf was laid off his job and the family lost their home in Guernsey. They moved to a small acreage near Orin Junction where they could raise a few animals and chickens. Shortly Alf found work in Douglas and resulted in moving the family once more. They found a small place south of town where they could keep a pig, cows and chickens and Jennie could raise a garden. In 1932 they leased the Spencer place located about seven miles southeast of Douglas.

Though there was not much money, the family managed to live fairly well and enjoyed their neighbors, the Walter Irwin family. The Irwins owned a good wagon and team. Both families would pile in the wagon to go to Douglas for a day of shopping carrying along a picnic lunch which they shared at noon time.

Several miles from the Salzman home was the Carmin ranch. The Carmins kept rodeo stock and in addition had a few buffalo. On one occasion the buffalo got away from the ranch arriving at the Salzman's farm yard one evening just at milking time. The dairy cows, terrified at the intrusion of these strange beasts, ran off in every direction. A week had passed before the Salzmanns had managed to gather up the last of their cows and bring them home.

In the spring of 1933 a severe blizzard came burying sheep and lambs under the snowdrifts. Long hours were spent digging out the live animals and counting the dead ones. It was a loss the Salzman family could ill afford. In the fall of that year the Salzmanns gave up the lease on the Spencer place holding an auction to sell off their farm equipment and livestock. Then they moved into Douglas where Alf worked for the PWA for a time after which he bought the Douglas Coffee Shop. This venture was a family affair. Evelyn and Jennie waited tables, Alf cooked and Edwin washed dishes and helped his father.

Both Evelyn and Edwin graduated from high school in 1934 after which Edwin went to a CCC camp to work. Evelyn left home in 1936 after her marriage to Jack Kohlruss. Jennie once more suffered ill health. Without the help of his family, Alf had to hire persons to work. The business suffered so that in 1938 Alf sold the cafe and hired out to cook for other cafes in Douglas.

When Edwin returned home from the CCC camp, he and Alf joined the National Guard. When the guard was in training camp, Alf acted as cook for the Douglas unit.

Edwin was married to Bessie Shippen of Laramie in 1940 while he was attending college. Their first child, Ernest, was born in 1941 and was delivered by his grandmother, Jennie, before the doctor could arrive.

Alf was employed as cook for the Prisoner of War Camp which was constructed west of Douglas. After the camp closed, Alf returned to work as cook for the Douglas Coffee Shop.

Shirley married Joe Witt in 1947. They lived in Douglas for two years after their marriage moving to Casper where Joe was employed by the Standard Oil Refinery.

For several years prior to his 65th birthday, Alf was employed at the LaBonte Hotel. He continued to work part time after his retirement as janitor for the Converse County Bank and the Golden Rule Store. One big event he always enjoyed was the annual Congregational Church Thanksgiving dinner where he was chief cook.

The union of Alf and Jennie ended after 45 years when Jennie passed away on September 16, 1960. The eldest son, Edwin, died in 1963.

Alf lived at the family home in Douglas until he reached the age of 84, at which time he became unable to handle his part time jobs and he could no longer live alone. He moved to Casper in 1973 to live in the home of his daughter, Shirley. He died on January 3, 1974 after suffering a severe stroke.

The arrival of the rest of the grandchildren listed was always a big event for Alf and Jennie: Billy Gene Kohlruss, April 1, 1947; Linnea Carol Salzman, October 2, 1948; Karen Kay Witt, August 24, 1952; Connie Jo Witt, October 11, 1955; and Bobby Ray Kohlruss, February 8, 1957.

Following Alf's death, Shirley and Joe's daughter, Karen, passed away August 20, 1974 and then Evelyn's husband, Jack, April 16, 1975.

died. His father remarried and eight more children were born to this union.

When Bert was a young man he went to Audubon, Iowa where he worked at different jobs until 1897 when he and a friend, Eugene Fiscus decided to go to Wyoming to seek employment. They left Audubon by covered wagon, driving a span of mules. Their route took them across Nebraska to Lusk, Wyoming and then to Douglas, Wyoming, arriving May 1, 1897. His friend didn't stay in Wyoming — he went back to Iowa, and later settled in the Bayard, Nebraska area.

Bert stayed in Wyoming and found work at the Marshall Bros. Sawmill near Cold Springs. He worked for them about three years. While he was employed, he dug out a spring beside the road and walled it up with rocks. This spring is still used today by passers-by and is known as Cold Springs. Later, a post office was established in the area near the spring and was named Cold Springs, Wyoming. Bert found work on the Martin Smith ranch on Box Elder. He worked there about two years. He filed on a homestead in the Little Medicine country southwest of Cold Springs.

He married Anna Pearle Rice, born December 6, 1879 on March 26, 1902 at the ranch home of her parents, Charles and Almina Rice on Beaver Creek. They were married by Justice of the Peace, Hiram Daniels of Douglas. Anna had filed on a homestead on Doggie Creek, west of Upper LaPrele Creek, and since neither one had proved up on their claims, and they couldn't live on both of them, Bert relinquished his claim and they built their home on Anna's claim on Doggie Creek. Bert built the two-room house of logs with a dirt roof. The first year they were married, they lived with Anna's parents until the house was built. He hauled the logs for the house from the mountains with a team (named Susie and Lady) and wagon as there were no trucks at that time and no graded roads — just a wagon trail. This place was to be their

Sanford, Bert and Anna Family

Bert was born at Chanute, Kansas, March 1, 1874, the second child in a family of eight children, four of whom died in infancy. His parents were Elisha Curtis Sanford and Mary Ellen Waller Sanford. His parents moved to a farm near Independence, Kansas where he spent his childhood days. When he was ten years old his mother future home for many years.

Four children were born to them. Eva (born January 8, 1903, married Fred Topping, first marriage, Mr. Briggs, second marriage), Claude (born February 19, 1904, married Herminnie Brockmeyer), Mabel (born January 7, 1906, married Art Hageman), and Charles (born April 2, 1907).

(From here on Bert and Anna will be known as Dad and Mother).

Dad farmed several acres, using the old walking plow and horses. He raised grain, corn, potatoes, and vegetables, some of which he would sell to help out with expenses. He also would cut grain for others in the fall using the old horse-drawn binder.

In 1911, my grandfather, Charles Rice, bought a 40 acre tract of land near Roseburg, Oregon. He wanted Dad and Mother to move out there and live on the place. So, in November 1911 they decided to go, shipping household goods, machinery and horses by train. Dad built a house and other buildings and tried to farm the land, but it was not successful, so in October 1912, they decided to move back to Wyoming — they still owned their place here so moved back on it. About the year of 1916, Dad still held his Homestead Right, so filed on some land that joined the home place. He built a log house on the claim, and since the government required residency for three to five years to be eligible to prove up, the family lived there for seven years.

In 1918, he also filed on an additional homestead in the Windy Ridge area west of the present home. It didn't require residency to prove up — just improvements such as fences, etc. They later bought cattle for the place. This was about the time of World War I and times were hard — everyone was rationed, especially on food, and there was no white flour to be had, so we raised our own wheat and it was threshed by the Lambe Bros. using the old steam engine for power. Dad had a fanning mill — hand-powered — which he used to run the threshed wheat through to remove the weed seeds and dirt. It didn't take out all of the weed seed, rocks, etc., so the family had to hand-pick the wheat to take out the rocks, lumps of dirt, and rosin weed seeds that were left in. He had a little flour mill that he would grind the wheat into flour, and we used that home-ground flour for several years. Did it ever seem good when we could buy white flour again.

We had several hives of bees so had honey to use since we couldn't get sugar. At this time, Dad was in the age group to register for the draft, but he was never called.

After World War I was over, times were still hard. Dad worked on roads doing grading and bridge repair work. He used the scraper and Fresno using horses to move the dirt. After the fall work was done, Dad would take his little Witte Engine and wood saw, and go around the neighborhood and saw firewood for winter use as everyone burned wood for cooking and heat. I remember one winter when he was gone sawing wood, the temperature dropped to 53° below zero — it was a terrible winter and livestock really suffered from the cold. Dad had a blacksmith shop and did many repair jobs for neighbors, including setting wagon tires, sharpening plow lays, and welding, and shoeing horses.

They had one cow (Old Pet) which they milked — they also raised chickens and traded eggs, butter, and vegetables to the stores for groceries. To keep the milk and butter cold, Mother filled 10 lb. lard pails (with lids) with milk and butter and we would take them to the creek and set them in the running water, putting a rock on the pail so it wouldn't upset or wash away. This kept the milk fresh for two or three days. I remember one day, there was a big cloudburst and the creek rose very rapidly, and before we could get the buckets out of the creek, they were washed away — some, we never did find.

We always butchered our own hogs and cured the meat in brine, and after it was cured, the hams and bacon were smoked in a little smokehouse with cottonwood bark — they were delicious!

Mother cooked whole wheat for cereal, made hominy from corn, and made the laundry soap. Mother did the laundry by hand, using the galvanized tub and a wash board — this usually took most of the day. Later, we had an old washer with a wooden tub and it had a dasher in the lid and when it was closed it washed the clothes by turning a wheel by hand. Mother made most of our clothes from hand-me-downs and flour and sugar sacks. Some of our clothes were bought from the Montgomery Ward and Sears, Roebuck catalogs. These would be shoes, stockings, and underwear — yes, in winter we had to wear the longlegged underwear with the drop-seat — also long black stockings. We kids were always so glad when the warm spring days came so we could change from the winter underwear to the summer ones which Mother made from flour sacks — and we got to go barefoot and no more long black stockings! Mother was never too busy with her family to take time to go to a neighbor's to deliver a baby. She acted as a midwife in the community for many years, and delivered the babies herself without the aid of a doctor. She delivered at least thirty babies — many of whom were her own grandchildren.

Dad would put new half-soles on our shoes, and he sewed up the rips and patched the shoes whenever they needed it. Dad was very handy at making small cabinets, tables, stands, and repairing chairs. He also made many things for us kids such as sleds, baseballs, whistles, slingshots, etc. He also made our mittens from buckskin which he tanned.

I remember the peddler that used to come with his one-horse drawn wagon about twice a year to sell his goods which consisted of staple foods, pots and pans, brooms, mops, cleaning products, medicines, liniments, tonics, salves, ointments, dress material, etc. — also, candy for the kids. It was always a big day when the peddler came. This peddler later was replaced by the Rawleigh and Watkins dealers.

Since we had no water or inside plumbing in the house, Dad dug a well in the yard in front of the house about 15 ft. from the kitchen door. It produced very good cold, soft water and Dad installed a hand pump in the well, and it is still used today. We had no bathroom in the house so had to take a bath on the kitchen floor in a galvanized wash tub. Dad built a "little house" in the backyard — there was always a good path to it so we didn't have any trouble finding it.

We had no electricity so had to use kerosene lamps or lanterns (and sometimes candles) for lights. For many years, we didn't have mail service, so when anyone went to town, they would bring the mail for the neighbors, also groceries or other supplies. The community had a privately owned telephone line, and they used the old wall-crank type telephones. The line was owned by E. B. Shaffner who later sold it to the telephone company.

For recreation then, there were neighborhood picnics in the summer and old time barn dances. Dad and Mother furnished the music for many of the dances — Dad played the violin and Mother played the old pump-organ. We always enjoyed this old time music — I think my dad was happiest when he was playing the violin. On the 4th of July, we usually went to Glenrock to a big celebration. There was a big picnic for everyone, a parade, many races, and contests, horseshoe pitching, ball games, etc. In the evening, there would be a big dance on a platform set up in the middle of the street, and this would last about all night. We went to this celebration by means of team and buggy, by way of Windy Ridge and Clayton Hill, just a wagon trail then.

Dad bought his first car, a used 1915 Model T Touring car in 1920. He drove it for several years, when as the years went by he would buy later models of different makes.

As time went by, Dad did the general ranch work as he could for several years with the family helping. We children went to a rural grade school and graduated from Glenrock High School. Later we married and left home.

In the mid thirties, Dad was employed as caretaker at the Natural Bridge Park for about six or seven years. Then, he and Mother moved back to the ranch. As Dad and Mother were growing older and their health was failing, they sold the ranch in 1946 to Claude, the eldest son, and bought a home in Douglas where they lived the rest of their life. Mother died August 15, 1953. Dad died August 22, 1955. Son Claude was killed in a tractor accident on the ranch July 2, 1954. They are all buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Charles died October 4, 1972 in Jackson, Wyoming and is buried there. My sister, Eva and I are the only ones left in the family. Eva now lives in Jackson, Wyoming, retired after owning and managing a dude ranch at Elk, Wyoming a little over forty years. I am the only family member still living in Douglas.

Saul, Henry and Willard Families

Willard A. Saul and Henry C. Saul, twin brothers, were born in Iowa on May 23, 1870. Their parents, James and Maria Saul, came to the United States from Ireland. Willard and Henry were very proud of their Irish ancestry.

Willard Saul married Emma Gibson in 1896. Their children were Vera, Vernon and Veldon. Mr. Saul died March 19, 1947 and Emma Saul died December 24, 1962. Their son Vernon Saul, who had served ten years in the U.S. Navy and U.S. Coast Guard, died in Marysville, California on October 24, 1973. Their son Veldon "Pep" married Julianna Hitschew. They became the parents of a son, Richard. Veldon Saul died on November 2, 1967. Vera Saul Trumper, had two children, Patricia and O'Donnell Trumper. Patricia married M. J. Murray, who is in the oil well drilling business, and they have one daughter, Kay. O'Donnell married Joanne Read, and they have two sons, Kelly and Michael. O'Donnell and family live in Tucson, Arizona.

Henry Saul married Viola Todd on April 17, 1898. They had two daughters, Gertrude and Mildred, now deceased. Henry Saul passed away on Jan. 17, 1939. Viola died on May 3, 1949. Their daughter, Gertrude married Everett Goodrich. The Goodrich's had two sons, Warren and Henry.

Willard and Henry Saul came to Wyoming on a hunting trip, and were so impressed with the country that they returned to Iowa and sold their holdings there. Together with their brother, J. C. Saul, they purchased a portion of the Lyman Cooper ranch on LaBonte, as well as adjoining lands, and formed the LaBonte Livestock Company. Their brand was 8. The families of Willard and Henry Saul moved to the ranches on LaBonte and Owl Creek in 1901, bought cattle to stock the grazing lands and planted crops of alfalfa and grain. In 1913, Willard and Henry sold their interest to their brother, J. C. Saul, and bought the 4T Ranch on Horseshoe Creek and a general store in Glendo.

Later on, Willard and Henry bought adjoining homes in Douglas; Willard purchased the Lowndes home and Henry purchased the Ed Reavill home on North Third Street. They opened a hardware and jewelry store in 1920 known as the Saul Co. which they operated together until Willard and his son Veldon "Pep" bought the Henry Saul interest in 1930. Willard and his son continued the business until Willard passed away in 1947; after the death of Veldon Saul, Veldon's son Richard operated the store until he sold it.

Willard Saul had assembled one of the largest and finest gun collections in the West. Willard was a great trapshooter and hunter, and had won many trophies and awards during his heyday until his illness prevented further competition. Among his vast gun collection is a .45 Colt that had belonged to Wyoming cowboy George W. Pike, and a matlock pistol dating from the fifteenth century. This firearms collection is now owned by Willard Saul's grandson, Richard "Dick" Saul. The collection of guns and swords consists of almost four hundred items; and with the exception of fifteen pieces, the collection is all numbered and cataloged.

Henry Saul's hobby was clocks and clock making. Those who have seen Henry's collection and work on home-made time pieces have marveled at the technical ability of the man who made them.

Henry was a graduate of the Omaha School of Optometry. He practiced the profession from 1920 until the time of his death. He also served as a member of the state board of examiners in optometry.

Henry was also an expert with a trap gun and held many titles and trophies won at state shoots. The local newspapers have several accounts of where the Saul brothers were in shooting matches. It was a hobby and tradition carried down to Willard's daughter, Vera, who won several trap shooting awards of her own.

The Saul brothers were very interested in the mineral possibilities of the mountains south of Douglas. They prospected considerably, uncovering many promising veins of copper ore. One such prospect was known as the Saul Mine close to Elk Mountain.

Willard was also interested in the bee business. He owned a small place on the Platte River at Orin, Wyoming where he had several bee hives. This was at one time George Howe's place. Willard sold it to Clyde Rogers.

Willard and Henry Saul were men of high integrity and are missed by their many Wyoming friends. As one man said, "I am sorry they are now gone, but I am glad I knew them."

Saul, James C. and Alice Family

What was to become "one of the largest and finest cattle ranches" in Wyoming (Douglas Budget May 2, 1944), was basically organized in 1901 in Converse County, 25 miles south of Douglas, by James Charles Saul. It was headquartered on a fork of LaBonte Creek, called Owl Creek.

James C. Saul was born in 1861. He married Alice A. Weston, a native of Norway.

My father, James Charles "J.C." Saul, was at the time operating two cattle and hog farms near Dennison, Iowa. He learned of the Converse County, Wyoming area from his two older brothers, Willard A. and Henry C. Saul, who had been up and hunted on the Lyman Cooper and James Willox ranches. The area was then used as a horse pasture by a big outfit running cattle out of the Platte River Valley.

Cooper homesteaded on LaBonte and Willox homesteaded on the west fork up at the base of the mountains. Both had 160 acre claims, plus leasing two school sections Nos. 16 and 26 and also leased some state land. They also controlled 160 acres of stone and timber land. With this they managed several thousand acres. Willox sold out to Cooper in 1897.

J. C. Saul and his brothers, Willard and Henry, bought the Cooper interest in 1901. The LaBonte Livestock Company was formed and incorporated.

When J. C. had bought out Cooper, he had sold his farms in Iowa and moved to the town of Dennison, Iowa. During this period Mrs. Saul took the children to LaBonte Ranch in the summers. Also at this time, Henry Saul saw the need for surveying, bought an instrument and instruction book and became a surveyor, the fifth man in Wyoming to get a surveyor's license.

In Wyoming at that time the banks preferred to loan money to large outfits only, not to homesteaders. J. C. was able to borrow money in Iowa to buy herds of cattle.

He kept the steers and sold the she-stuff to the homesteaders so that they could make a start.

In 1912 J. C. bought out his brothers. Part of the deal was a small ranch on Horseshoe Creek between Esterbrook and Glendo on Horseshoe Creek. In 1913 Willard and Henry bought the 4T Ranch on Horseshoe Creek and a general store in Glendo. In 1915, J. C. gave one half interest to his two sons, yours truly, Oliver, and Charles J. "Charley" Saul. I was made ranch manager. Charley was born in 1893.

About 1910 I learned to survey from my Uncle Henry. I was deputized to survey five miles of county road from LaBonte Ranch to the county road from Douglas to Esterbrook. Clark Bishop, the County Surveyor, came out to check and O.K. the survey.

In 1916 J. C. moved to Douglas from Iowa. Charles and I built modern homes on the ranch and were married. Charles J. Saul married Merle Blakeman and had three children: Jim, Cathy Jo and Margo. Cathy Jo married Gordon "Jim" Roush, who managed the Wyoming State Fair until retirement. Merle Saul, Cathy Jo Roush and her husband "Jim" are still living in Douglas at this writing. I married Jessie Archie.

In 1925 Charles J. Saul, the son, bought my interest. I went to manage the Ford Agency Garage in Glenrock, then to Florida for a real estate venture and finally to teach school in Los Angeles, California. In 1941 Charles bought out his father's interest and dissolved the corporation. Some time after that, Charles switched over to black Angus cattle from Herefords.

LaBonte Ranch planted alfalfa and grain crops on 1,000 irrigated acres and ran cattle on leased land, altogether about 35,000 acres. Normally, LaBonte Livestock Company shipped two shipments of cattle per year to the stockyards in Omaha, Nebraska. J.C.'s early fall shipments of 300 animals required a special train on the Northwestern Railroad, made up at Douglas. The second fall shipment was a trainload combined with other ranches of the area. J. C. traded his up-graded bulls for Governor Carey's registered heifers and sold these heifers.

The secret of J. C.'s success was his skill as a trader, buying and selling livestock. He could guess the weight of a steer within a very few pounds. He also helped some of his 10-15 employees get started in their own ranches as homesteaders.

Other less responsible ranch hands were often given the "fringe benefit" of free transportation in "prone position" in the back of a wagon by sober son, yours truly, after the boys had overdone Saturday night in Douglas bars. Consequently, full employment was maintained at LaBonte Livestock Company in the early nineteen hundreds. And, of course, without any OSHA government regulations. But the system worked!

LaBonte Ranch was sold by Charles J. Saul to Fred Manning in May of 1944. "One of the best bred herds in the County" said the Douglas Budget, May 2, 1944.

In the early years there were no telephones on ranches. County roads and bridges were limited. You often forded streams if you could. J. C. bought his own road grader in Iowa from the highway department and graded roads by live horse power. He built a concrete piled bridge across the LaBonte Creek when the early wooden one was washed out in a flood. There was no such thing as Federal or State Disaster Area funds.

My father, J. C., was determined to run his own show and kind of looked down on anyone, including myself as a teacher, who had to work for anybody else.

For a period of time J. C. ran some sheep and well understood the trials and tribulations of the Western sheep and cattle wars. The Lobo Wolf was an enemy in those days as they slaughtered grown cattle. J. C. instigated a bounty of ten dollars for females and five dollars for males, to anyone who trapped or shot a wolf. Cattlemen assessed themselves five cents per head for this undertaking.

When my brother and I built houses on LaBonte Ranch, rough lumber was hauled from a nearby mill by yours truly with a wagon and a six-mule team. Finished lumber was hauled the same way 25 miles from Douglas.

Though not the very first in Converse County to have an automobile, J. C. was an early purchaser in 1914. In his latter years he was well known around town as the guy who sped around corners in Douglas without really looking to see if anybody or anything was at the corner first. Heaven only prevented an accident. But perhaps a pioneer cattle trader can be forgiven for a reckless and stubborn "Do it my way". He said when questioned on the subject, "everybody in town knows I drive like that at my age and they darn well better get out of my way!"

Alice died on Jan. 31, 1941, James C. on Dec. 16, 1947 and Charles J. on Sept. 9, 1974.

Charles J. bought the Dunn Ranch in 1936. He ran it until 1965 when it was sold to John Pexton. Some of Charley's faithful managers were Earl Castle, Tim Nostrum and Jay Norton.

Schlecty, Roscoe and Mabel

Roscoe Schlecty was born in Versailles, Ohio in 1890. He grew to manhood there and received his education in the public schools, after which he drifted westward seeking a homestead location. He searched in Nebraska and South Dakota but finally ended up in Wyoming in 1913 where he found the sort of land and neighborhood which satisfied him. For a time he punched cows for Vic DeMott on the Fiddleback Ranch located north of Douglas and later took a homestead in that vicinity.

In July of 1918, Roscoe went overseas with the 28th Division to serve his country in the front lines during the first World War. He was severely wounded in the Argonne Forest in September of that year, losing his left arm and suffering other shell wounds about his body. He was critically ill in the hospital for several months, his recovery questionable.

Roscoe returned to the United States in the spring of 1919 and was honorably discharged from the service in February of 1920. He spent a short time after his discharge visiting in Ohio and then returned to Wyoming to prove up on his homestead.

In 1922, Roscoe was married to Miss Mabel Ellison of Cheyenne, after which the couple returned to Douglas to make their home. They were the parents of two sons, George and William. Mabel, who was a registered nurse worked in the hospital in Douglas for many years.

Roscoe was a successful candidate for the office of County Clerk in 1920 and was re-elected to serve a second and third term, ending his tenure in 1932.

Mr. Schlecty was one of the group in Douglas who supported worthwhile projects for the community. He was a Commander of the Samuel Mares Legion Post in Douglas.

In 1943 the Schlectys moved to Geneva, Nebraska, where they operated a hospital for a time, after which they moved to Alma, Kansas where Roscoe was engaged in the ranching business with his two sons.

Roscoe died April 6, 1948 at Alma and he was buried in Geneva, Nebraska.

Schneider, John and Mary Family

John Schneider was born in 1863. He was married to Mary Alsplund who was born in 1857 in Sweden. To this union five children were born: Fritz, Clarence, Lillian, Ester and Jacob.

The Schneiders came to Wyoming to homestead completing their "proving up" on one parcel of 160 acres in 1895 and on an additional parcel of 160 acres in 1902. This land was located west of Orin, Wyoming near the North Platte River. Mary Alsplund Schneider died in 1911; John in 1926.

The youngest of the five children, Jacob, was born on March 17, 1894. He grew to adulthood in Wyoming and married Alla Smith in Chadron, Nebraska on October 27, 1920.

Alla Smith was born on July 23, 1895. It is probable that she was educated in the Nebraska school system, completing her education by attending Krister's Ladies Sewing College from which she graduated in 1914.

At that time fashion decreed that the well dressed ladies wore gowns with tight fitting bodices enforced by stays called "basques." These dresses were difficult to fit and accomplished seamstresses were in demand.

After their marriage, Jacob and Alla bought a place west of Douglas where they made their home. Jacob bought some dairy cattle, built a dairy barn and made his living for a time in that business. To supplement their income Alla made butter which, in addition to eggs, she sold to the local grocers. The eggs were tested for freshness by the water tub method. They were placed in the water and those that floated were discarded but those that sank to the bottom of the tub were determined to be fresh.

During the late 20s and early 30s times were hard, often there was no market for eggs and butter. It was a time during which "door to door" salesmen for products such as Rawleigh and Watkins came around with their wares, wandering groups of Gypsies were common and tramps came knocking at the door for a handout. The Schneiders fed them and sent them on their way with a sack lunch for their supper. The tramps marked an X on a fence post so that others of their kind would know that here was a family which would give them food.

In later years, along with his dairy business, Jacob bought a threshing machine and threshed wheat and oats for others in the community.

The Schneiders were members of the Methodist Church but attended Sunday school in the school house in the LaPrele district. Dorothea, who was the daughter of Jacob and Alla, was educated in the rural school later attending the Converse County High School in Douglas.

Dorothea believes that "Those we hold most dear never truly leave us. They live in the kindness they shared, the comfort they shared and the love they brought into our lives."

Jacob Schneider died on January 10, 1967, Alla in January of 1977.

Fritz was born on September 30, 1890 in Denver, Colorado. He married Menta Rice. They had one son, Leonard, and one daughter, Louise. Leonard never married. He died in a tragic fire in his home at his ranch south of Douglas on August 5, 1965. Louise is married and lives in Hawaii. Menta died in 1959, Fritz on November 25, 1961.

Scott, Arthur and Mary Family

Parents: Arthur Scott - Mary Simonsen Scott, married Aug. 28, 1904 in Avoca, Iowa.

Children:

"Roy", born Mar. 27, 1905	Pearl, born Nov. 2, 1912
Hazel, born Mar. 5, 1907	Ella, born Apr. 3, 1914
Edward, born Feb. 10, 1908	Albert, born June 24, 1916
Edna, born Sept. 26, 1909	Grace, born June 23, 1918
"Paul," born Jan. 7, 1911	Catherine "Renee," born May 22, 1920

Arthur and Mary Scott homesteaded in northern Converse County, north and west of Dry Creek, two miles south of Swan Johnson. They came with nine children. They had lost one girl Edna August 19, 1910 in Canada.

Their little home was quite crowded but they were a happy family. There was no school so Mary taught her children. Then there was a school taught by Angeline Tillard who rode horseback to school.

All the children pitched in on wash day, changing beds, cleaning house, etc.

Arthur was away some of the time working at different jobs.

The summer of 1923 tragedy struck. There was quite a bunch of neighbors gathered at a lake for a picnic, wading and swimming. When it began to cloud up they decided to leave and go to Mrs. Huff's house less than a mile away. Some were on foot, Arthur had a hayrack. As they were ready to go, lightning struck killing Harry Stone, son of Mrs. Huff, and Arthur Scott. Two of his children had hair burned on one side. Hazel had a flash burn, it went down her body and she still has a brown spot on the front of her leg.

Arthur was laid to rest in the cemetery at Avoca, Iowa.

In September 1923, Mary sold everything but the homestead and went back to the hometown Avoca, Iowa. She rented a big rambling house and all pitched in earning what they could.

Children: Roy Scott homesteaded west of Swan Johnson; when Roy proved up on the homestead, Swan Johnson bought it. Roy lived with his mother several years.

Hazel married Swan Johnson a year later; they had five children.

Ed lived in Kennawich, Washington and has two sons.

Paul homesteaded down by Cow Creek, he later sold to Archie Alexander. His wife Bernice (Reeves) lives in Casper (five children); Elizabeth in Cody; Mary and Rodney in Casper; Cathy, New Mexico; and Jerry in Kuwait (between Saudi Arabia and Iraq).

Pearl Olsen lives in Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Ella Christensen in El Dorado, Kansas and has seven children.

Albert in rest home in Saratoga, Wyoming.

Grace lives in Longview, Washington.

Catherine "Renee" Walker in Richland, Washington and has three children.

Deceased Edna, Roy, Ed and Paul.

In 1929 Mary Scott married Ernest Boydston at Avoca and they had one son, Jack, who has four children.

Swan and Hazel Johnson bought Mary Scott's homestead in 1929.

Scott, James Jefferson Family

He was the epitomy of the word "cowboy". Born in Scottsville, Texas May 22, 1861, Jeff Scott served as drover on several trail herds from Texas to Colorado. On one return trip he married Iona Jones in the spring of 1892. They later settled near Boyero, Colorado and moved to Converse County in 1917. The large family divided to make the trip — some came by emigrant train, others by car while Mrs. Scott and young son Earl travelled by passenger train. Earl recalls staying at the old LaBonte Hotel for one week while waiting the arrival of the rest of the family.

Jeff purchased the Lyman Cooper Ranch (presently owned by John Pollock) on Wagonhound. He sold the ranch in 1923 and, in conjunction with being a livestock order buyer, operated the Douglas Livery Stable. The building still stands. It's located east of the Burlington Northern Railroad track and is occupied by Kwik Print. In 1928 Jeff purchased the Bob Howard Ranch south of Shawnee on Lost Creek. He ran cattle on this property until 1932 at which time he sold his livestock and retired in Douglas.

Mr. and Mrs. Scott were the parents of eleven children: Roy, Newton, Bessie (Mrs. John Fitzhugh and later Mrs. Clarence Ebersold), Alta, (Mrs. Paul Shaw), Ralph, Walter, Frank, Violet (Mrs. Dick Jamison), Earl, Bill and Robert. Roy and Robert died as young children. Bill died in March, 1940 while attending the University of Wyoming.

Jeff related to family members frequently that he had actually roped a bear in the vicinity where Dallas-Fort Worth, Texas is now situated. He died June 14, 1938 in Douglas, Wyoming. Iona died May 16, 1931.

Anjn Scott Boner

Scott, Joseph R. and Nellie

Joseph R. "Bob" Scott was born on August 11, 1865, the son of Robert and Pauline Taylor Scott, in Marshall, Texas.

He and his brother, Jeff, trailed cattle north to Colorado in 1880 and after returning to Texas they operated a ranch for a time that they were given by their father. The lure of open range beckoned them back to Colorado where the brothers homesteaded near Haswell.

Bob married Nellie Bollin in 1894. Two daughters, Ella Louise and Lucille Emogene (b. May 30, 1900) were born to them.

Shortly after the turn of the century, Nellie divorced Bob and returned to Texas taking her two daughters with her. The life on the eastern plains of Colorado was too harsh for her. She remarried but died shortly after in 1912.

After living a short time with their grandmother, Ella and Lucille returned to Colorado to live with their father. Lucille has many memories of living on the lonesome, bleak and flat prairies.

In 1917 Bob and Jeff brought their families to Converse County where they purchased the Lyman Cooper property on Wagonhound Creek, southwest of Douglas.

Around 1920 the Scott brothers dissolved their partnership with Bob returning to Colorado and Jeff staying on at the Wagonhound Ranch. Bob remained in Colorado until 1937 when he sold his interest to his son-in-law, William Patterson and came to Wyoming to live with Lucille. He died on June 18, 1943.

Ella married William E. "Pat" Patterson, a carpenter by trade. The Pattersons followed the Scotts to Douglas. Pat worked in Douglas for a while before filing on a homestead near the Scott ranch. Ben Middleton owns and lives on the land in 1985.

The Pattersons were the parents of three sons: Elmer, Scott and Jim. Elmer died when lightning hit the horse he was riding near Boyero, Colorado. He was not found for several days.

After proving up on their homestead, Pat and Ella moved back to Colorado where they were associated with Ella's father on the ranch. Ella died in 1930 as the result of a brain tumor.

Lucille taught school for a time in Wyoming. She tells of the time when she was babysitting with her cousin, Alta Scott, at the home of the neighbors in the mountains. "It was in the evening after the sun had gone down and the sky became all red. We became very frightened because it looked as if the mountains were all on fire. We gathered up the children and started to walk to get away from the fire. After going a short ways, however, we were very embarrassed to find out the cause of what we thought was the fire was the moon coming up."

Lucille married Lisle E. Pexton on March 23, 1920.

John R. Pexton

Sears, Curtis and Martha

Curtis Sears came to Wyoming from England in the late 1800's. Many Englishmen were investing money in ranching operations in Wyoming at that time. Curtis managed a relay station for the stage stop route on the Old Bozeman Trail on Sand Creek after his arrival, but when the route was discontinued, he turned his attention to ranching. He began raising horses, importing blooded stallions from England to improve his stock. Curtis' ranch was located on Bear Creek; his brand was the reverse EB, connected. When Teddy Roosevelt was president, in the early 1900's, Wyoming gave him a well-trained gaited saddle horse born and bred on the EB Ranch.

The meadowland along Bear Creek produced a large quantity of hay, and eventually Curtis invested in cattle in addition to his horse business. The various ranchers along Bear Creek were situated about ten miles from one another. Each rancher owned a small amount of land, but controlled many acres of the open range.

The famous, or infamous, George W. Pike, was a neighbor of Sears on Bear Creek. The two became friends and companions. Both liked to drink and to gamble. They connived together against the large ranchers in the area, such as the CY, Goose Egg, and the Fiddleback. All of these ranchers imported purebred bulls from the east to improve their cattle herds. Curtis and George used these bulls in their own herds, as well as putting their brands on any "slick" calves they happened to come across. It followed, naturally, that Curtis and George spent much of their time in the saddle.

Curtis and Pike were out riding, searching for slick calves, when they wandered into the little town of Gillette. They tied their horses to the rack in front of the saloon. The town, at that time, consisted of a saloon, store, livery stable, and a few residences. They entered the saloon, asking the keeper if he could supply a drink for a couple of tired and thirsty "hombres". The keeper obliged them, of course, and shortly, Pike and Curtis decided that they would go put their horses in the livery stable and stay the night. Shortly after their departure, the saloon was robbed by two men, wearing bandana handkerchiefs over their faces. One of the robbers entered by the front door, the other by the rear. They ordered everyone to put their hands in the air, cleaned out the cash drawer and departed.

Soon afterward, Curtis and George re-entered the saloon, excited upon hearing of the daring hold-up. After some speculation, Curtis and Pike ordered free drinks for the house, for which they paid in cash. When the two left Gillette the following morning, the saloon keeper had as much in the till as he had had before the robbery, but his liquor supply was depleted.

Curtis hated sheep! One morning a band of sheep was reported grazing in the lower meadow. One of Curt's hands, named Pecker Nick Steve, accompanied Curtis, horseback, to the meadow to drive off the offending sheep. The shepherd, a Russian, refused to move his herd and an argument followed. Steve, aware that the argument was about to become a fist fight, took the six-shooters from the two men, and the fight began! The two men fought and fought. When they could no longer stand, they would lie on the ground panting for breath. When they had recovered sufficiently, they would begin to fight again. This continued for more than an hour, finally ending when the Russian herder, wiping blood and sweat off his face, sent his dog around the sheep and headed over the divide.

Once a company of United States soldiers, on a mission, camped on Bear Creek for the night. They turned their horses and mules loose to graze. The next morning, the wranglers could not find the cavvy of stock, thus the company was unable to move. For several days the soldiers searched for their animals, but had no success. In desperation, the commanding officer offered a reward of $500 for the return of the horses and mules. The story goes that George W. Pike and Curtis Sears appeared at the camp at daybreak with the missing animals, and departed five hundred dollars richer.

Curtis Sears was married to Martha Beatrice Carey Sears, who had come to Wyoming when she was in her teens to teach a school located at the edge of the Hat Creek Breaks. It was called Five Points. She had been born in Des Moines, Iowa in 1877. Martha was a very beautiful young woman who had many suitors.

After teaching one term, she found employment as a waitress at a restaurant in Douglas. It was there that she met Curtis Sears. He was a middle-aged widower, who seemed to Martha to be a promising prospect for a husband. She learned that besides his ranch on Bear Creek, he owned a home in Douglas which he had won in an all-night poker game in Pringle's Saloon. The house had been a sporting house, located around the corner from the LaBonte Hotel. Curtis had improved the property, turning it into a comfortable home. Curtis spent a great deal of his time in Douglas, drinking and gambling, leaving his ranch in charge of Bill Marchant, his reliable foreman.

Two children were born to Martha and Curtis. Warren was born in 1899, and Leona in 1900. Warren was a source of trouble to his mother, but Leona, in her early life, was loved by everyone. After Curtis' death in 1905, Martha was left to raise the two small children alone. Billy Marchant remained on as foreman of the ranch. In later years, however, Billy began to drink heavily. Finally, Martha was obliged to let him go. Billy spent the remainder of his life in Pringle's saloon - a bar bum.

Sheep became a lucrative business in Wyoming after the turn of the century. Fred Dilts, who had a large band of 2000 head, offered a half interest in his sheep to Martha in return for the use of her range and hay meadows. This arrangement lasted a number of years, during which both parties made a lot of money. Eventually, trouble started between them. Each partner owned cattle and horses of his own, and it was over this stock that the controversy developed. The partnership came to an end in 1916.

Warren J. Grove, Martha's nephew, had come to Wyoming to homestead one mile north of the ranch buildings. Warren was of great help to Martha, acting as foreman for her after her partnership with Dilts was dissolved.

The terrible winter of 1919-20 was an equalizer for most ranchers. Martha suffered a great loss of livestock from which she never recovered. She mortgaged her ranch, but after a few years, she was obliged to sell it to avoid foreclosure. She did retain half the mineral rights, however, which proved to be a good income for her in later years.

After selling the ranch, Martha built a large apartment house in Casper which she called the Heart Apartments. This venture, too, proved to be costly to Martha, for business in Casper suffered a decline. Martha found it impossible to keep her apartments rented. She mortgaged the apartment house, but sold it later to salvage what she could of her investment. Martha had mortgaged everything she owned with the exception of the home in Douglas.

Martha's children were a great disappointment to her. Warren, her son, was an individual with "big ideas", none of which were practical, or proved successful. Her daughter, Leona, was married to Dick Hornbuckle who was a world renowned bronc rider, cowboy, and something of a rounder. The two separated after two years of marriage. They had a child who died at less than one year of age. Leona then became an alcoholic, spending what money she could get to support her habit.

Martha disposed of her property in Wyoming, and purchased a home in Los Angeles. Her main purpose was to provide a change of environment for her daughter, Leona, who was living in Casper at the time. Leona's life was worsening steadily. She had no means of supporting herself. She finally died in the early 1960's. Martha had Leona's body cremated, the ashes being returned to Douglas to be interred in the same grave as the body of her infant.

At the age of 80, Martha began to lose her faculties. At the age of 85, she entered a "guest home" in California so that she could have proper care. When Martha was 90, she was obliged to live in a sanitarium, since her mind had deteriorated so badly, and at the age of 96, Martha died on August 19, 1973.

All the Sears family are buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Their plot is located close to that of George W. Pike, Curtis' close friend. Curtis and George died while relatively young men from cirrhosis of the liver.

Though their methods of advancing their own personal successes were questionable at times, it was men such as these two whose exploits give the spicy flavor to the history of early times in Converse County. A "Wild West" novel would pale in comparison to these two cronies.

Perhaps the inscription on the headstone which marks the grave of Pike describes him very well. The stone was placed on Pike's grave by Lee Moore in tribute to his friend. The epitaph reads:

"Underneath this stone in eternal rest
Sleeps the wildest one of the wayward west
He was gambler and sport and cowboy too
And he led the pace in an outlaw crew
He was sure on the trigger and staid to the end
But he was never known to quit on a friend
In the relations of death all mankind is alike
But in life there was only one George W. Pike"

Sewell, Albert and Shirley

Albert B. Sewell was born to William A. and Anna G. Sewell in Collins County, Texas on November 12, 1902. Albert's father, a native of Kentucky, was born on July 14, 1840; his mother on December 11, 1877. The Sewells lived in Texas until William's death in 1916, after which Mrs. Sewell moved her family to Arkansas where they engaged in farming, moving on to Wyoming in 1919. After reaching Wyoming, Mrs. Sewell remarried, making her home there for a time. The Wyoming weather, however, proved too severe for her and she left the state. Albert, employed as a ranch hand, remained in Wyoming later leasing the Bert Elder place. Bert had homesteaded the property earlier. Before his lease expired, Albert purchased the place, later adding land to it to total 1803 acres. Of this land, 500 acres were irrigated.

Albert raised Hereford cattle owned in partnership with Wesley Wiker of Douglas. He also bred and raised horses, crossing light-colored Palominos with Hambletonian and Kentucky Whip breeds to produce a chocolate colored animal. At one time Mr. Sewell had around 3,000 head of sheep in addition to a herd of dairy cattle. The milk from his herd was marketed in Casper. Mr. Sewell ran his stock under the Diamond Heart which he originated in 1929 and the reverse DH brands.

Albert B. Sewell was married to Shirley Bigelow on November 4, 1928. Shirley was the daughter of Alexander and Florence Bigelow. She was born on October 25, 1907. Alexander was a native of England; her mother a native of Delaware. Florence Bigelow, a nurse by profession, had come to Wyoming in 1914. She homesteaded 640 acres on Dry Creek in 1915.

Albert and Shirley were the parents of one daughter, Sandra Florence. When Sandra was 28 months old she was selected as "Baby Wyoming" at the 1939 Wyoming State Fair in Douglas.

Mr. Sewell was a success in his chosen field. He lent his time and efforts to the betterment of his community. He was a member of the Converse County Farm Bureau which he helped reorganize in 1946. He served as a member of the school board, the local telephone board and the water board. His hobby was fishing.

The ranch which he operated for many years was sold in 1961. Mr. Sewell died in 1965.

Shadel, Melvin and Eva

Arlington, Oklahoma was the birthplace of Melvin Shadel. He was born there in 1896. When he was six years old, the family, consisting of Albert (father), Ida (mother), Samuel (brother) and Violet (sister), moved to Oregon. In 1904 Albert died. The family then moved east to Broken Bow, Nebraska. Melvin took care of his brothers and sister while his mother worked for fifty cents a day to keep the family going.

It was while living in Nebraska that he met Jake Koch. Jake was to be his neighbor when they homesteaded on Antelope Creek in northern Converse County.

After serving his country in World War I, Melvin first homesteaded near Hulett before settling in Converse County.

It was in 1925, while working in the oil field at Midwest, that Melvin met Eva Rogers. She was working in a grocery store in Edgerton at the time. They were married in Denver, Colorado in 1926.

Eva Rogers was born in Nephi, Arizona in 1901. Her grandmother had come West with the Mormons on their trek to find the promised land. When Eva was two years of age, her mother died, after which her grandmother raised her until she was sixteen.

Putting an ad in the Casper newspaper, Eva found work cooking in a restaurant in Moneta, Wyoming. later she cooked at the roundhouse in Casper for railway employees. From there she went to Salt Creek and Edgerton.

After their marriage they moved to Utah to live with Eva's father, who was a well driller. But the lure of Melvin's homestead in Wyoming beckoned them, so they moved back to it in 1928.

Melvin carried mail from Verse to Bill, starting in 1930 and later from Douglas to Verse carrying it for twelve years. Later Eva carried mail to Ross. They borrowed $692.00 in 1934 to buy a pickup to carry the mail. It was a debt that wasn't paid off until they sold the homestead back to the government in 1939.

The land was bought under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act which enabled the U.S. Government to buy back homesteads for $1.00 to $3.00 per acre. These lands are now a part of the Thunder Basin National Grassland.

From 1939 to 1942 they lived east of Douglas on the Spencer Place.

In 1942 they moved to Douglas buying a house on North Second Street. This house had belonged to Mrs. Smith and was previously used as a maternity hospital. At this time they also bought a small farm under the LaPrele Ditch just west of the old Frank Wheelock Ranch. This was sold in 1970 when Melvin and Eva retired.

Upon selling the ranch they moved to a small place east of Douglas. It was later to be the pilot ranch belonging to Mortons, Inc.

Melvin died on November 12, 1984. Eva still lives in her house on North Second Street.

Shaffer, Dr. Foster and Kathryn

Dr. Foster C. Shaffer was born Nov. 16, 1900 at Windber, Pennsylvania in the family home located at 818 Main Street. Foster's father, Josiah, was in the lumber business. Foster attended and graduated from Windber High School. After graduation he entered the University of Pittsburgh and the University of West Virginia. Foster graduated from Jefferson Medical School in Philadelphia in 1925; and in 1926 Dr. Shaffer took over the practice of Dr. L. W. Storey in Douglas, Wyoming.

Kathryn Jenne was born Dec. 23, 1902 at Douglas, Wyoming. Her father, Jacob, was associated with his brother, John Morton in the Morton-Jenne Sheep Company. Kathryn went to grade school in Douglas but when the family left cold Wyoming after Christmas for sunny California, Kathryn attended the Academy of Holy Name in Pomona, California. Later, Kathryn lived in Denver to attend Wollcott School for two years. She graduated from Douglas High School in 1922.

On May 26, 1931, Kathryn and Dr. Foster Shaffer were married, thereafter making their home at 115 North 6th in Douglas. Both Jacob and Anna Jenne passed away in 1935, and in memory of her mother, Kathryn gave new hymnals to the First Methodist Church where Anna had enjoyed many hours of churchwork. Later, Kathryn, a life member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association purchased the cedar logs to help build the Pioneer Association Museum in memory of Jacob and Anna Jenne, and herself and Dr. Shaffer. Foster and Kathryn had three children: Sara "Sally", John, and William. Foster was a busy man, but found time for his favorite activities. He also liked trap shooting, hunting, and fishing; many vacations were planned to include a lake or stream to fish in: Brooks Lake at Jackson, Wyoming; Lake Louise and Banff in Canada; Yellowstone and Glacier National Parks; and Albuquerque, New Mexico. Kathryn and Foster travelled to the World's Fair in Chicago and from there to Pennsylvania for a chance to meet and visit with the Shaffer family. He had a Life Membership in the Alumni Association of Jefferson Medical College, and was an active member of the Edwin Graham Pediatric Society, (secretary in 1925). Dr. Shaffer served as City Health Officer, Examining Physician for the Selective Service Board from 1942-1947, and was on the School Board and Douglas City Council for many years.

The first year they were married, the Shaffers purchased 80 acres of land in the Medicine Bow National Forest about 45 miles from Douglas. The cabin was the family's fishing retreat, and a place to relax and enjoy their friends. Kathryn continued to work in the church, was a Cub Scout Den Mother, Girl Scout Leader, and belonged to the Flying Needle Sewing Club.

Foster, with Drs. Gardner and Hinrichs had shared a dream of a clinic for Douglas to insure modern medical care for the community. This clinic was established the first week of August 1947, and to add to his happiness, Foster was notified of his membership in the American College of Surgeons in New York. This happy trip was not to be, for Foster was stricken with a heart attack and died August 10, 1947. He was buried with Masonic Services in Douglas, Wyoming. The community knew the loss of a dedicated worker.

In 1950 Kathryn married Earl Banks at the Episcopal Church in Cheyenne, Wyoming. Thereafter, the family made their home at 2622 Carey Ave. in the capital city and the children attended Cheyenne schools. Earl passed away in 1953 and is buried in Cheyenne. Her children were still small, so Kathryn asked for her former name, Shaffer, to be returned. The Jennes and Shaffers were loyal members of the Republican Party, and Kathryn belonged to both the National Federation of Republican Women and the Laramie County Women's Republican Party. Kathryn enjoyed her lovely home in Cheyenne filled with family heirlooms displayed for all to enjoy.

Kathryn Jenne Shaffer is presently living in Gering, Nebraska.

Sally, now making her home in Denver, Colorado, enjoys speech and drama work for relaxation, and in the winter, snow skiing.

John, M.D., married Dorothy L. Barhite June 21, 1959 and from 1960-64 attended Tulane University Medical School in New Orleans, Louisiana. Their children, Scott, Stacey Kay, and Stuart grew up in Mitchell, Nebraska. Dr. Shaffer entered general practice of medicine and surgery at Mitchell, Nebraska in July 1967.

Bill graduated from the University of Wyoming and enlisted in the U.S. Army as a Second Lieutenant. He married Karin Felt June 8, 1963 and lived in Germany for a time. Two girls, Kathryn and Carin were born there. Little Kathryn died at birth and is buried in the family plot at Douglas, Wyoming. Clarke William was born in Casper, Wyoming. After Karin and Bill were divorced, Bill continued his military career. He and his second wife, Mary (Beard) were married April 19, 1980 and once more, are stationed in Germany.

Shaffner, E. B.

Born in Iowa in 1864, E. B. Shaffner migrated to Chadron, Nebraska at the age of 20 years. Shortly thereafter, he located at Fort Fetterman, where he remained until the railroad was built. He was then engaged as a railway mail clerk, a position he held for six years.

Subsequently, he engaged in the meat business in Casper, Wyoming. While he resided there, he acted as town clerk, and was a charter member of the first volunteer fire department in that city. In 1902 he organized the Wyoming Telephone Company, serving as its manager and treasurer. He also served as county clerk of Natrona County in 1905-06.

After 1906 he moved to Glenrock where he made his home and where he was still associated with telephone interests.

Mr. Shaffner, a pioneer in the telephone industry in Wyoming, was a genial, friendly man, taking a lively interest in the public affairs of both Natrona and Converse Counties.

Shatto, Hilburn and Addie Family

My Grandfather, Hilburn Zitler Shatto (better known as Hill), was born December 10, 1867 in Audubon, Iowa. Hill came to Wyoming in 1894 residing at Kirtley, Wyoming, a small post office north of Lusk, Wyoming.

On April 8, 1902, Grandad filed on a homestead close to Kirtley. Here he farmed and proved up on the homestead alone until June 16, 1903, when he married Addie Church McDermott.

My grandmother came from Wisconsin as a young girl and resided for a while in what is now known as Esterbrook. Addie's dad worked in this area for a while.

Grandma was married earlier to a man named McDermott. He was related to Claude McDermott who worked in the Douglas Post Office for many years. She had one son, Clarence McDermott, better known around Douglas as Mac, and one daughter, Ruth McDermott. After marrying Hill they had one son, Earl, my father, and three daughters, Ruby, Ida and Amy.

My grandma and grandad lived on the homestead farming and ranching near Lusk till 1937. They sold the ranch to Berlie E. Hammond on Feb. 10, 1937, and moved to Douglas, Wyoming, where they purchased a home down close to the Platte River, where the fairgrounds are now. They resided here till Grandad passed away in Dec. 1950. Grandma then sold the place to the state for more fairgrounds and moved to Bonners Ferry, Idaho to live with her daughter, Ida. She passed away in Bonners Ferry in 1951.

My Dad, Earl Shatto, was born March 25, 1904, at Kirtley, Wyoming. He attended country school and ranched, farmed, trapped, carried the mail, and did whatever he could to earn a living. He also played a banjo for dances.

On September 9, 1924 Dad married my mother, the former Mildred L. Dye, from Steubenville, Ohio. Mom's dad was here working on the tank farm northwest of Douglas, Wyoming. Mom and Dad lived on the homestead near Lusk, Wyoming. While living there they had two daughters; Alta Bee, born Aug. 21, 1925, and Betty, born May 5, 1928. Shortly after Betty was born the folks moved to Douglas, where Dad took a job working for Doctor Hylton on his ranch up on LaPrele Creek, south of Douglas. Dad cowboied and worked mostly with the horses Doc ran. Mom cooked for Bill Cross for a couple of weeks then got on as a cook for Doc Hylton. The folks worked till early 1930 for Doc Hylton and then moved to Crawford, Nebraska, where Dad had taken a truck driving job. Earl B. Shatto was born in Crawford, Nebraska March 26, 1930.

My folks moved back to Lusk, Wyoming living on the homestead and in Lusk working at anything; just surviving the depression. I can remember Dad telling me about unloading a whole semi-load of sacked flour, and his pay was one sack for himself.

The folks had two more girls; Norma, born Sept. 25, 1931, and Joy, born Oct. 22, 1933. We all attended school in Lusk, Wyoming and then in 1937 we moved to Douglas, Wyoming.

Dad worked for T. Lee Reno on his ranch close to Douglas where part of the old airport is now, also for Lee at the gas company, where Lee was manager. Dad was a mechanic and worked for Clem Hern at the old Chevrolet Garage. The garage was located in the old brick building that used to be right across from the LaBonte Hotel to the south.

I remember one time a friend of mine was going to sell me a pair of used ice skates for $1.00. I stopped at the garage to ask Dad for the money and after a little coaxing he gave it to me and I was ever so happy; really not realizing how many groceries that would have bought for a family of seven. Dad was making $12.00 a week at the garage at this time.

Dad bought the Platte Valley Wrecking Yard where Slick's Pawn Shop is located now. Here he bought, traded, and sold used cars. He also did welding and mechanic work. Dad was also a government trapper for many years in Converse County helping the ranchers with their predatory problems. He was also a guard at the prisoner of war camp in the 1940s. He finally gave up running the wrecking yard and worked for Gerald Reeves at the Chevrolet Garage across from the Congregational Church. Dad sold cars for Gerald until retirement.

After a short retirement he passed away at the age of 59 in May 1963. Mom lives in Casper and is remarried. My sisters and I were all raised and educated in Douglas.

Alta Bee is married and living in Kaycee, Wyoming. She raised three sons; all residing in Wyoming. Betty is married and living in Riverton, Wyoming. She raised two daughters and one son, also all living in Wyoming. Norma married Warren George of the Wagonhound country, south of Douglas, and with their two sons live on a ranch at Bates Hole south of Casper, Wyoming. Joy married Clarence Ramseier and they live in Esterbrook where Grandma started out so many years ago. They raised two girls and one son, all living in Converse County.

I married Mildred Beaver in Nov. 1950 and we raised three sons. We bought the Burch Anderson place west of Douglas in 1965. Our three sons all live in Douglas, Wyoming. Gary now has a home where the old LaPrele Hall was and where many good dances and social times were common every Saturday night. Larry lives in Douglas and works for Phillips Petroleum Company. He is unmarried. Kerry works for Converse County Road and Bridge Dept. Kerry married the former Margo McMillen. They have one son, Shane Earl, born September 30, 1981. Gary married Janet Fogg from Cheyenne, Wyoming. They have two boys and one girl, Tanner Benjamin born September 14, 1978, Tanisha Crystal born August 11, 1980, and Tyson Dean born September 15, 1982.

I really do not know the exact reason Grandad came to Douglas. I am sure Dad did because of the job opportunities. One thing I am sure of is that I am very glad they did. It has been the highlight of my life to live and be part of this community. It also has been a perfect place to raise my family. If we are just a very small part of Converse County's history, I am overjoyed.

When Teschemacher and DeBillier folded up after the Johnson County War, Jim received the Duck Bar ranch house and headquarter buildings on the North Platte

Clay Shaw

River. To this he added a homestead of 160 acres and a desert claim of 80 acres.

He moved his family from the Laramie River ranch of his former employer's to his new ranch on the Platte.

Jim and his brother-in-law, Bill Dodson, ran cattle in New Mexico and North Dakota until 1907 when everything was sold except the ranch on the Platte River. He organized the Bridgers Ferry Ditch Company to get water on his lands.

He served as foreman of the Wyoming Stock Growers roundups from 1884 to 1887 and later served as its president in 1918 and 1919. He also served as a Converse County Commissioner in 1917 and 1918.

Mr. Shaw died on October 27, 1943, Elizabeth on August 16, 1929.

Irene married Harry Isaac and they lived on LaBonte Creek.

Clay never married. He ranched with his father and brother-in-law, Bill Gray, on the home place until his death.

Patti married William Gray in 1926. They had three sons: William "Billy", Robert "Bob", and Corky. The Grays operated the home place until Mr. Gray's death. At that time Billy took over the operation.

Billy married Ann Willox, daughter of Jim C. and Evaleen Willox. Their children are Penny (Moore), Andy and Bart. Bob married Betty Bruce, daughter of A. T. and Dora Bruce. They live on a ranch in Montana. Corky was killed in an automobile accident in 1951.

Peach married Gayle Neubauer, daughter of Hugo and Clara Neubauer, on July 3, 1933. Gayle had been the Home Extension Agent in Converse County. Peach served with the CCC for a time before becoming associated with the Coffee Brothers at Jay Em, Wyoming.

Paul married Alta Scott, daughter of Jeff and Iona Scott, in 1921. They had three children: Alta May (Greiman), Jim and Tom. The family lived various places in Platte and Converse Counties before moving to Cody, Wyoming. Later they moved to Montana where they acquired a ranch.

Dewey died as a young man in a drowning accident. He was crossing the Platte River on a horse when the river waters were high.

Ruth married Fred Hageman, son of Fred and Johanna Hageman, in 1926. Fred was born July 11, 1898 in Cumberland, Wisconsin. In 1911 Fred came to Wyoming homesteading near Flatop, north of Shawnee. He graduated from the Lincoln School of Business in Lincoln, Nebraska. Upon graduation he worked for the bank in Shawnee and then assumed the managership of the Shawnee Lumber Company. In 1936 he moved his family to the homestead.

Shelden, Clarence and Myrtle Family

Clarence Burr, born October 10, 1889, the sixth child of Reuben and Phoebe Shelden, was raised on an 80 acre farm in Ringgold County, Iowa. He married Pearl Culver, a red-head, in Iowa and they had two sons, Wilbur Paul "Bill" and Richard Burr "Dick." Pearl died in 1918 in her home in Iowa. Bill, four years old, stayed with his dad and Dick for two years then went to live with his grandparents, the Culvers.

In 1919 Burr married Myrtle Smith. They moved to Nebraska where Burr continued to work for the railroad.

1920 found Burr and Myrtle going by train to Wyoming to homestead. Burr's two brothers, Leonard and Roy, and one sister, Olive Van Pelt, were already living in Converse County. Burr filed on land west of Leonard and Roy; and northwest of Van Pelts. They were all within walking distance of each other, about five or six miles. Burr worked for the railroad two or three years before proving up on his homestead in 1926.

The family lived in the Cowger house, owned by Lee Fowler, a neighbor, while Burr built their home. The house was built of native lumber that was hauled in by team and wagon. Burr worked for Fowlers for one year.

In 1921 the first child, Viola Mae "Vi", was born and in the next 14 years seven more children were born: Clarence Leonard "Buck", Helen Alice, Iona Emma "Kelly", twins - Lawrence Albert "Pete" and Gladys Phoebe "Polly", Ruby Louise and Dorothy Elnora "Dot." They attended Meadowlark and Sunnyside Schools. Meadowlark was within walking distance. In 1935 the children went to Sunnyside and rode a bus to the community school. Mrs. LeVasseur was the teacher for the 21 children: Burr Sheldens, Will Reeds, Lee Fowlers, Raymond Bakers, John Numrichs, Harry McKinneys, and Powell-Goldsbys.

A team and wagon brought home the supplies bought in Douglas 35 miles south. Two children were allowed to go at one time. They received 10¢ which bought two ice cream cones. The family went to Dry Creek for dances, 4th of July celebrations and other social events.

Burr lived two hoops and a holler (about two miles) from Will Reed and about the same from Babe Reed. Violet and Buzz Reed (Babe's) would ride horseback with Vi and Buck to get the mail. Once Babe's watermelons weren't ripe and were forbidden to the kids until they were, but the Reed and Shelden children tried them anyway. They stole the 20 or so melons, ate heartily and soon got sick and regretted the deed.

Money was scarce and so were new shoes. Each child received one new pair every two years. Helen remembers when she was young and little, too little for chopping wood. She tried anyway, and the axe slipped, slicing off the toe of her new shoes and some toenail. She wasn't worried about her toe and all the blood but her new shoes!

When Pete and Polly were four or five they brought a rattlesnake into the house to show Myrtle. Her scream startled the kids and the rattler. He crawled out the door without any harm done except a good scare for Myrtle.

Burr owned horses for the wagon and one mare was particularly baulky. One time pulling hay she wouldn't move so he built a fire under the horse. She moved then — just far enough to burn part of the wagon.

Burr raised corn and grain, about 30 head of sheep and 40 cows. The drought started in 1933 and continued for four years. Russian thistles were put up for the cows because they were the only thing that grew.

With the drought came wind and dirt until even the fences were covered. If it wasn't tied down it was blown away including the top soil. The once farmable land was gone. In 1940 the government paid contractors to reseed the land. It's now used mostly for grazing and some hay land.

The drought brought many hardships and many homesteaders sold their land. Burr sold the farm to Lawrence Jacobs and in 1936 went to Missouri to find another farm. He bought a small place near Lebanon, Missouri. Myrtle and the younger children, Helen and Dot moved to Missouri. Bill and Vi were married and Buck, age 13, was working for Elmer Cowell.

They raised chickens on the Missouri farm. The family lived there almost two years. Burr worked in Wyoming building fences for the government. In 1938 the children, Helen, Kelly, Pete, Polly, and Ruby came back to Wyoming with Burr. Myrtle and Dot, the youngest moved to Omaha, where Myrtle died in 1952.

Burr and the children moved to the Six-Mile place north of Douglas. Burr farmed and worked for the government, two weeks at a time. The children went to the nearby school. The teacher was Gladys Hill.

Helen was 13 and thought she could take care of the other children. This made babysitters hard to find and keep. Mrs. Wheeler stayed longer than most. The children can remember eating beans, gravy and bread — bread and gravy and beans.

Buck lived and worked for the Cowells until he was 18. Pete had a horse named Monte. He rode to visit Buck about every week. In 1940 Kelly 14 and Polly 11, decided to visit Buck. They walked. It was 38 miles. The rain and wind came up and the girls made it to Fowlers, 30 miles. They didn't see Buck but did catch pneumonia.

In 1941 the family moved to town. Buck owned a place in Brownfield and the family lived there. Burr still worked for the government. He retired in 1944 due to illness. The children went to school in Douglas and graduated from Converse County High School.

In 1950 Burr moved into town. He spent time with many of his grandchildren. He lived in an apartment in Douglas until his death in July 1957.

Bill, the oldest son, worked around Douglas as a ranchhand for many years. He married Waunhita Patterson in 1934 in Douglas. They moved to Idaho in 1945 and raised their family there. They had three sons, Wilbur Eugene "Billy", Dennis Allen "Denny" and Allen Leroy "Alley". Bill lived in Idaho until his death in Nov. 1979. Waunhita died in Feb. 1983. The sons who work in the timber industry, live in St. Maries, Idaho with their families.

Dick lived with his grandparents, the Culvers, until grown, then held various jobs including flour milling. He died in 1954 in Omaha.

Viola married Dick Porter in 1937 in South Dakota. Dick worked on the Jacobs' ranch until 1941. Then they moved east to Nebraska. Vi had five children, Richard Dwayne, Marvin Lee, Sharon Ann, George Jr. and J. C. George Jr. died in June 1979. The other children and their families live in various parts of the United States. Vi and husband Jennis Wilson live in Omaha.

Buck worked on the Elmer Cowell ranch for six years and then went into the service. After four years in the marines he returned to Douglas. He worked as a ranchhand with Charles Pexton before he married Betty Jean Cole in Sept. 1950. Buck continued to work for the Pexton ranch until 1954.

They moved into Douglas to Buck's place in Brownfield Addition. Buck worked for Rissler & McMurry and Knisely Moore Construction Companies. He moved with the work while Betty and the children spent the winters in Douglas and the summers wherever Buck was.

Buck went to work for the Douglas Dairy in 1964 as a delivery route milkman. He worked for the dairy for two years. In 1971 he went to work for Converse County Road and Bridge. Buck still works for Converse County and he and Betty spend their spare time in their mountain cabin south of Douglas.

They had five children, Barbara Jean, Beverly Ann, Bonnie Leona, Buck Burr and Benjie Louise. Barbara and husband Elwood J. Axness and children live in Newcastle, Wyoming and have a trucking business. Beverly and husband Thomas L. Reed and children ranch north of Douglas on the Reed Ranch. Bonnie and Jesse P. Roediger live in Douglas and work part time on the Roediger ranch near Glendo, Wyoming. Bonnie works for Kansas-Nebraska Energy and Jesse for Menter Trucking. Buck B. and wife Sharon Ann (Cossart) own a trucking business and live in Newcastle. Benjie is in the U.S. Air Force. She is stationed in Rapid City, South Dakota, Ellsworth Air Force Base.

Helen worked as a waitress and held other jobs during high school. She lived with a schoolhood friend until she married Walter E. Metz in 1947. They moved to Midwest, Wyoming where Bud worked for Amoco Oil. Bud is a retired Oil Field Superintendent and they now live in Casper, Wyoming.

They had two children, Carol Jean and Darrell Dean. Carol and husband Don Jepsen and children live in Cody. Don works as loan supervisor at Provident Federal Savings and Loan. Darrell and wife Diana (Packard) and children live in Casper. Darrell works as an Engineer for Amoco Oil.

Kelly taught school at the Cross School for a while after graduation then married Clem Neopolitano in March 1945. He was a guard at the prisoner of war camp located in Douglas. They moved to New York and bought a small farm. Clem died in 1983. Kelly still lives on her farm in Troupsburg, New York.

Pete worked as a ranchhand on many of the ranches around Douglas; Elmer Cowell's, Charles Pexton's, Alexander's, and Natural Bridge Ranch. He married Shirley Dieleman in 1949 and continued as a ranchhand and at other available jobs. They had three children, John Lawrence, Judy Lee and Fay Elliot "Chip."

In 1956 Pete joined the U.S. Army. He was a 20-year career man. In 1967 he married Elaine Mary Weis of Iowa. He retired and moved to Elaine's family's farm in Earling, Iowa.

Polly graduated in 1949. She taught school in Elk Mountain, Wyoming for two years. She worked as a nurses aide in Omaha, Nebraska for awhile and visited sister Kelly in New York. She returned to Douglas and married William L. "Bill" Shaffer in Sept. 1954. They have a small farm west of Douglas. Polly works as a nurses aide at Michael Manor in Douglas.

They have two children, Mitchell Allen and William Arnold "Billy". Mitch and wife Linda (Comstock) and children live and work on the family farm. Billy lives at home and works part-time.

Ruby married Jack K. Metcalf in June 1949. Jack worked for Knisely Moore, a construction outfit. They moved where the company sent them. He started trucking for Burlington in 1951 and still drives.

They have three children, Terry Sue, Dona Louise and Jackie Kay. Terry and husband David Boman and children live in Laverne, Oklahoma where David is a welder. Dona and husband Randy Buckholz and children live in Brighton, Colorado. Randy is a machinist. Jackie and husband Dan R. Monroe and children live in Denver, Colorado. Dan is a fence contractor.

Dot lived with her mother, Myrtle until her marriage in July 1953 to Frank Barna. Her first trip to Wyoming to see her brothers and sisters was in 1966. Frank and Dot lived in Iowa where they both worked at various jobs. They now live in Red Oak, Iowa where Frank is self-employed as a paint contractor and Dot keeps busy doing whatever she sets her mind to.

They have two children, Michael Frank and Cheryl Susan "Cheri". Mike and wife Carmela (Dunn) and boys live in Red Oak. Mike works in radio and advertising. Cheri and husband Michael Patterson and children live in Red Oak. Mike is a building contractor.

Shelden, Leonard and Rosie

Rueben and Phoebe Shelden, the parents of 10 children, five boys and five girls, lived in Ringgold County, Iowa. They owned and farmed 80 acres which in that day was a big place. It wasn't big enough for five boys to make a living on so in 1917 Leonard, the second son, moved to Wyoming and in the following four years, two brothers Roy and Clarence Burr, and a sister, Olive Van Pelt, followed and settled in Converse County. The other children, Nora, Ezra, Anna, Winnifred (Winnie), Myra, and Guy stayed and settled in various parts of Iowa and Missouri. Ezra, oldest brother, retired to Douglas in 1950 and lived here until his death in 1954.

Wyoming with lots of space and your own land sounded good, so when Leonard was 33 he and his wife Rosie Shields came west. He filed for a homestead north of Douglas around what is now known as Shelden Draw. It was west of Bill, Wyoming in flat, choppy, hill country with sagebrush and cactus.

After filing, Leonard hunted a year. He was mostly a loner and loved to hunt with his hounds. With antelope and wild horses in abundance his hounds and family were fed well. He shared meat with his neighbors.

Leonard slowed down his hunting and trapping to prove up on his land. They had a frame house that Rosie kept spotlessly clean. "Clean enough to eat off the floor." She walked four miles to get the mail once a week. He raised corn, about 50 head of cows, a few chickens and a couple of pigs.

One son, Clarence Faye was born and raised on the homestead. He married and homesteaded on Skunk Creek, six miles from home. They moved to Douglas in 1937, when the drought moved many families. The farm was sold to Lawrence Jacobs. Faye went to work for the C-Bee's, a navy construction outfit during the war. He moved around and the family lost track of him.

In 1938 Leonard leased his homestead and then later sold it to Tillards who used it for sheep grazing. In town he became a chicken farmer with 100 hens for layers and more for fryers.

All through his life hunting was an important part of him. He loved to hunt antelope. Even when he had a hard time seeing to read and write, his nephew, Buck, took him for his last antelope hunt in October of 1969.

In the 40's he was divorced and later married Irene, a white Russian from the Phillipines. Irene died in Douglas in 1967. Leonard retired when he was 70 and lived in Douglas on Brownfield Road until his death in December of 1969.

Shelden, Roy and Pearl

Wyoming, and a chance to own land, drew many people from the East. Roy, fourth son of Reuben and Phoebe Sheldon of Ringgold County, Iowa came to Converse County in 1919. A brother, Leonard had a homestead about 30 miles north of Douglas. Roy filed about five miles east of him. It was four or five miles west of the present day Highway 59.

Roy brought his wife, Pearl and two sons, Earl and Harold. One son, Paul was born on the homestead. Roy had sold real estate in Iowa before he moved. Before proving up on his land in 1922 he sold real estate here.

He started farming and soon had one of the biggest farms around. Their home was fancy for that country with a porch with columns and two stories. They also had a two story barn. He raised different kinds of grain and a few cows. Roy sold insurance on the side. He also owned a threshing machine and did custom threshing.

The sons grew up and left home to do other things. With no available help Roy sold his farm to the government in 1936. He moved to town and became a real estate and insurance broker.

He was known for having an eye for women. Even until his death at the age of 87 he fancied the fair sex.

He divorced and married Emily Baker in 1949. With Emily's children they moved to California. Later Emily and the children moved back to Wyoming.

Roy continued his real estate and insurance until he retired in 1969. He lived in California until 1978. During his retirement he traveled and visited many of his nieces and nephews. At the time of his death he was living with a niece in Malvern, Iowa. He died May 18, 1979 at Clarinda, Iowa.

Shepard, Tom and Sarah

Thomas Walter Shepard was born on March 16, 1874 in Ash City, North Carolina to Leander J. and Margaret Shepard.

At the age of five, Tom, as he was better known, along with his parents and brothers Luther, Millard and Charles moved to Elk Creek, Tennessee and in 1883 to Plainville, Kansas.

On September 5, 1896, Tom came to Wyoming to work for the Macfarlane Ranch on Horseshoe Creek near Glendo.

Sarah Gordon became his bride on May 8, 1900. Sarah was born in Ballymena, Ireland on February 1, 1875, the daughter of Dave and Isabell Gordon.

The Shepards lived for awhile on North Horseshoe Creek after their marriage before moving in 1910 to a ranch southwest in the mountains. The ranch was purchased from Arthur Kenyon who had bought it from John Newell in 1897.

Charlie Shepard, Tom's brother, homesteaded south of the new ranch. A spring flowing ice cold water was close to Charlie's buildings. It is still known as the Shepard Spring.

Three children were born while the family lived on North Hoseshoe; Vivian Isabell in 1901, Helen in 1902, and Harry in 1906.

School for the Shepard and the William Brose family was held for six months a year. The Brose children stayed with the Shepard family for three months and the Shepard children stayed with the Brose family for three months. The teacher would also live where the children were. This arrangement prevented the children from having to ride back and forth the seven miles between places.

Among the teachers were Mrs. Slim Heldt and Edith Mae Mitchell. Edith Mae was later married to Sarah's brother, Dave Gordon, Jr.

In the fall of 1915 Tom and Charlie Shepard sold their places to John Pexton. Tom and his family moved to Mitchell, Nebraska where they bought an irrigated farm. High school was also available for the children.

On June 7, 1924 Vivian became Mrs. George LeRoy Baird in Mitchell and on June 14, 1924 Helen became the bride of Carl P. Gill in Greeley, Colorado. Harry was never married.

Tom died in 1952, Sarah in 1944, Harry in 1968 and Vivian in 1982.

Shippen, John and Clarissa Family

I am Ruth Shippen Mason and this is the story of my family.

John Norris Shippen, my grandfather, son of William and Rebecca Shippen was born November 18, 1850 in Wabash County, Indiana.

After the 13 colonies were formed, the Shippen brothers, of whom my great grandfather William Shippen was one, settled in the Colony of Pennsylvania. These folks were rovers, never tarrying long in one place. Moving west they lived in Indiana, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska.

John Norris Shippen and Clarissa Jane Mickey, born January 29, 1856, Louisa County, Iowa, were married June 29, 1876 in Taylor County, Conway, Iowa. They were the parents of eight children as follows: Walter Norris Shippen, born April 6, 1877, Taylor County, Iowa; Jessie Alice Shippen, born May 14, 1881, Nemaha County, Nebraska, died in November 1968 (she had been a resident of Manville 80 years); Mamie Bloom Shippen, born September 5, 1883, Gage County, Iowa, died February 3, 1980; Cody Daniel Shippen, born November 11, 1886, Smith County, Kansas, died March 19, 1927; Nellie Shippen and Della Shippen, twins, born January 10, 1889, Converse County, Wyoming, died February 8, 1889; Ina Sticia Shippen, born December 23, 1889, Converse County, Wyoming, died January 13, 1956; and Albert Lee Shippen, born March 3, 1892, Converse County, Wyoming, died May 14, 1949.

In 1887, Newt Allen, a brother-in-law of Grandpa Shippen's, being a wounded Civil War veteran, was given a homestead in Converse County, Wyoming plus a $10.00 per month pension. Converse County included all of that area which is now Niobrara County. Niobrara County became a county in 1911. He sent word back to his relatives in Kansas that there was plenty of work, especially carpenter work in the new towns of Lusk, Douglas and Manville.

Cody and Daisy Shippen on their homestead, 1911, with their daughter, Ruth.

Cody Shippen in Lost Springs.

In Kansas, Grandpa Shippen was a carpenter and a horse trader owning a number of good horses.

During the summer of 1887 a spell of hot dry winds hit Kansas burning all vegetation to a crisp. Also, at this time, there was an epidemic of glanders disease in all of the horses. This is a fatal and dreadfully contagious disease. The authorities killed practically all of the horses and Grandpa lost all of his.

Newt Maples, a bachelor friend and neighbor of Grandpa's, had an old gray mare which had escaped the glanders disease. Grandpa furnished a one-horse cart and Newt furnished the mare. They loaded their combined carpenter tools and a few necessities and started west, planning to find work along the way. Soon, they ran out of food and money, so they started selling their tools a piece at a time until they were gone; then they sold the cart and the harness. They took turns riding the mare but finally sold her. When they reached Fremont, Nebraska there was a train; they sneaked on it and rode the rails to Manville, Wyoming.

Grandpa took a preemption claim about six miles south of Manville. He did carpenter work and at every available time worked at building a half log and half dug-out one room house to bring his family to.

The John Shippen family arrived in Manville in June 1888.

Grandma Shippen's parents, Joseph Mickey and Mary Ann Van Horn Mickey lived at Kimball, Nebraska. She and the children (Walter, Jessie, Mamie and Cody) came by the Union Pacific Railroad to their home where they were met by Grandpa.

Grandpa had borrowed a team and wagon from a neighbor; and they finished their trip to Manville via wagon and moved into their new one room house.

While living here a neighbor had given Grandma Shippen and son, Walter, a pair of jennies and $5.00 for harvesting a field of potatoes. These Jennies became a part of the family, affording the whole family a living source of enjoyment and pleasure but were also indispensable for their transportation and for being their beasts of burden.

Ina Sticia Shippen was born here in this log-sod house, December 23, 1889. When she was three weeks old the neighbors invited the family over for dinner. During their absence the house caught on fire. Everything was lost except the clothes they were wearing and the team and wagon.

Then they moved to Manville, Wyoming where they lived about three years. All of the time Grandpa found plenty of work at his carpenter's trade.

Grandpa relinquished his preemption claim and filed on a homestead on Muddy Creek about twelve miles south and west of Manville. This place later became a part of the Lloyd Smith ranch.

Grandpa always continued his carpentry and when sheep moved into the area, he built shearing pens and ran a shearing crew, consisting of his two sons, Walter and Cody, plus nephews in the Manville area. Young boys started shearing sheep when they were so small they couldn't wrestle their own sheep. Grandpa would throw the sheep, tie it down and then the shearing was done.

Of course, Grandma Shippen cooked for the shearing crew most of the time. One day Grandma was running low on supplies so she sent daughter Jessie with a team and buggy to Manville for them. Baby sister Ina went along. The team was a pair of mares with colts tagging along. On the return trip home a gray wolf attacked one of the colts. Aunt Jessie had a buggy whip with which she would whip the mares to make them go faster and also whip at the wolf to try to scare him away. Needless to say, groceries were scattered all along the way and the buggy whip was pretty well whipped out. One colt "Frank" was torn in the back muscle of his hind leg but the girls did stay in the buggy and made it home. Frank's wounds healed and he was not crippled. He lived to be 19 years old and always carried those scars.

While living on the Muddy, the Sioux Indians from the Rosebud Indian Reservation in South Dakota made an annual trip from South Dakota to the Big Horn Mountains in the spring to hunt and fish through the summer returning to the reservation in the fall. They always camped near Grandpa's place and Old Man Afraid of His Horses always came to have dinner with the family.

During one of these visits, Grandma was churning butter. When she finished, she gave each Indian a cup of buttermilk to drink. The Indians coughed and sputtered around, telling how terrible it tasted. The Shippen children watched all of this and giggled amongst themselves for just the night before they had visited the Indian's camp and watched the squaws frying rattlesnake in a skillet for supper. The old snake would fry for a while then the reflex action of the muscles would cause the pieces of meat to jump up and hit the lid. One time this caused the lid to pop up and a piece of snake landed in the ashes. A squaw just picked it up, brushed the ashes off, put it back in the skillet, and continued cooking supper. The children just couldn't understand how anyone could eat rattlesnake meat but still dislike to drink good fresh buttermilk.

Grandpa and Grandma lived on the Muddy until 1903. They moved to Buffalo, Wyoming where they lived with their son, Albert Shippen, who was operating a sawmill. Grandpa became a partner in this business. Later on they moved to Kaycee, Wyoming.

Grandma Shippen died near Kaycee, June 11, 1914 and was brought to Manville for burial.

Grandpa Shippen and son, Albert, continued to operate the sawmill until the time of Grandpa's death. He died February 27, 192__ of a heart attack. He also was buried in Manville.

My daddy, Cody Daniel Shippen, married my mother, Daisy Howard, daughter of Robert and Prudence Fenwick Howard, on December 8, 1909 in the Methodist Church in Manville. Mother was born on July 10, 1888 in Cimarron, Kansas. They had three children; Ruth Violet, born June 15, 1911, Converse County, Russell Raymond Shippen, born May 26, 1917, Converse County and Rena Rebecca Shippen, born July 12, 1921, Converse County, died June 9, 1935.

My parents moved to Daddy's homestead, three miles northeast of Lost Springs in 1910.

They raised cattle and horses and Daddy did some farming. Daddy was a bronc buster and a cowboy. He was not afraid of any horse, no matter how bad a reputation the horse had. His delight was to ride in all of the rodeos, Fourth of July celebrations, or local get-togethers that the local neighborhood would have. He also broke horses for anyone, taking any material thing in payment for his efforts, many times he received no pay, just the satisfaction he gained.

I have an antique "Regulator Clock" with date hand, which Daddy took as payment for breaking a horse for a neighbor.

Each spring, Daddy would go to shear sheep for the entire sheep shearing season. One of my vivid memories is of Daddy, with Mother's help, loading his bedroll and the sheep shearing equipment plus a suitcase containing clothes on a very unwilling pack horse. His shearing equipment consisted of several shearing blades, a can of machine oil and a hootenanny a device for setting the shape of the blades. He received board and nine cents per head for shearing.

We children all learned to ride a horse, milk a cow, help brand calves and clean out barns long before we ever attended school. We always owned our own saddle horse, saddle, bridle, spurs, the whole bit. One of the first Christmas presents we received after learning to walk was a new saddle.

Our lives on the homestead were full of hardships, but we were always happy, not realizing there was another way of life. We burned wood for heat and cooking, many times burning sagebrush. In the fall, a slack time of labor on the farm, we would go to the timber with a team and wagon to get a huge load of wood. We would take our lunch. We children had great fun on these trips and looked forward to the next one.

Mother was a remarkable woman. She raised a huge garden every year and canned all the produce as we never had even an ice box. She raised many baby chicks each year by setting hens on the eggs produced at the ranch. Mother made her own soap with lye, water and the cracklings we had when we butchered a pig or two each year. And in our lives we knew nothing of baker's bread or pasteries. Mother did it all.

All of our traveling was done in the family buggy with horses. I can still feel the warmth of rocks and/or sad-irons heated on the wood stove, wrapped in paper and put under mounds of mother's homemade quilts in the back of the buggy where brother Russell and I rode. On one trip, in the black of night, Daddy called back to us, "Are you kids awake?" I answered but Russell never uttered a sound. Daddy called again but not answer, so I said, "I'll see if he is asleep, I'll stick my finger in his eyes to see if they're open." He didn't approve of this, but he did answer.

In May 1924, Daddy and Mother moved to Mother's old childhood home on Lost Creek. Here life was easier and we were closer to town. The folks could raise more cattle and horses and there was no farming to do. The place was sub-irrigated along Lost Creek, affording tons of native hay.

Daddy died in March of 1927. Mother continued to live at this ranch home, owning her own range cattle, and milking cows until about 1940. She then sold her cattle, took in stock to pasture and hired the hay put up for shares until her health dictated she moved to an easier life and closer to a doctor. She moved to Douglas, Wyoming in 1951.

In May 1972 she suffered a severe stroke which left her entire right side paralyzed permanently. She died September 9, 1973. She and Daddy are both at rest in the Douglas cemetery.

Shonsey, Mike

Michael O'Shaughnessy, the son of Irish immigrant parents, was born in Montreal, Canada in 1863. When Mike was three years old, the family moved to Ohio. At the age of 12, Mike was employed by a cattle feeder, T. B. Hord, and when he reached his teens, he came west to work on Hord's 77 Ranch, located north of Manville, Wyoming. By error or intent, the spelling of the name, O'Shaughnessy was altered first to Shaughnessy, later to Shaunsey, and still later to Shonsey.

The range cattle business was Mike's natural element. He held positions such as foreman, cowhand, and wagon boss for several outfits, namely the CY, Guthrie and Oskamp's Trowel outfit (so-called because their brand resembled a brick layer's trowel), and the Western Union Beef Company which had acquired the EK Ranch in Johnson County. At one time, Mike owned ten shares of stock valued at $100 per share in the Guthrie and Oskamp Cattle Company. Shonsey also won the World's Calf Roping Championship at Frontier Days during the 1890's.

His homestead was on the West Fork of LaBonte Creek.

Mike had ridden the range for years. He had seen all kinds of rustling and watched cattle thefts increase, all the way from dry-gulching the cows to stealing their unbranded calves. He had seen brands cut out of the hides of live animals, and young cattle run off to isolated places to be hidden until they reached a saleable age, about six months or so. Mike could not stand to witness these depredations at the expense of his employers, and further, he felt that the cattlemen were being accused of ruthlessness and of charging innocent men with stealing cattle unjustly. He was convinced that the cattlemen wanted only to claim the animals which they owned, and that the ownership could be determined by the brands.

Shonsey was the foreman of the EK Ranch at the time of the "Invasion". His employer was George A. Baxter, manager of the Western Union Beef Company. Mike had been considered throughout his life as a "law and order" man. Because this was his disposition, and because Baxter was one of the prime movers in the invasion, it seemed inevitable that Shonsey would become involved. He seems, actually, to have played the key role in the whole unfortunate affair, the Johnson County War.

As in all conflicts, the right and the wrong of the Johnson County War depends upon the point of view taken. It was but an interlude between the era of public domain and private ownership, and a result of several things. The cattle barons and kings had operated freely on the open range for some years. Cattle stealing was always a worry. The transition from open range to a more complex and more diversified economy was taking place. Homesteaders with plows and fences were moving in, and herders with their bands of sheep were arriving to compete with the cattle for the pasture. And so the cattlemen, with their large herds and crews of cowhands were plagued by nesters, settlers, Grangers and rustlers. With the ever increasing numbers of cattle grazing on the range, it had become overstocked and the grass was short. Then nature took a hand, dealing harshly with the cattlemen. The winter of 1886-87 was devastating. The cattle, already existing on short grass during the dry summer of 1886, went into the winter in poor flesh. Blizzard upon blizzard followed by bitter cold took its toll, and by spring of 1887, the draws and coulees were full of dead animals. The days of the cattle barons were numbered as their herds were decimated. The numbers of cattle declined from 9,000,000 head in 1886 to 3,000,000 head by 1895. Those of the cattlemen who were able to remain in business in spite of their heavy losses and high interest costs, were able to count their herds easily, and they were ready to fight to protect their remaining cattle. In many cases, they hired stock detectives to track down those cowhands and nesters who were branding maverick cattle, and those thieves who were altering brands on beeves. Many cattlemen were driven out of business.

The changing times brought seasonal unemployment to more and more cowpunchers as the big ranchers tried to economize. During the winter months, many cowboys were unemployed, but the ranchers allowed them to live in the isolated line camps on their property. There the cowhands could make a little money by branding mavericks with the brands of their former employers who would pay from three to five dollars for each animal. Then the cowboy learned that they could make more money branding the mavericks for themselves — so the practice, which the cattlemen felt was rustling, began.

Large ranchers blacklisted those cowhands who branded mavericks for themselves and barred them from the Stock Growers Association roundups. The Territorial Legislature created a Board of Livestock Commissioners in 1888 made up of Association members. However, the functions of the board were no longer those of the Cattlemen's Association. The Board was placed in control of the roundups, the sale of unbranded animals and brand inspection. Brand inspectors were instructed to seize cattle wearing the brands of the blacklisted men, sell the cattle, and turn the receipts to the Board. This ruling drove small ranchers and farmers together in sympathy, and sometimes to actual cooperation with men who were openly rustling cattle.

In the spring of 1888, Mike Shonsey was in charge of the Platte River roundup. He was employed at the time as foreman for the CY Cattle Ranch. He had been instructed to blotch all brands belonging to the men on the blacklist if they were not present at the roundup, and to put Carey's brand on the cattle in addition to the Association brand, "M" on the animal's neck. Some cattle belonging to Mike Champion were in the roundup herd. Champion came to Shonsey and asked permission to cut out his cattle. Shonsey, seeming amiable, suggested that Champion wait for a day or so till the herd was worked, and then come pick up his cattle. Champion agreed, and departed. Immediately thereafter, Shonsey ordered his hands to cut out the Champion cattle and run them off. When Champion returned to claim his stock and found what had happened, he and Shonsey had a heated argument ending just short of physical violence.

As time passed, Shonsey apparently forgave Champion for he seemed friendly enough, but he nursed his hate and anger towards Champion. The owners of small herds continued to be treated unfairly by the cattlemen. In 1891, a new list of "black-balled" stock owners was made out by the Northern Wyoming Protection Association. This list included nearly every man who owned a hoof of stock, excepting the cattle barons, of course. Proceeds from cattle shipped by the black-listed men was held by the Stock Commission. They were told that when they furnished proof of ownership they would receive their money, but though the men furnished proof of ownership, they received no payment. The cattlemen made plans to murder the small stockholders so that there would be no one to claim the money or to prosecute the cattlemen. Some of the prominent cattlemen organized themselves into a group called the Regulators, or Invaders, and sought to take the law into their own hands. There were about forty-two men in this group, one of which was Mike Shonsey. The group hired 25 professional killers to accompany them into Buffalo, Wyoming, then considered the rustler's capitol.

The first name on the list of black-balled men was that of Nate Champion, supposed leader of the rustlers. In the fall of 1891, Mike Shonsey, in the company of five or six other men crawled to Champion's door and tried to kill him, but the attempt failed. Later Shonsey sent word to Champion to come to the EK Ranch to stay if he was afraid to stay alone at the KC Ranch. Champion was suspicious of Shonsey, and declined the invitation. As a result of this incident, and many others, everyone carried firearms. The cowmen then decided that it would be simpler to ambush the black-listed men, rather than to visit their cabins. Several murders were done in this manner, suspects were arrested, and hearings were held but there were no convictions.

It was Mike Shonsey who provided the information which led to the murders of Nate Champion and Nick Ray. He rode to the Tisdale Ranch where the Invaders were gathered and informed the leaders of the Invasion of their whereabouts. The Invaders concluded that they must not fail to seize the opportunity to begin their work, and voted to proceed to the KC to deal with Champion and Ray. The success of their campaign depended upon speed and the element of surprise, but the decision to attend to the "little" job of disposing of Champion resulted in a delay of their plans to attack the town of Buffalo. They lost valuable time and much of the "surprise".

In April of 1892, the Invaders laid siege to the building on the KC where Nick Ray and Nate Champion lived. Ray was shot soon after the fight began, but Nate Champion held off the Invaders for about a day and a half. Finally, the Invaders fired the building, and Champion was shot as he ran out of the burning cabin. A man, by the name of Terrance Smith, heard the firing and hastened to Buffalo to inform the sheriff. The Invaders left the KC and went to the TA Ranch to plan their next move.

The townspeople of Buffalo were indignant over the murders, even those persons who resented the settlers. They began to champion the cause of the rustlers, since it was evident that soon they must face the task of protecting their own property from lawlessness. The sheriff, Red Angus, formed a large posse and rode to the TA where a fierce battle ensued, beginning on Monday, April 11 and lasting until Wednesday morning when the troops arrived from Ft. McKinney. The Invaders, upon seeing the troops, surrendered to Sheriff Angus. Shortly afterwards, the prisoners were taken by the soldiers and marched to Ft. McKinney to be confined there for five days, and then to be taken under armed guard to Ft. Fetterman. From Fetterman, the Invaders were taken to Ft. Russell to await trial. The troops were not friendly to the Invaders, affording them bare civility.

Two days after the surrender at the TA Ranch, the funerals of Champion and Ray took place in Buffalo. The funeral was so large that it had to be held in a store building. The remains were escorted to the cemetery by a hundred well-armed, mounted men.

Shonsey's services with the Western Union Beef Company were terminated while he and the other members of the Invasion were detained at Ft. Russell. Eventually, all of the Invaders were released, and Mike Shonsey returned to work for Hord as the foreman of the Lance Creek Cattle Company on the 77 Ranch.

The tragedy of this whole incident was that the wrong people were on the blacklist of the cattlemen. Because of the hard feelings between good men, the thieves took advantage of the situation and aligned themselves with the small ranchers, and thus, by association, many settlers and ex-cowboys blackened their own names. In addition, most of the big cattlemen did not live in Johnson County, and did not understand the true situation.

Mike Shonsey denied having killed Nate Champion at the KC. He admitted, however, that he had fired a shot simultaneously with another man, and that either bullet could have taken Nate's life. Dudley Champion, Nate's brother, was convinced that Shonsey had killed his brother, and made threats that he would kill Mike Shonsey on sight. Whereas Nate seemed to enjoy a reputation of being a fair and honest man, such was not the case with Dudley. The week prior to his confrontation with Mike, he had been surprised by two cowhands sulking around the Ogalalla's headquarters ranch located on a branch of Antelope Creek in northwest Converse County. Under questioning, Champion freely admitted that he was there for the purpose of killing Billy Irvine, one of the Invaders.

A trail herd from Throckmorton, Texas had arrived on the 77 range, and the wagon boss, David D. Mathew, had come to the headquarters to ask permission to stay the night. About four o'clock, Mathew and Shonsey were riding toward the wagon boss' camp, when they sighted three riders coming towards them. Two of the riders were employees of Mathew and the third was Dudley Champion. Dud recognized Shonsey immediately, but Shonsey, facing the sun, failed to recognize Champion. However, he did note that the stranger had removed his revolver from its holster and stuck it under his belt for quick action. Shonsey prudently made similar preparations.

The two men rode to within ten feet of one another, and exchanged greetings. Then Shonsey told Champion that he understood that Champion had threatened to kill him on first sight, and drew his revolver. Champion shouted for Mike to hold up, denying that he had said any such thing. Mike lowered his gun for an instant, and it appeared that he was not going to shoot, but Champion slipped his hand to his revolver, and as he whipped it out, Mike fired first. As Champion started to fall from his horse, Shonsey fired twice more. Champion, then on the ground, held his gun with both hands and tried to shoot. Shonsey dismounted and pumped another shot into the wounded Champion, remounted and rode away.

Mathew went to Champion's side. Champion, mortally wounded, said, "Take my six-shooter and tell the boys that Mike Shonsey shot me. I can't cock it; I can't cock it".

Subsequently the coroner's jury went to the scene of the shooting, and they examined Champion's revolver. It was found to be full of mud. Because of this, the gun could not be cocked, nor would the cylinder revolve. Apparently, while Dud was crawling around in the willows and sagebrush in the creek bottom adjacent to the Ogalalla intending to kill Billy Irvine, his revolver had become fouled with mud. Though Shonsey beat him to the draw, it is very probable that Dud would have succeeded in killing Mike had not his revolver misfired.

When Mike reached the 77 after his meeting with Dud, he changed horses, and his clothes and rode to Douglas that same night, a distance of approximately sixty miles. He gave himself up to Harve Allen, deputy sheriff, shortly after midnight. Mike was cleared of murder charges, however, since it was determined to be a case of self-defense.

Eventually, Mike Shonsey moved his family to Central City, Nebraska where he was employed as foreman of the Wells and Hord Company Feed Yards. At a later date, he purchased Wells' interest, and the firm name was changed to Hord and Shonsey. Finally, Mike bought out Hord's interest and ran the business under his own name. Mike died in Nebraska at the age of ninety-one in 1954.

Sims, Albert N. and Della Family

Albert N. "Bert" Sims was born on April 18, 1866 in Wyoming, Illinois. It was in 1884, at the age of 18, that he came west to South Dakota and then to western Nebraska a year later. In 1891 he spent some time in Manville, Wyoming working with his brother, Louis "Lou" Sims who had a ranch southeast of Manville called the "Old Woods Ranch" where he raised cattle. Bert Sims also worked at a ranch located on Walker Creek.

Two other brothers of Albert Sims were also located around Manville at this time. They were Millard Filmore "Fil" Sims and Ansel "Bay" Sims. The brothers owned a livery barn and a small store in Manville and they also owned sheep.

Albert Sims went back to Wilour, Nebraska where he married Della M. Rogers on June 15, 1898 and they made their home there for a short time. On October 8, 1901 their first child was born, a son named Cecil.

The Albert Sims family moved to Manville the first of the year of 1902. Cecil was three or four months old. Albert Sims helped the minister who was known as "Preacher Hughes" build the Methodist Church in Manville. "Preacher Hughes" had a son named Otis Hughes. After the church was completed the Albert Sims family and the Hughes family made a trip to California by wagon. Here the Sims family stayed for three or four years. Cecil can remember being in San Francisco immediately after the big earthquake of 1906 and visiting his mother's sister and her family who had lost their home in the disaster and were living in a tent.

While living in Santa Cruz, California, two more children were born to Albert and Della Sims. Edna Elizabeth was born on November 5, 1906 and Gladys Mae was born on October 29, 1908.

In about 1909 the Sims family moved back to Manville where Lou Sims was in the horse business. Lou and a second cousin, Roy (Peg) Baughn, trailed a rather large bunch of Indian ponies from the Rosebud Indian Reservation to Lou's ranch where a lot of them were broken to ride and were sold. The Sims also raised their own horses and had some thoroughbred stallions.

Because of the hard winters, Albert Sims got a place on Twenty Mile Creek which he thought would be a better place to winter stock, which it was. However, the first winter there was a bad one. Everything snowed under, sagebrush and all. There was no chance of hauling feed from the railroad and the family ran out of some staple foods. Fil Sims made snowshoes and walked five miles down the creek to the nearest ranch, the old Bob Spaugh place which is now owned by Bob Manning. Ray Valentine was there managing sheep for himself and Ras Baughn. When they finally got a load of shelled corn through on a bobsled, it was too late. They lost about half of their sheep from which they derived 50¢ a pelt.

The first living quarters at the Twenty Mile Ranch was a little log cabin, a sheep wagon and two tents. With Fil's help, Albert Sims built a frame house which still remains as the living quarters for the ranch. Bay Sims eventually sold out his interests and went to California. Fil Sims stayed at the ranch for a while. They owned sheep. Later on, he and his son-in-law, Oscar Bartholome, owned a hardware store in Manville for a number of years.

Lou Sims moved his family near Woonsocket, South Dakota where another brother, John Sims was located. Albert Sims and his family stayed in Newport, Nebraska for about three years. While living there another daughter, Delberta, was born on October 24, 1914. They left Newport coming back to Manville where they stayed for a while before going back to the ranch on Twenty Mile. They repaired the old fences and built new ones. Albert bought more land which had to be fenced. More cattle were purchased and later another bunch of sheep was added, which were kept for a number of years. The coyotes eventually got so bad they sold all of the sheep and ran only cattle.

In about 1916, Cecil Sims and Leo Eusler worked for Ad Spaugh, lambing at the TJ Ranch where Dutch Shorty was foreman. The following year they worked for the government poisoning prairie dogs. Leo later joined the army and was sent overseas.

Edna Sims and her husband, Beryl Fullerton, worked at the Twenty Mile Ranch for eight years. They had an interest in the cattle with Albert and Cecil. There was a very dry year in 1934 and what grass grew, the grasshoppers ate. Beryl and Edna took their share of the stock over to the Bill Sherman place. Here, there was some hay and green grass around the creek that the grasshoppers hadn't eaten. Cecil and his dad sold most of their cattle to the government for almost nothing. They kept 27 head of dry cows that Cecil was able to winter on sagebrush and soap weed with about five pounds of cotton seed cake per head per day. Most of these cows calved the next spring and more cattle was bought to build up the herd again. At this time Gladys's husband, Henry (Hank) Amend, also bought some cattle which Albert and Cecil ran for him. Hank was working in Lance Creek in the oil fields at the time.

About 1938, Albert and Della Sims bought a house in Lusk where they made their home. After Albert's retirement, due to poor health, Cecil continued to take care of their cattle and Hank's. By this time Cecil owned the old Charlie Sherman place two and one half miles northwest of Manville. He summered on this place and wintered on the Card ranch at Lost Springs which Hank Amend had purchased. Albert Sims was able to lease the Twenty Mile Ranch for a very good price.

Albert Sims passed away in Lusk on October 12, 1943. His widow, Della, stayed in Lusk for a while before renting her house and spending the summers at Lost Springs with her daughter, Gladys, and the winters in Madera, California with her daughter, Delberta Simpson. In 1952 Della Sims sold the Twenty Mile Ranch to her granddaughter and her husband, Mae Ann Manning and Robert Manning. Della Sims passed away in 1961.

Cecil was married to Pauline Whiteaker of Flint, Michigan in 1942. They lived on Cecil's own place year around as Hank Amend had quit the oil field work and was living on his own ranch. To the Sherman place, Cecil added the Theron Grant place, the adjoining Day place and the Lincoln 80 acres. This gave him a total of 1680 acres on which he was able to run about 100 cows and calves, usually selling the calves in the fall. Cecil put up all the hay he could and had to build sheds and wind breaks for the cattle. In the severe winter of 1948-49 he never lost one head of cattle. There was no chance of hauling the hay out from the stacks so he had to tease the cattle with a fork full of hay to a stack, then pitch the hay out from the stack as far as he could so they could all get some. His hardest job was getting the cattle to water as he was watering from a windmill and tank. There was a huge snow drift, a quarter of a mile long, which passed the tank, and the snow kept blowing over the tank making it difficult to keep a hole open for drinking. The snow and ice kept building up at the side of the tank and he had to dig down to the tank. In spite of his efforts to keep the tank shoveled out, the cattle would end up kneeling to drink. The wind never let up for weeks and it was a long winter.

In 1955, Pauline Sims' parents needed her help because of their health. Cecil sold the cattle, hay and some equipment. He leased the place and moved his family to Michigan where he bought and farmed 120 acres, where they are still living. Cecil later sold his Manville place in 1961 to A.A. (Andy) Nelson who lives there now.

Cecil and Pauline had three children; Marilyn Jean, born July 27, 1944, Zaidee Ellen, born July 30, 1947 and Arthur Ray, born on June 11, 1949. All of the children were born in Lusk and attended the Manville Grade School.

Edna Sims was married to Beryl Fullerton on June 19, 1927 at Douglas. They were the parents of three children. One son, Dale, on March 8, 1930, and two daughters, Della Mae (Coon), February 21, 1935 and Donna Kay Fullerton on January 21, 1947. Beryl passed away in 1965.

Gladys Sims married Henry Amend May 31, 1930 at Douglas, Wyoming. They were the parents of Mae Ann (Manning) September 2, 1932, Marvin on December 22, 1941 and Mary (Engebretsen) on June 20, 1945. Gladys passed away in May 1963 and Henry in December 1970. Marvin was killed in an auto accident in 1970.

Delberta Sims married Roe Simpson June 22, 1938. They moved to Madera, California in January 1946 where they are still living. Roe worked as a carpenter and spent many years associated with the County Superintendent of Schools. Delberta worked for the high school as the pastry cook. They are both retired now. They are the parents of two children, a son, Albert, born on May 13, 1941 and a daughter, Joan, on March 19, 1945.

Sims, Susan Hardcastle Family

Susan Hardcastle was born in Texas on June 29, 1854. She married Dr. James H. Sims of Harwood, Texas. They had seven children; Stella (b. 1874), Arthur (b. 1877), Claudia (b. 1879), James (b. 1880), Albert (b. 1882), Chester (b. 1884) and Victoria (b. 1886).

Dr. Sims passed away in 1894 at Harwood, Texas. Susan lived in Texas until April 23, 1901 when she moved to Douglas with all of her family with the exception of James. Mrs. Sims died on May 15, 1937 in Douglas.

Stella married Mr. Everton and lived most of her life in Lawton, Oklahoma and Cheyenne, Wyoming. They had two daughters, Vivian and Hazel. She was also married to Arthur B. Dussair. Stella died on November 12, 1941.

Victoria Sims

Arthur worked as a young man in Georgia as a telegrapher. He, along with his brothers, Chester and Albert, worked for the Mountain Valley Sheep Company after they came to Wyoming in 1901. The Mountain Valley Sheep Company was owned in 1908 by O.P. Witt, George F. Goodwin and George Cross. In 1908 the brothers bought Witt and associates out. They ran the outfit until 1912 when blizzards and loss of stock forced them out of business. Each of the brothers then went into the ranching business on their own having homesteads in Downey Park and a few miles northeast of Douglas. Arthur married Margaret Numrich, daughter of John H. and Gertrude Numrich, on December 9, 1931. They had two sons, Arthur M. Jr. and Allen Lee and one daughter, Margaret (Bluze). Arthur died on February 11, 1957 and Margaret in April 1969.

Claudia married Walter J. Dalton on March 11, 1911. Walter was born in Chicago, Illinois in 1887. In 1915 they opened the W. J. Dalton Co. Store on Center Street just west of the Metcalf Mercantile (the Golden Rule is there now.) Louis Bynum bought them out in 1932, and they moved to Cheyenne where Walter was employed with the State of Wyoming in the state sales tax system until his retirement in 1942. Walter served as a member of the Wyoming House of Representatives. He was also interested in the oil leasing business. Upon their retirement they moved to St. Petersburg, Florida where Walter died in 1961. Claudia moved back to Douglas and lived at 339 North Fourth Street. She died in June 1965.

James worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad as a brakeman and conductor when he was a young man. He came to Wyoming in 1917 and joined his brothers in the ranching business. Later he sold out his interest to them and returned to work for the railroad. Edna Musgrove of Memphis, Tennessee became his wife in 1917. In 1953 he moved back to Douglas where he resided until his death on June 4, 1957.

Albert became associated with A. D. and Jennie Chamberlin after he and his brothers dissolved their partnership. It was an association that was to continue until Jennie's death in 1949. In Albert's later years, he became associated with Lyle and Elizabeth Hildebrand. L. C. Bishop, a lifelong friend, and Albert along with Lyle were great history buffs. Together they made many treks over the Oregon Trail. Another history buff from Massachusetts, Pete LaBonte, was also another great friend of Albert's. Albert died on October 1, 1969.

Chester was also involved with his brothers in the ranching business after he came to Wyoming. He married Nellie Prill, daughter of Otto G. and Elizabeth Prill, in Laramie on June 9, 1911. Nellie was born in Glidden, Iowa and attended schools there. Later she went to the Valparaiso University. Her father was a farmer and store owner. Nellie also homesteaded in Downey Park. Prill Draw in the park is named after her.

Two sons, George and Arthur C., were born to them. Art is married to the former Hope Ireland. They have one daughter, Judy (Hageman). Art runs cattle and sheep on most of the Sims Brothers land today. George lives in Cheyenne where he is retired from the Wyoming National Guard. He served many years as the state selective service director. George is married to the former Mary Ann Klett. They have two daughters, Carol Ann and Barbara, and one son, Jon.

Nellie died in 1959 and Chester in 1964.

Victoria, the youngest of the Sims children, went to school for a while in Douglas and later attended the Little Child of Jesus Convent in Cheyenne. Several other young ladies also attended the convent, among them was Mary Cross who was to be Victoria's lifelong friend. Victoria taught school in the country for a time after her graduation from high school. She was also a bookkeeper for the Mountain Valley Sheep Co. and worked for the U.S. Post Office in Douglas before her marriage in 1914 to Kirkwood Pritchard. Kirkwood was a civil engineering student at Colorado College in Colorado Springs, Colorado at the time. After their marriage they moved to the east where he worked for a big construction company. They had five children, three boys and two girls. One of the girls, Carolyn V. Tobin, lives in Sidney, Nebraska.

Slaughter, Joseph and Emma

There are so many memories and so many things to tell about it is hard to know where to start. Dad (Joseph R.) was born in Albany, Ohio in February 1860, and in the summer of that year his father, John Slaughter, who was working in Colorado, died. His mother, Mary Durant Slaughter, brought her six-month-old son, Joseph Russell, to Colorado in search of her husband's grave, which she was unable to find. Dad said the story was that his father was buried some place along Cherry Creek.

Dad lived in Colorado and went to school, then when he was about eighteen years old he came to Wyoming. . .to Cheyenne. . .where his grandfather, John Slaughter was Territorial Librarian and Ex-Officio Supt. of Public Instruction. He had been a Justice of the Peace and held some other political offices prior to his appointment as librarian. It was in Cheyenne at this time that Dad bought his first spurs, in 1878 and they are my treasured possessions.

He worked for some of the large cattle outfits in several counties for about ten years. In 1891 or 1892 he homesteaded on what was later the Lower VR Ranch or the old Hemingway Place.

Some of the friends Dad made during his "cowboy" days were his lifelong friends and neighbors. Bill Fenex and Jap Sumner would get together with Dad and tell some of the tallest tales. . .and laugh and slap their thighs. . .the three of them in the autumn of their lives reminding each other of the different "times". . .one time when they had really "tied one on" and had gone to the LaBonte Hotel to sleep it off. . .the next morning when Jap woke up and looked outside he ran over to Dad and shook him awake and yelled "Joe, get up, get up. . .my God we slept all winter". . .one of Wyoming's chinook winds had come up in the night and melted all the snow. I can hear them laughing yet. . .and I never did get to hear the last of the story about the night they were sitting around the campfire and roped the bear. . .I sure wish tape recorders had been around then.

While Dad lived on his homestead, he and John Higgins got acquainted and got interested in the sheep industry. Later he organized the Slaughter Patzold Sheep Company which was one of the biggest outfits in the state. It was located north of Glenrock and was called "The 55". Their brand was registered 25. Dad had a big barn which was just back of the Lincoln Building, and I remember when the horses and the big high wagons would come to town for provisions, enough to last the whole winter, they were stabled there. One year I remember them telling about a really bad spring snow-storm and how many lambs and sheep were lost, piled up in snowdrifts...one outfit lost 80,000???

Dad married Emma L. Kimball, daughter of Col. E. H. Kimball, in 1901. He built a house on Main Street in Glenrock and it was the first house to have hot water heat. I guess everyone came around to see how it worked.

Dad served in the Seventh State Legislature in 1903. He was the first Mayor of Glenrock and served two terms, 1909 and 1910. He was also Vice President of the Glenrock State Bank.

In 1906 Mom and Dad adopted a son, Russell C., then three years later I, J.R., was born and in 1922 my younger brother Lyle K. was born. We all lived and grew up in Glenrock.

We had one of the first cars in Glenrock, a 1913 Buick. I remember in later years the people that had cars would load up family or friends and we would all go to Douglas to the fair. It was an all-day journey.

One year Mom and Dad, Russell and myself, Jap Sumner and wife Lizzie and daughter Ozra and Bill Fenex and wife Sabra and kids, Floyd, Guy and Gladys, all drove to California. It took us two weeks to get there and we camped out at night. We all thought it was the most wonderful trip even though there were just trails and it was mighty slow going.

When I was about twelve years old we went to California and Dad bought a grocery store in Long Beach. We were there about two years and then we came back home to Wyoming. Dad sold the big house and we moved to the little house across from the Glenrock Garage and at the top of the hill to Happy Hollow. Dad traded some land he owned down in the bend of the river (The Pacific Power Plant is located there now) for the little house.

The old ice house was just below the hill, and they cut ice from Deer Creek and stored it there for the town use. We used to skate on Deer Creek from the ice house clear to the VR Ranch. Seemed like all of the kids in town skated there in the winter and went swimming in the summer.

Mom and Dad loved to play cards. They played five hundred and then later bridge, two or three times a week. Jap Sumner and his wife Lizzie (who was Mom's sister) were some of their favorite partners. Mom and Aunt Lizzie belonged to a card group called the O.T. (old timers)

Club. The women had been friends before they were all married and they had some great times. Once they went up to a cabin in Boxelder Canyon to play bridge and spend the night. Uncle Allan Kimball, Bill Woods and somebody else dressed up in outlandish clothes and went up to the cabin and about scared the women to death. . . I don't know if they ever went on another overnight bridge trip.

I think the saddest and yet the proudest day of Mom's life was when my brother Lyle went into the service in the navy. For her part of the "war effort she corresponded with thirty-two of the Glenrock service men and some of their buddies. She didn't just write one page but she wrote page after page of little things that happened and things she thought they would be interested in. It was very difficult for her to write and I remember watching her many times. . . her straight pen held between her middle finger and her index finger. . . after the war, when the men came home each and every one came to tell her how much it meant to hear from home and how much they appreciated what she had done.

During the war years, 1940s, Dad applied for and got the janitor job at the Glenrock Grade School. I don't think he expected he would get it, as he was in his eighties then but he wanted to do something and he needed the money. The kids loved and respected him. It was always "Mr. Slaughter, can I clean the blackboards?" or, "Mr Slaughter, can I carry the water upstairs?" (At that time all of the water used for cleaning the floors and blackboards had to be carried in pails up the flights of stairs). He stopped many a fight and made the kids shake hands. . . I think sometimes they just picked a fight so Dad would step in. An article published in the local newspaper entitled "An Unsung Hero" was a fine tribute to him.

Dad was a loyal Mason and was made a Master Mason in Casper in 1902. He was Master of Glenrock Lodge No. 22 A.F. & A.M. in 1907. Dad died in the Douglas Hospital in 1948, not too many miles from Fort Fetterman where he had come as a young boy. It was his Glenrock Lodge that conducted the services when he died. A fitting tribute to his funeral, two young friends, one the grandson of his old "cowboy" buddy, Bill Fenex, sang "Home on the Range."

Slaymaker, Samuel

Sam Slaymaker was born in Pennsylvania and, when a mere boy, enlisted and was severely wounded in the advance on Atlanta under General Sherman. At the close of the Civil War he re-enlisted and served through various campaigns against the Indians in Montana and what was then Dakota, being later stationed at Fort Fetterman. He was a quartermaster sergeant while stationed at Fort Fetterman.

After his discharge from the army, Mr. Slaymaker established a road ranch on upper LaPrele Creek, along the road to Rock Creek and Medicine Bow. He later moved his popular stage coach service to Buckshot above Spring Canyon on the same road and his former location became the Andrew Jackson Ranch, now a part of Rory Cross' ranch.

It was during this time that he was married to Ellen

Samuel Slaymaker

Howard, daughter of James Andrew and Anna Howard, on March 23, 1872. Ellen was born in Greenfield, Pennsylvania on January 8, 1850.

He served as Justice of Peace for Albany County in the LaPrele area. Later, when Converse County was formed in 1889, he served as its first Assessor. He was re-elected and was to serve later as one of the first Clerks of County Court. In January 1906 he was appointed receiver of the U.S. Land Office.

Sam and Ellen were divorced and for a second wife he chose Flora Hobbs. Death came to Mr. Slaymaker on December 28, 1912.

Slichter, Charles and Florence

In 1884, John and Sarah Slichter, with their children Jesse, Ida and Charles, took the train to Cheyenne, Wyoming from Ringgold County, Iowa. They travelled with team and wagon from Cheyenne to Boxelder Creek, near the Platte River in Converse County. The family settled here for awhile, then moved a few miles east, where they established a hay ranch, with horses and cattle.

Young Charley became a cowboy, and representative for the ranch, on the open range. Bedroll, slicker, grub-wagon, remuda and roundup time was the way of life for the cowboy of that era.

Later, Charley proved up on a homestead in the vicinity of Inez, the home ranch. He later took out an "additional" which included the rocky Pine Ridge.

At a 4th of July celebration (the 4th being the big celebration of the year until the state fair was held at Douglas). Charley's sister, Ida, introduced him to

Charles and Florence Slichter 1955

Florence Young, daughter of Robert and Ellen Young. He was in a spring wagon with a broken leg! Over a year later, October 31, 1905, they were married — a long engagement, as Charley was out on the open range most of the time. When they established their home on Charley's homestead, they had sheep. Living there in winter, and summering on open range, where laundry was dried on the sagebrush. Their first son died in infancy and was buried at Fort Fetterman. His grave is still there.

During this period of time, it was common practice for the Sioux Indians from the South Dakota reservations to visit the Arapahoes and Shoshones, and each summer would find them camped across the Platte River, where they rested their horses and replenished their food supplies by hunting. The Slichter family always tried to maintain friendly relationships with the bands of roving Indians.

Game was in abundance, and when they wanted sage chicken for dinner, Florence would walk out on the prairie to the watering holes with her quirt, and kill the young birds by snapping off their heads.

In 1910, their son Marvin was born; and in 1911 Charley's father died, at which time Charley, Florence and Marvin moved to Inez to assist Sarah in running the ranch. In 1915, a daughter, Edna Elizabeth, also died in infancy, and is buried in Douglas. Daughter Hazel and son Frank were born while Charley and Florence lived at Inez. Both Frank and Charley were stricken with smallpox, as vaccination was not too successful at that time. Red posters were placed on the homes where there was smallpox, and many people died during the epidemic.

Charley's brother, Jesse, owned the Overland Agency in Douglas, so when Charley and Florence purchased their first car, it was an Overland. It was an elegant car, with isinglass side curtains which snapped on in winter and off in summer. A buffalo robe was always carried in the back seat for the children to snuggle under. They made several long trips in the Overland, including Yellowstone Park and Frontier Days in Cheyenne — both journeys of some distance in those days!

Inez ranch was located on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad and the "river road", which was a forerunner of Highway 20. Gypsies sometimes travelled the road, and the children were then kept close to the house, fearful of being kidnapped.

The Inez coal mine and Black Diamond mine were south of the ranch, and Sarah, Charley and Florence helped many miners, who were down on their luck, by offering shelter and food.

About this time, Charley studied surveying, and purchased his own surveying instruments, which he used for many years.

In the spring of 1921, Charley and Florence and their children moved to their homestead, and began the construction of new buildings. In May of 1922, a late spring blizzard buried many livestock under high drifts, freezing them in their tracks. Their livestock loss was tremendous, and even the children's pet horse died. Logs were hauled from Cold Springs with which to build the house and corrals, and the new house was furnished in time for the arrival of their third son, Charles Henry on April 23, 1925.

With Marvin's help, Charley worked a coal mine west of the home place, often receiving payment for coal in garden produce. They also worked horses when Highway 20 was under construction. Sheep became the main stock on the ranch, and son Frank's registered 4-H sheep improved the herd.

Both Charley and Florence were avid readers, and subscribed for many decades to the Omaha Daily News, which came on the train. Since cattle were always shipped to Omaha, the newspaper was scanned very carefully for the livestock market news. Also of great interest was the price of furs, since all of the boys trapped for extra income.

Charley served as county commissioner for two terms. One of his duties was to be in attendance when a county patient had surgery.

After Florence and Henry died, Florence on July 9, 1958 and Henry on Dec. 23, 1964, Charley sold the ranch and moved to Douglas, where he died in Sept. 1967. All are buried in the family plot in the Douglas cemetery.

Charley and Florence saw many changes in their lifetime. They saw Wyoming progress from a territory to a state; they saw the big ranches on the sparsely open range give way to fences, highways and smaller ranches. Days and weeks spent in the saddle, riding the range, gave way to the more sedate duties of running a sheep ranch and raising a family. May we all remember, with gratitude, this pioneer family who gave us much of our heritage.

Slichter, John and Sarah Family

As it has been 75 years this month since I, Jesse Slichter, arrived on the Platte River in Wyoming, near Fort Fetterman, I will attempt to put down some of the experiences of my life.

I was born on a farm near Creston, Ringgold County, Iowa, on June 18, 1878, the oldest son of John and Sarah Slichter. Next was Ida, December 9, 1879; Charles, April 7, 1882; Lily Ellen, July 31, 1886 and died December 14, 1887; an adopted sister, Mary, born March 12, 1895, her mother having died six weeks later and adopted April 15, 1896. Sister Ida died January 1947 leaving three of us to answer roll call this date.

My father, a lover of horses and very tired of the Iowa mud, wanted more room to raise a lot of horses, decided to move to Wyoming. So in the fall of 1883 he came to Cheyenne where his brother-in-law, Wm. Ford, was hustling luggage for the Union Pacific Railroad. They both, along with a surveyor, came to Fort Fetterman where they located claims seven miles up the North Platte River.

During the claiming out of the claims, father had his first misfortune to lose $300 from his shirt pocket; in walking so much his suspender buckle wore a hole through his shirt. As he retraced most of his tracks after he was always of the opinion that the surveyor picked it up, as the surveyor always followed up.

After returning home, Father arranged for selling out and early in 1884 held a public auction and sold all he could not load up. One thing I remember now of this sale was when my long chain that I had hung between two elm trees for a swing was offered for sale I had a hard cry over it. Father hitched two large mares and a large bay stallion to the wagon with plow tools and household goods and started alone for Wyoming, after having put Mother and us three on the railroad for Cheyenne, where we stayed with Wm. Ford, Mother's brother, until Father arrived.

After a short stay in Cheyenne, the Ford family in one wagon and our family in another, started the long trip overland following the Cheyenne-Buffalo stage route via Rock River through Downey Park and Spring Canyon. My only memories of this trip was the layover while one mare had a colt and the stallion took her place at the wagon. Later a wagon wheel ran over the colt's front foot and mother often had to walk up the hill while the colt had to ride the rest of the way. He, or Ned, as we called him, grew up to be a very useful horse and we used him to break others for 16 years afterwards, but he was always lame as his hoof was split and he had to wear one shoe.

We pitched the tents one-quarter mile apart on the separate claims along the river. Ours was too close and I remember the move back 300 yards when the river about cut us off from the mainland. The Platte has never reached the high mark made in May 1884.

About the first job was to get wild meat and to start hauling logs from the mountains to build houses for the coming winter. Each house had one large room 16 x 24 feet with one window and door. The logs were pinned with wooden pegs, the dirt roof let in some rain at times, but was a great change from the tent that had to be put up sometimes in a hard wind and most always after night.

Father and Uncle Will went to the Fort once a week for the mail and Mother and Aunt Rose cried until they got back, fearful that the cowboys might shoot them.

Having the houses pretty well in shape for our first winter in Wyoming, the time came to get the needed groceries on hand. The start was made to market which was 200 miles away, by Father and Uncle Will, over the same road to Cheyenne. They had fairly good luck on the first trip and were gone only about 15 days.

The second trip, in the following spring, six months later, was not so good and nearly cost them their lives, being caught in a big blizzard half way on the open prairie. They had no wood and finally cut a telegraph pole down to save themselves. I can well remember my aunt coming across the sagebrush carrying her boy in the snow two feet or better deep as she was afraid to stay alone any longer.

The spring of 1885 proved to be the starting point for Father in fulfilling his desire to start in the horse business. A large herd of Texas dogies came up the trail from the south and Father held them up while he got possession of seven mares, weight about 750 to 800 pounds, and all different colors, pintos, roans, grays and buckskins.

This was the foundation where he started breeding up a large herd of horses by using good stallions, until we had 500 head of fine horses running at large on the north side of the Platte.

As Fort Fetterman was vacated by the soldiers in 1883, it was taken over by the cowboys and was a very wild place. During the next four years, with someone dying with his boots on most every week, Mother and Aunt Rose were very nervous when any cowboys showed up. They soon learned that the cowboys would do anything for us, especially a woman, which was illustrated one summer day when the Platte was very high and two of them swam their horses across up to the house and asked for a drink of water, "Just to see and talk to a woman, they risked getting drowned."

Game of all kinds was very plentiful as I remember the time of late fall of 1885 when some 300 antelope came down to drink just across the river. I followed Father down and hid in the sagebrush on our side and when all were drinking he opened up with the 45-70 Marlin, dropping three. When we waded across, one had a broken back and was crying, so was I, and I got a good tanning for telling Father he was mean and cruel to cut its throat.

Mother always jerked lots of meat to chew on through the winter and Father tanned the hides to make us lots of pants, shirts and gloves. My first long pair of pants was made of buckskin with a fringe down the side and I tried them out in water, hung them up on my bed post to dry, and the next morning I had knee pants and a good cry too.

The summers of 1885-1886 saw a large number of southern Longhorn cattle being driven up and turned loose in Wyoming, Montana and South Dakota. We had a very hard winter of 1885-1886 with lots of snow and a lot of cattle died and the carcasses were everywhere along the river.

The spring and summer of 1886 saw the Fremont Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad arrive at the town of Douglas and Father made his last trip to Cheyenne to fill up the larder for winter. Also coal was found on Deer Creek 15 miles west and a little town started up. Father started to haul produce and other things from the end of the railroad at Douglas to the new town of Glenrock.

Also, a school was to open up in the fall of 1886 and as Ida and I would be seven and eight years old, it was time to get some book learning. It was decided that we move to Glenrock while father hauled stock for the two stores. Ida and I went to our first school in a one room log house with about 20 other kids. Mrs. Birney was our teacher. The highlight of my memory was the escape from drowning. Along with Charlie Rate, a boy my age, we set sail on an old log raft across some back water that the river made. Other boys used to cross on it, but it upset half way with us and when our mothers got through with us afterwards we almost wished we had drowned.

During the summer of 1887 we moved back on Box Elder Creek where Father built a nice one and one half story frame house and built a ditch from the creek. The second year we had six acres of oats that father cut with a hand cradle and bound in bundles by hand. This was our first grain in Wyoming.

A man by the name of Vosburg opened up a small coal mine one half mile from our log cabin, which in later years grew to quite a coal camp. A school started in the fall of 1888, so we had a school to go up to the fifth grade. I was needed for work and this finished my school days. Our first teacher at Inez was Mrs. Roberts. Inez was the name given the coal camp and Mother was elected the first Post Master. She held this post until it was abandoned in about 1920.

This coal camp flourished for about ten years and was a very lively place with 80 miners employed at its peak. They had weekly dances on Saturday night that usually broke up in a fight because there was always plenty of liquor to do the fighting. The company mine closed down in about 1920.

Father opened up a small mine for coal to use among the ranches that had grown up along the creeks. He employed eight to ten men in the winter. We had some shacks built for the miners to live in and I was batching among them while hauling coal.

I went through a very sad experience for me as we only had one man and wife, a young couple with a very nice little boy of two years. We all became very attached to him and he took a bad cold. I took my turn of sitting up with him nights. He grew worse and no doctor was available. We sent the father, with two men, on a hand car to Glenrock for medicine. At 3:00 a.m. the little fellow passed away and at daybreak the father was coming up the hill with a man on either side, too drunk to stand up alone. He had the medicine that was not needed then. I helped to make his little box and laid him to rest in the Fort Fetterman graveyard. The couple then left and was never heard from again.

We moved to our place on Box Elder Creek after leaving Glenrock in the spring of 1887. We had easy access to water for irrigation and the whole creek had been reopened for filing. This creek had all been filed on by Carey Brothers in 1883 by dummy entry men under the Desert Act.

The law at that time stated that all desert land was land void of trees and water and all the claims that had trees and water were canceled by the U.S. Land Office in 1886. So Father, along with others, filed on 160 acres, built a nice house, barn and a ditch on the land from the creek.

This encroachment on the land did not set well with the Carey interests, so when the squatters on this land were away, the foreman would visit the place with wagons and men and dump everything off in the creek as they did our neighbor, John Morton.

I well remember the day our time came. Two wagons and four men and the foreman, Edward David, drove into the yard. Now, it so happened that two brothers of Mother's had just arrived from Iowa and one was inside with Mother and the other with Father on the woodpile. David went to the door and Mother held it shut with the aid of the brother. He ordered the wagons backed to the door but the men refused on finding a woman and children. Lots of angry words were exchanged before they left. A short time later, after the brothers had gone home, Father and Mother were arrested and ordered to appear in Glenrock, twelve miles away. Father's lawyer advised him to leave us three kids at home alone. The same wagons appeared, but when they saw us playing in the yard, they got scared away. The judge dismissed the case. I was told later that two men were guarding us kids from the creek bank 200 yards away with Winchesters. The next year, J. M. Carey got in the U.S. Senate and got a bill enacted to get rights to the creek and notified us to vacate. So three year's work was lost causing misfortune number two.

Misfortune number three came about this way, one years later. After Father lost the creek ranch he decided to take a ditch out of the creek for the home on the river and sent for a surveyor. Mr. Bliss, of Cheyenne, arrived in due time and completed the job. Father had been working on it for a year and one day received a letter from Mr. Bliss stating that in checking his notes he found out he had the lower end of the ditch to be twelve feet higher than the headgate. The year's work was lost. This ditch proved to be a very large undertaking with only broncs to work and no money to hire any help. I quit school during the fifth grade at age twelve. I went behind a scraper with a pair of broncs. It took us seven years to finish and another five before we got water through. A story got around the neighborhood that John Slichter was off his rocker to start such a big job as it turned out to be.

We moved all the buildings, etc. back to the river ranch and started to clear off the sagebrush to raise hay and oats. We had eight to twelve cows to milk and were riding for horses a radius of 25 miles north of the river.

Our first Justice of the Peace at Inez was a colored man by the name of William. He and his wife homesteaded 160 acres, all across the river, except ten acres joining us on the north. He built a board shack on this ten acres. The wife was a great help at times for Mother and when anyone was sick around camp. Father got the place when they left the country.

The railroad built up the Platte River through our ranch to Glenrock in 1887 and started to build quite a large coal mining camp.

Upon becoming of age in 1899, I filed upon a 160 acre homestead joining Father's lands that he had filed on in 1883, also on a 160 acre desert claim and a little later bought 120 acres of the old coal land on the south, giving me about 440 acres of Wyoming lands, most of it good for stock grazing only.

Along about this time I met a little school teacher by the name of Jennie Austin, whose parents moved on the E. S. Ranch five miles southwest on Little Box Elder. On November 18, 1902 we were married and the following spring we started hauling lumber from the mountains to build a little three room cottage on my homestead.

My first real sorrow came when in March 1911, Father passed away and all the cares of the ranch fell on me. We had always worked closely together and I always looked to him for advice in everything I did. His passing away was very hard.

Our first child, Fern, was born in our little cottage at Inez in 1904. I forgot to mention that our little coal camp and Post Office at Inez got its name from DeForest Richards' daughter, Inez, he being one of the main promoters to get the coal mine started and also the first banker in the new town of Douglas in 1886.

Fern is now, and has for the past 35 years, lived at Everett, Washington.

Our second child, Ruth, was born in 1907 and for the past 20 years has lived in the Canal Zone. The third child, our only boy, John, was born in 1912 and lives in Wenatchee, Washington. He has lived there for 29 years. Eva, our last child was born in 1918 and lives in Worland.

In 1913 we left the ranch and moved to Douglas. I took a flyer in the garage and auto business and helped build the two story brick building across from the LaBonte Hotel. The First World War broke me and broke up the garage venture.

I went into politics in 1915 and was elected County Assessor for four years, from 1915 through 1918.

In 1925 I went to work for the Woodruff Seed Company for 30 years. Now, as I look back on my life, I think my mistake was made when I left the ranch. Work in the raising of livestock, plowing and tilling the soil, with all the freedom you have, while the work was hard and the hours were long made me very happy, and I was healthy.

Our little family was finally broken up when on February 6, 1948, my wife, Jennie, passed on to her reward.

After living alone and trying to batch and eat restaurant hash for two and one half years. On August 5, 1950 I talked Myrtle Jones into sharing my lot, the balance of my allotted time here on earth.

Jesse E. Slichter

October 4, 1962 began the same as any other day for Jesse. He got up at the usual time, spent the morning at Charlie's place and after lunch went to town. Later in the afternoon he chopped wood for the stove because winter was approaching. Becoming tired, he sat on his bench to rest and that is where Myrtle found him in the evening. His brother Masons laid him to rest beside his mother on October 8, 1962.

Sarah moved to Douglas where she died on July 19, 1934. Charles, Florence (Young) and his family moved to their own place a few miles south. Mary married Joe Reynolds and they moved to a ranch north of Douglas. Mary is still on her ranch. Ida, her husband, John Burks, and family moved to Inez in 1926. The ranch is now owned by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Burks.

Slonaker, Clarence and Belle Family

Believing that better business opportunities were offered in Wyoming, Clarence brought his family to Wyoming in 1902. He was born in New Kingston, Pennsylvania April 1, 1867, the son of Mr. and Mrs. John Parker Slonaker.

Clarence was married to Belle Chambers November 1891 in Pennsylvania. Belle, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Urie Chambers was born July 28, 1867 in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania.

A daughter, Helen Oliver, was born May 29, 1893. Three sons, Thomas Urie (July 11, 1894), Oliver Chambers (June 28, 1897), and John Parker (January 20, 1900). They were born in Carlisle, Pennsylvania before the family left the East.

Upon arriving in Wyoming, Clarence worked for the George W. Metcalf Mercantile Store, and a few years later in partnership with Ollie Chambers, brother of his wife, Belle. They operated a transfer line. He was elected County Treasurer of Converse County, serving in this capacity during the years 1909-1912.

Shortly after their arrival in Wyoming, Clarence and Belle had two daughters. Thelma, born August 17, 1903, and Victoria Jane, born June 7, 1906 and sons Charles BoDine, born March 29, 1905, and Clarence Arthur, Jr., March 14, 1908.

In 1910 Clarence purchased and took over the business of the Douglas Transfer and Fuel Company which was merged with his other transfer business under the name C. A. Slonaker. Later when son Thomas Urie "Dutch" came into the business, it was known as C. A. Slonaker and Son. John and Clarence A. "Tye" also joined the business later with John running the Conoco service station and Tye in the transfer and ice business. Dutch had ranching interests which included the "Six Mile Ranch" and later the Ben Wheelock Ranch on Lower LaPrele. The Wheelock place was sold later to Niels Rasmussen who in turn sold to Elmer Cowell.

Clarence A. Sr. died May 25, 1929 and Belle died January 25, 1952 in Douglas.

Helen married LeRoy Moore, October 11, 1919 and died August 15, 1961. They had five sons (see Moore).

John married Juanita Wilson January 17, 1922 and died November 28, 1958. An only son, Parker, was killed by an auto on March 27, 1949.

Urie married Elizabeth "Betty" White in 1921 and

C. A. Slonaker Ice Delivery Wagon.

died August 22, 1968. An only son, James, was killed in an airplane accident September 27, 1947.

Clarence A. married Florence Brady December 31, 1931 and died June 29, 1964. An only daughter, Sue (Mulvaney), lives in Cheyenne.

Oliver died August 20, 1957; Charles on January 2, 1938, and Victoria on January 28, 1958.

Dutch told the story of when he was courting his future wife-to-be, Betty White. Betty, the daughter of "Cap" White lived on upper Boxelder Creek, which was quite a winter country. Dutch had just purchased a new car and during one of his first dating trips he drove it to the Whites. A big snow storm came up while he was there and Dutch had to leave the new car at the Whites all winter until the snow melted in the spring.

Smith, Charles and Laura Family

In 1885 three of Nelson and Melissa Frye Smith's sons and their families loaded their wagons and left Washington County, Iowa for Box Elder Park, Wyoming.

My great grandfather, Charles Smith, was one of the brothers. He was born June 20, 1859 in Iowa City, Iowa. On March 10, 1881 he was married in Mt. Ayer, Iowa to Laura Lininger, daughter of Pete and Margaret Cochran Lininger. Four years later this young couple and their two children, Roy, age three, and Hallie, age one, joined Charles' brothers, Ed and Martin, and started their trip by covered wagon west across the plains from Brighton, Iowa to Box Elder Park, Wyoming. Ed and Martin were both married and each had a small child to care for on the journey. The Smiths all homesteaded and made their homes in Converse County.

Some of the stories my grandmother, Hallie, told were of the good times when all the neighbors from miles around would meet in someone's barn for a dance. Travel was slow and time consuming so when they got together they had supper, a midnight supper and also stayed for breakfast. For one occasion, Hallie told of helping her mother make five cakes, twelve pies and lots of baked bread. The Smiths also helped provide the music. Ed Smith played the fiddle and once won the fiddlers contest in Douglas. Charles played the fife and had a fife and drum corps. The fife was handed down to him by an uncle from Civil War days.

When they first arrived they built a one room house and lived in it for several years until they built a three room log house. Ed Smith's old one room house was used as a school for a time. Hallie rode horseback about five miles to school. The girls wore long dresses and rode side saddle. Ed Smith ran the post office at Box Elder Park. Glenrock was the closest town for supplies.

In the summer some time was also spent prospecting for copper in the mountains. Again the whole family went along and stayed in a tent. There were lots of wild game to eat. Bear fat was rendered down for grease and used instead of lard.

After living in Wyoming 15 years, Charles Smith and his family, with the exception of Roy, returned to Lenox, Iowa by train to be with his father, Nelson. Nelson and Melissa died in 1902 and 1903. Later Charles again felt the call of the west and made a second trip by covered wagon.

On this trip west my grandmother, Hallie, could remember and told many interesting tales. She told of the time they crossed the Missouri River at Nebraska City. As they started across, one of the horses became so scared he just laid down. After much coaxing, pushing and pulling they finally made it across. Then they discovered that her younger sister, Goldie, had also been so frightened she had bit on her little gold ring and bent it so badly it had to be cut from her finger.

After exploring around Colorado Springs and the Canon City area, they chose Morgan County, Colorado for their location. The town was Hillrose where they were living when it was incorporated in June 1918. Charles was active in the incorporation and was one of the first Trustees of the town. His son, Frank, was one of the first Town Marshals. Charles owned the Hillrose grocery store and butcher shop and built the first brick house in town.

Charles Smith sold his store in Hillrose and moved to Savage, Montana. His wife, Laura, died there in 1934. Charles lived alone in his little log house in his daughter Goldie's yard until a few weeks before his death. He died in 1959 a week before his 100th birthday.

Hallie married William Bailey on December 23, 1908. They homesteaded near Akron, Colorado. She died in 1973.

Smith, "Coyote" and Hattie

My life in Wyoming started on May 22, 1904, when I, Hattie Marie, was born on the Smith Ranch in a log house built by my parents. So it was, my early life, my family and the "Smith Ranch" became part of Glenrock history.

George Henry Smith was born in 1862, also known as "Coyote" Smith, "G. H." and "Potato" Smith. Mama was Hattie Lydia Mitchell Smith, born in 1860. As I recall, everyone always called her Mrs. Smith.

As a photographer, my Dad traveled around Wyoming taking pictures. It was during this time he met and married Mama in Lander, Wyoming. Mama was orphaned in infancy in Columbus, Ohio. Her mother was from the "South", her father from the "North".

Leaving Wyoming, Dad and Mama went to Chicago for awhile, then from there they went to Gordon, Nebraska. It was there that their first son, George Murriel, was born in 1897. They went back to Wyoming, near Glenrock, where Ira Melvin was born in 1898. They were living in a log cabin on the George Arnold property. The cabin was washed away when the creek flooded, and they were forced to live, for a short time, in a dug out on the side of the hill a half mile from the George Arnold ranch. Harry Marion was born in the dug out in 1901. A twin sister to Ira died at birth and Georgie Frances, born in 1902, died at age two years. I was named Hattie Marie, the youngest and last born of six children. Playing a part in this drama of life was Dr. Jay Smith (no relation), who was the doctor in the area those days.

They bought sixty-five acres of land from George Arnold in 1901. This property, which became the Smith Ranch, was bordered by the Silas Mortimer property and more Arnold property (later bought by John J. Putnam). The rest was surrounded by property owned by the Tolland Company — known as the VR Ranch and some government land.

Big Deer Creek ran through the middle of Smith Ranch. There was a nice "swimming hole." Swimming and fishing were favorite pastimes for the family and visitors. A stream branched off from the creek through a meadow which provided water for their home. The log house, which was home for the next few years, was built up on higher ground away from the creek area.

In 1912 my parents built a frame house next to the log house. They didn't live in it, however, until years later. Instead it became a building for Saturday night country dances.

Ranchers, town people and people from the Parkerton oil fields would come by horseback, wagon and cars and stay all night dancing square dances, two steps, waltzes and fox trots to the music provided by the Smith family. Dad was the main musician, playing the violin, my brother Murriel and I playing the piano, and Ira playing the banjo and calling the square dances. Mama provided her popular midnight supper at fifty cents a plate. She would have roast beef; or family and visitors would go fishing, and they would have a fish supper. There were pies and cakes, too. The men, only, were charged a dollar admission to the dance. Fifty to seventy-five people would come, dancing until dawn.

In 1914, brothers Murriel and Ira left to serve in the U.S. Navy during World War I. In 1915 and 1916 Mama and I took wagon loads of vegetables to sell to people over at oil fields in Parkerton.

We would load the wagon with vegetables in large tubs of spring water covered with a tarp to keep them cool. We had radishes, green onions, lettuce, potatoes, carrots, cucumbers, squash, string beans, and peas. We sold the vegetables for five or ten cents a bunch. It was a three-mile trip over to Parkerton. We used a team of horses to pull the wagon over there. Sometimes it was Topsy and Mollie, or Blazes and Star, or Cutie and Florie.

It was productive land for the Smiths. There was always the vegetable garden, potatoes, and alfalfa for hay. Picking wild chokecherries and gooseberries was a family outing ritual in the summer. Mama raised chickens, geese and turkeys. We had milk cows, too. She took milk and eggs to town to sell or trade at the stores in Glenrock. We had horses, sheep, cattle and sometimes pigs.

My dad was known as "Potato" Smith, when he was growing extra large sized potatoes called "white elephant" and Blue Vista potatoes. He traded them in town for supplies at the Sumner Store, the George McDonald Store and the D. J. Smyth Store.

George Smith was an established photographer in Glenrock where in 1915 he built, owned and operated the Smith Studio. There are many "Smith Photos" to be found in the annals of Glenrock history. He would go to the oil field to especially take pictures of a gusher when it came in. I would help in the studio developing pictures, when my dad was on night marshal duty.

As an avid trapper, he was known as "Coyote" Smith. He trapped coyotes for the furs which he sent to the J. L. Proude Company in Chicago via the Northwestern Railroad. He trapped muskrats, beavers, wolves, coyotes and skunks. He also was a taxidermist and tanned deer hides and mounted deer heads for other people. I helped with mounting the heads. Mama made coyote and bobcat rugs mounted with heads. My dad was also Town Marshal during the war time and when the saloons were closed. He worked with Deputy Sheriff Howard Jackson.

I rode to school, on my horse Beauty, three miles from home to the VR Ranch. It was a one-room school house with a big pot-bellied stove. About ten students attended at a time. There were the seven Booker children, the Mortimers and the Smiths. Our teachers were G. S. Clayton and Anna Vreeland. One time, G. S.

George "Coyote" Smith

Clayton was chased by a pack of wolves on the way to school.

Later years, when my dad had his studio in town, I attended school in the first brick school building in Glenrock. Mabel Thayer Walkinshaw and Mrs. John Fenex were my teachers.

In about 1914, my dad bought a Rosie Rambler. The body was made of wood and it had surrey fringe on top. He towed it out to the ranch with a team of horses. He never did get it to run. I understand it has now been restored by someone in Casper.

Sharing those memories with me is my daughter Marion, who was also born in the same log house that I was, on the Smith Ranch. She and brother Harvey also attended the same brick school I did in Glenrock for a short time. They rode to town early in the morning from the ranch with John Putnam and his daughter Joan in the milk truck. They would wait across the street in the laundry until time for school to start.

As a young girl, Marion remembers her Grandad and Grandma taking her to Glenrock, when she stayed on the ranch with them. Her favorite treat was getting a chocolate ice cream cone at the Frank and Edith Morgan Confectionery Store. Her memories of the ranch were riding the old horse Brownie down to water at the slew and the other horse, Fatch. Fishing in the stream with a willow branch and safety pin on a line. A special treat in the evening was a tin cup of warm milk straight from old Debbie, the cow, as Grandad did the evening milking. Later in the evening, he would play his violin and sing for her as she danced around the room to "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary," "Those Golden Slippers" and "Red Wing."

Good times were had in the kitchen with Grandma churning butter, or turning the milk separator, making snow ice cream with vanilla and sugar in the winter, feeding the chickens or giving a bum lamb a bottle of milk with a rubber nipple on it. There was fun with Uncle Harry, too, as she followed him around doing chores. Going over to the Putnam Ranch and playing school with Joan was a highlight of visits to the ranch. Sometimes Joan would come over and they would go swimming down at the "ol' swimmin hole" in Deer Creek.

The Smith Ranch was home to George and Hattie Smith until the early thirties. After their passing the ranch was bought by Ed Stevens. Mama and Dad are buried in a little family plot along with baby Frances on a knoll near the main road of the ranch.

My brother Harry and Ira lived in and around Glenrock and the Wyoming area all the years of their lives. Harry was Deputy Sheriff of Glenrock along with Sheriff Al Lass for a time. He and his wife Essie raised seven children all of whom continued to live in Wyoming. Ira and wife Bell lived in Glenrock for many years. Ira is buried in Glenrock Cemetery. Murriel and wife Viola moved to Denver, Colorado where they raised four children. Their children and grandchildren still live there. I moved to southern California with my husband Harvey and four children in 1936. My children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren all live in California.

Smith, Dave and Hattie Smith Sims

Dave Smith came to Wyoming in the early 1900's from Nebraska. He took a homestead about 12 miles east of Douglas. In addition to developing his claim, he was employed as a sheepherder for Reese and Woods on a part-time basis.

Dave's land was situated on a tributary of Shawnee Creek; his dwelling, constructed from jack pine logs, nestled among the cottonwoods. Dave was very proud of his homestead, and was often heard to say that it was the best little half-section in the state of Wyoming. Dave lived the solitary life of a bachelor for many years, eking out an existence by working for others in the vicinity. His needs were few, so his small income sufficed. As late as the year 1946, Dave could be seen making trips to town in a rough-riding lumber box wagon. He drove a team of horses — one an iron gray stallion, and one a bay mare. Dave was of the opinion that his "stud hoss" was an exceptional animal, possessing much intelligence, which proved to be true. That "stud hoss" could trot to town and back without ever tightening the traces on his single tree. The bay mare was obliged to pull the wagon, the load, and the "stud hoss".

In the late 1940's, Dave decided to sell his land and move to North Carolina. He was determined that one particular neighbor should not have it. There were three ranchers who owned land adjoining that of Dave's. They were Tom McCarty, Harry Gillespie, and Cliff Munkres. After a lot of "jawing", Dave sold to a real estate dealer in Douglas. The story goes that Dave, who was very wary of banks, paper money, and checks, wanted to take his payment for the land in the form of silver dollars — 3200 of them. Howard Esmay, President of the Converse County Bank, and the realtor, Scott Layton, argued that the dollars would weigh too much, and that there would be a risk that Dave would be robbed of his money on the trip to North Carolina, but Dave was adamant. He engaged a freight car and left Douglas by rail, carrying his suitcase full of dollars, and riding in the freight car with his wagon, horses and other possessions. Later, Mr. Layton sold the land to the very neighbor that Dave did not want to have it.

Some years later, Dave returned to Wyoming and married a Mrs. Spellman, who was an agent for the Watkin's Products Company. They made their home in Thermopolis, Wyoming until the time of Dave's death.

Hattie Smith Sims, Dave Smith's sister, and her family came to Wyoming in 1910. Thomas and Hattie Sims were the parents of six children. Their oldest son remained in Nebraska, while the other three daughters and two sons moved to Wyoming.

After their arrival in Douglas, Thomas Sims left his family for some years. Hattie operated a rooming house. Later she decided to homestead and took land adjoining that of her brother, Dave.

The second son, Rease, worked for ranchers Reese and Woods.

Hattie's eldest daughter, Lizzie, was 16 at the time her family moved to Wyoming. She was later married to John Covington who operated a restaurant in Douglas for a time. Lizzie and John later made their home in Casper. After John's death, Lizzie married John Rose. She is now a widow, making her home in Nevada, Missouri.

The second daughter Juanita was six years old in 1910. She finished the eighth grade and attended one and one-half years of high school. She worked for Dr. Hylton and then went to Cheyenne for nurses training; but she quit and came back to Douglas and married Arthur C. Olson. The couple took a homestead 25 miles northeast of Douglas but did not prove up on it. Arthur then worked for the Ford garage. Part of the time, he drove a mail route. The Olsons had two children. Juanita lives in Wray, Colorado where she runs an apartment and rooming house.

The third daughter Jannie married John Trainer whose family had a homestead about six miles from the Sims. They had one son. Jannie later married a Mr. Johnson.

Sheridan "Sherrywood" Sims, Hattie's youngest son, died as a result of an accident at the age of ten. The boy was attempting to replace a ball bearing in the wheel of his little wagon. The lad had found a live bullet at the brick yards located at the east edge of Douglas. He decided that this would serve as a ball bearing. The bullet exploded when the boy attempted to seat the bullet in the wheel. Sherrywood lived four days after his accident and died on September 11, 1911. He is buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Hattie Sims gave her homestead to her oldest daughter Lizzie who still owns it.

Smith, Edward and Eleanor Family

My mother's (Maud) parents, Edward and Eleanor Smith, left their home in Clearfield, Iowa in 1886 and by covered wagon and horseback came West to find a place to resettle.

After a difficult trip of over three months, they were camped on lower Deer Creek, near Glenrock. Their mules wandered away, looking for the good grass. Ed and his brother Mart searched for them for days, found them grazing in Boxelder Park, admired the good sense of the animals and decided to settle there. The ranch is now owned by the Fred Grants.

The following is an excerpt from a letter Eleanor Smith wrote in 1971: "The picture of the covered wagon on the letterhead reminds me of the year 1886, when we journeyed West. Only we drove a good span of mules and a better covered wagon. There were three wagons and twelve people. We left Iowa in May, 1886, arrived in Boxelder Park in August, 1886. We drove 60 head of cattle clear through, had two saddle ponies. I rode one part of the time and helped drive cattle. Maud was five years old and Jay was one year old the week after we arrived here. I never shall forget that trip and I have hated the sight of a covered wagon ever since. Dad (Ed) always drove in the lead, always good natured and kind to all. Well to make a long story short we went on a picnic for over three months. Dad and I were crazy to come West but come we did and took the bitter with the sweet. We all know there was never a better man, but why oh why did he have to leave me. I know I am blessed with daughters and grandchildren there never was better."

The first winter home of these sturdy pioneers was a house-tent. But they toughed it out, and when spring arrived they built log cabins, sheds and chicken houses. In 1902 they constructed a big red barn, which remains a landmark. Many will remember the all-night barn dances held there during the roaring twenties.

Eleanor's many friends often called her Grandmother Smith, Aunt Ell or Mrs. Ed. She was an active member of the Eastern Star and belonged to the Episcopal Church. For many years she was postmistress at Boxelder. Ell was a crack shot with a rifle or shotgun and was adept at riding a bronc with a sidesaddle. She preferred working in the hayfield and helping at branding time than doing housework. She had a loom to weave rugs from rags, made jams and jellies from the wild berries, and made pork sausage and sauerkraut. She also played the organ.

Ed was a loveable man, slow to anger and respected by all. Hugh Smyth said, "He was the only man I have ever known who had not one enemy." He was a faithful Episcopalian and belonged to no social or fraternal organizations.

Edna G. was born in Boxelder Park in 1894.

Jay Raymond Smith married Frances Garner, but died in 1918 leaving three children; Lawrence Lee, who married Catherine Clemens, retired from the oil business to El Paso, Texas; May Garnet, now Mrs. C. R. Hucker, lives in Houston; and Hazel Eleanor married Pete Wall of Longmont, Colorado and lives in Huntsville, Texas.

Ed and Eleanor sold the ranch and moved to Glenrock. The Smith Brothers opened the Glenrock Garage, a Paige-Chalmers dealership, and sold and serviced the new-fangled automobiles. During one period Ed was the Police Judge and Mart the Town Marshal.

Edna married Stanley Vaughan in 1916 and moved to Cheyenne, where he and his brother, Harold, operated the Vaughan Creamery. They produced two daughters, Enidell, now Mrs. Stanley Schmidt of Excelsior, Minnesota, and Miriam, now Mrs. Robert Kelleher of North Springfield, Virginia. Edna now lives in Excelsior, Minnesota.

Maud married David Smyth in 1898.

Ed Smith died in 1939, Eleanor died in 1955.

Smith, Edward and Henrietta

Edward "Mountain Home" Smith was born in 1866 to a family named Irvine in Ireland. He changed his name to Smith after he came to America. Later, after his marriage, his wife learned of his true identity and confronted him with the information. He told her that he was the youngest son in a large family and therefore would never inherit anything of the parental property. So, one day out in the hayfields, he became disgusted with working in the hot sun with no future. He thereupon slid off the stack and walked away without even a farewell to his family.

Ed's son-in-law, Bob David, describes Mr. Smith in his memoirs, "He had a terrible Irish temper and was the only man I ever knew who, when he became angry, would tear off his coat, throw it down and dance on it until he was relieved."

After arriving in America, Ed came west to Colorado and Wyoming. He became associated with J. S. Woodruff of Shoshoni, Wyoming and helped trail some of the first sheep from Oregon.

It was in Denver, Colorado that he met and married Henrietta Mohr, the daughter of Carl and Hagelsteen Mohr. Henrietta was born in Bergen, Norway. After their marriage they moved to a place near Pineo, Colorado before coming to live north of Lost Springs where they had a small ranch with a partner named Lowry.

Two children were born, Edna (1897) and George.

The family lived in Douglas at 339 South Fourth Street where the children went to school in 1912. Shortly after, Ed and Henrietta moved west of Glenrock where he was employed by the Mountain Home Company as its manager. It was here he got his name "Mountain Home Smith." The Valentine family own part of the ranch and live in the two story house on the river in 1985.

Ed died on April 24, 1935 from injuries incurred in a car accident west of Big Muddy Oil Field. Henrietta died on June 26, 1937.

Edna married Bob David, son of E. T. and Mary David, on August 19, 1919.

Smith, Edwin C., William James Jr., and Eleanor Elizabeth Families

Accident, or fate, established the Smith-Peyton families in what was to become Converse County, Wyoming. Edwin C. Smith, the first to arrive in the area, was born in Trenton, New Jersey, March 18, 1846, the youngest of three children including William James Jr. (known as James or Jim), and Eleanor Elizabeth. Their mother, Eleanor, died when Edwin was small. Their father, William James, was a sea captain plying chiefly between New York and Liverpool, England. The children attended private schools in New Jersey and New York and their classical education gave little suggestion that they would all three arrive in Wyoming by different paths.

When Capt. William James Smith's ship was lost at sea, Edwin and Eleanor went to live with their father's sister, Kate, in Quincy, Illinois. James remained in boarding school in New York.

Edwin finished high school in public school and learned the leather trade at night.

Eleanor Elizabeth had married Jim Bragg and moved to the new territory of Kansas. Edwin was anxious to visit his sister, and in 1863 he had an opportunity to join a large emigrant train. On the way, Edwin repaired tack and various leather. When he arrived in Kansas he found that his sister and her husband had leased their farm and gone to visit Jim Baker, a relative of Jim Bragg in Colorado. Edwin was urged to continue to Colorado with the wagon train, but when he arrived in Colorado, his sister and her husband had gone to California. Baker, a scout and messenger, has been called the last of the great Mountain Men. He trapped with Jim Bridger, fought grizzlies and Indians, and was adopted by the Shoshones.

Jim Baker was preparing to go to Fort Hall for a powwow with the Blackfeet and suggested that Edwin ride along. Edwin had good horses and his volume of Shakespeare, and the ride was his first experience with the territory that was to become Wyoming. It was the beginning of a love-affair with the land that was to last life-long. The trip was through Lemhi country, and the scouts were apprehensive about meeting the Lemhi who were enemies of the Blackfeet. Baker managed a friendly powwow and Smith had the opportunity to use his knowledge of Spanish because Washakie who was with the Lemhi understood the language.

Smith stayed with Baker for some time and made a trip to Ft. Laramie with him in 1867.

Edwin traveled with government freight trains as a repair man. In 1868 he entered the government service as a saddler. Six months later he volunteered in the 19th Kansas Cavalry in the war against the combined forces of the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians. He received his honorable discharge from the government April 19, 1869 at Fort Hays, Kansas. Ed met John Paull at Ft. Hayes; and during a short visit at Havana, Kansas, Ed fell in love with John's sister, Nancy M. Paull.

Ed visited his sister, Eleanor Bragg in Wayside, Kansas but was courting Nancy Paull. Nancy was very active in community affairs, and was a choir director in Independence, Parsons, and Wayside, Kansas. She was also training to be a medical missionary.

While in Kansas Ed bought a wagon and four horse team. Will Paull had a wagon and a team of mules and Ed persuaded him to return to Wyoming to do some freighting.

The present ranchman stock business started in the southern part of the state on or about the time that the territory was organized. Ed's friend, Joseph Carey, who was to become one of the largest owners of Hereford cattle in Wyoming often said that he was lonely and disgusted with the barren country before he met Ed who had visited all of the old forts in this part of the country. Carey said that Edwin's descriptions of beautiful valleys with native grass growing a foot high, and wild game thriving the year around had a lot to do with his idea that a man might make a lot of money in the cattle business. Ed Smith often said that he was first attracted by the land in the lower LaPrele valley about the fall of 1869.

Edwin and his sister, Eleanor, were very close and he saw the Braggs frequently when they returned to Wyoming. However, neither Edwin nor Eleanor knew whether their brother, William James Jr., was dead or alive.

James had been urged to become a priest but his opposition to slavery led him to volunteer for the Union forces. He served all during the Civil War and went through the worst battles as a northern foot soldier. By the time the war was over, James' only knowledge of his relatives was that his father had left him an inheritance with the resident priest. James donated the money to the church and re-enlisted in the United States Army. He came to Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory in 1875. It was there that he met his younger brother, Edwin, whom he had not seen since 1861. The brothers became very close.

When he returned to Wyoming, Edwin had turned his team and wagon over to William Paull and had taken a job with Hiram "Hi" Kelley on Chugwater, chiefly to learn as much as possible about the stock business.

During this time Edwin and a friend were traveling through the country when they met a large band of Sioux. It had been reported that the Indians were on the warpath and the two young men hid. Suddenly Edwin spurred his horse out of his hiding place and his companion thought that he had lost his mind. An Indian boy had caught his foot in a rope and was being dragged by his frantic pony. Ed managed to catch the pony and save the boy. Fortunately the band of Indians was made up of old men, women and children following a hostile hunting party. The Indians recognized that Edwin had no way of knowing that, and from then on, the Sioux called Edwin "Strong Heart".

On or about 1874 Edwin took a temporary position as a clerk in the sutler's store at Fort Fetterman. A few months later he entered the government harness shop as a civilian repair man and held that position until the early spring of 1878.

On or about 1877 one of Edwin's friends, Samuel Slaymaker, went to the government harness shop. He had a story about a greenhorn cowman who came to the fort on the stage with his bedroll and saddle. The man wanted to rent a gentle saddle horse so that he could look over the range on the north side of the Platte River so that he could establish a site for a cow ranch. The officers at the fort told Ed Weaver that he was premature.

Sammy Slaymaker told the newcomer that the nearest livery barn was in Cheyenne, 150 miles away. Sammy said that he had managed to get into the army before he was old enough to get drafted; he had also managed to stay in the service all the way from Pennsylvania to Fetterman; but he had never had enough courage to cross the Platte to see what Sioux looked like.

A few days later Slaymaker told Edwin that Weaver was a pretty nice fellow, but he thought Weaver needed a body guard, and he had recommended Edwin very highly for the job.

Mr. Weaver did not want to live in Wyoming at that time. He wanted a dependable man to establish a cow ranch for him and report to him regularly about the business. Time was an element with Edwin, but they talked things over and Weaver went home leaving the future plans with Smith. Edwin established the Y-Y cattle ranch on the north side of the Platte in the spring of 1878. It was the first ranch on the north side of the Platte at the site of the old Hunka Pau Pau Sioux Indian hunting ground. Edwin hired hands and brought in Texas cattle in the early spring of 1878 as manager and range foreman of the Benjamin Weaver Cattle Company.

Nancy M. Paull and Edwin C. Smith were married by the justice of the peace at Independence, Kansas, February 12, 1879, and immediately set out for Fetterman. The couple made the trip as far as Cheyenne on the Union Pacific. From Cheyenne to Fetterman they were in the Fetterman Stage in a howling Wyoming blizzard.

Nancy boarded at Ft. Fetterman until spring before going to the ranch. Nancy saw very little of Edwin during that spring because the blizzard had scattered the Y-Y cattle for many miles. In addition to this, Edwin's brother, James, who was in charge of the 9-6 saddle horses, owned by the company, was snowed in at the Sage Creek ranch about 30 miles farther north.

There was no church in Fetterman, but Nancy's medical training made it possible for her to make friends and keep busy. She did have the opportunity to visit George and Margaret Powell on their ranch on the LaPrele. She also had a chance to see a hanging during her sojourn.

Margaret Powell's sister, Kate Scogland (Rice) often said that she felt very important when she went to the Y-Y to work for Nancy in the fall of 1879. Kate also remembered the directions which the Y-Y flunky gave her for the Y-Y cow camp. They went this way: first he asked her if she knew where Table Mountain was. "Well the cow camp is about ten miles due east of Table Mountain on the east side of the Platte River. And it can't be more than 42 miles north of Laramie Peak. You ride down the Platte River for about five miles and you come to a little stream that flows west into the Platte. You cross that creek and ride south along the river until you come to the Y-Y grub wagon. You can't miss it." (Today the Wyoming State Fairgrounds replaces the Y-Y grub wagon.)

It was a relief to know that there was a doctor at Fetterman because Nancy planned to go there for a couple of weeks in December so that her son (they planned to call him "Paull") could be born with the best possible care. In late November Margaret Powell came to stay a few days. November 29, 1879 a blizzard blew out of the north and the Smiths' first daughter decided to be born. Edwin rode to Fetterman as fast as he could to get the doctor. Margaret Powell had never seen a baby born; but that baby would wait for no man and with Nancy's directions and Margaret's midwifery, little Pauline E. Smith hurried into Wyoming and always believed there could be no better place. While Ed took care of the horses, the doctor rushed to the house to be met by Margaret's query, "Why what brings you out on such a night, doctor?"

One of the cowboys at the Y-Y was a doctor but none knew it until their little girl mascot got into difficulties with her adventurous kitten. From then on cowboy Jesurun was "Doc Four Eyes" and the little girl was "Tottie". The cowboys loved teasing Ed about his boy. The teasing culminated in a prank when the baby was a few months old.

The Smiths attended a dance and the babies were put to bed tucked into their various shawls and robes while the parents danced and finally ate breakfast. Shortly before dawn Mizzou Hines and his pals slipped up to inspect the babies. Ed Smith found his baby wrapped in Nancy's Persian shawl, and the Smiths were several miles before they discovered that they did have a boy, little Ollie Ward from Fetterman.

Nancy declared that she would not raise her baby on Eaglebrand milk. Longhorns had barely enough milk for their calves; anyway, no one volunteered to milk those animals. George and Maggie Powell had been urging Ed to take up adjoining land on LaPrele Creek. When Ed had a chance to buy three Herefords and a Jersey cow from some of the emigrants on the Oregon Trail, he decided to take up the LaPrele land which had protection for the stock.

Ed put his milk cow and Herefords on his land and went to Rock Creek for supplies, which took a week. On his way home Smith stopped by LaPrele to check on his stock. They were not in evidence but a wisp of smoke curled up from the timber. When he rode into the timber, Ed found some squaws skinning his milk cow. When he asked them why they were skinning his milk cow, they answered, "Um fat".

Rich with berries, game and grasses, that area was a favorite place for the Indians who considered it theirs. In order to secure his future, Ed dickered with the Indians for three days and many dollars. This meant bargaining with each brave for ponies, saddles, or whatever he chose to part with. After each bargain was struck, Ed made the bargain that the land was his and they would never camp there. The bargain was sealed when Ed called out, "Hear That, Great Spirit!" and the valley's echo answered. Each year the Indians came, visited the ranch, but never caused trouble nor attempted to camp on his land.

The problem of ownership in Wyoming territory was not as simple as Ed's deals with the Indians. Robert Fryer, who had been pasturing Ed's teams, complained that food was getting short because the men for whom he repaired wagons expected him to pasture their oxen until the repair work was done.

In the fall of 1880 Ed turned his horses loose near an old cabin on the LaPrele and repaired the cabin so that he would have a place to stay overnight when he went to see his stock. There were rumors of a survey that would make it possible for men to take homesteads. In 1882 he applied for the land as a homestead. He hired a man and moved to the land early in the spring of 1882 bringing with them, among things too numerous to mention, the first civilian-owned mowing machine in the lower LaPrele valley.

Jim and Eleanor Bragg had been living in Tie Siding and Laramie City for several years while Jim was freighting railroad ties for the Union Pacific Railroad. At various times the Smiths and Paulls joined Jim Bragg in his venture. In January 1882, Nancy stayed with the Braggs while her second daughter, Stella was born.

In 1882 Ed quit the Y-Y and spent the rest of his life in activities centered around his home ranch which Bobby Fryer had named Pleasant Valley. The family was rarely alone. Edwin moved his wife and two little daughters to the ranch in the summer of 1882 where he had built an extra room on the cabin until he could get logs from the mountains to build a large nine room log house. The house with its big chimney was built by Ed and Hank Kellogg. The house was sealed with boards and finished with wall paper. The house was near the creek but high enough to be protected from the high water. The barn nestled in the "U" of the hills.

The second water right on the creek was acquired and John Paull helped Ed build Smith dam which is still in use.

Morning came early for the Smiths. Many of the cowboys appreciated the cream, butter, eggs, and fine gardens that Nancy managed. The chief crops on the ranch were hay and oats. Cattle and horses were the livestock. The horses were Morgans and Normans as well as Arabians and half Arabs with a thoroughbred sire. Ed gave Pauline a pony when she was four.

Ed often worked with his friend, Bobby Fryer, blacksmith and LaPrele poet. Fryer's place was a haven for freighters, and repairing wagons, harness, and saddles, as well as regular blacksmithing was profitable.

Fryer exerted a great influence over the community. He was eager to have a school established and Al Ayers and the other bachelors were as interested in the school as the families with children. The O'Briens, Bishops, George Powells, and Smiths had children ready for school by 1885. Ed Smith volunteered that he would provide land rent free for the school. He also served on the school board for many years and provided books and supplies as did the bachelors as well as the family men. Bishop and Kellogg built the frame school in Smith's north meadow. The school soon became the setting for a literary society, programs and entertainments, church whenever any of the clergy appeared, and the polling place for elections. As the population shifted later the school was moved to the top of the hill near the road. (When the school ceased to be used, the Wyoming Pioneer Association bought it and paid to move it to the Wyoming State Fairgrounds to be part of the Wyoming Pioneer complex. The money for this project was raised by individual contributions.)

Nancy soon found her medical knowledge much in demand. She didn't expect neighbors to pay, but usually took sugar or some other goody when she visited.

Fetterman was the post office and local shopping center. Rock Creek and Cheyenne, the supply points on the Union Pacific were both more than 150 miles. The rare visits of peddlers with fruit, candy, lace and porcelain doll heads served as a base for Christmas gifts which were usually home made.

Nancy was very conscious of sanitation and would not allow the children to bring Indian artifacts into the house. Nancy's dignity sometimes aggravated the Indian women. One day Cusha, a proud Sioux, came to the house asking for Strong Heart. When Cusha found that Ed Wasn't home she said, "Strong Heart's squaw come quick, Hornbeek die." Nancy went.

Robert Edwin Smith was born September 7, 1886, Pleasant Valley Ranch, Albany County, Wyoming Territory, the same year as the birth of Douglas. His sister, Elvira, was born November 13, 1890 at the ranch.

The quirk of the railroad which established a new town rather than Fetterman was a surprise to the community, but the Smiths hailed the new town and were active in Douglas social life.

April 4, 1897 dawned a balmy weather-breeding day; but Ed was anxious to get a load of hay to Mike Henry at Brown Springs. Jamie, a boy who had been with the Smiths for several years, accompanied Ed. By the time they had gone halfway they were in a howling blizzard. The horses stumbled and could not see. Ed realized that they would have to wait out the storm. They unhitched the team and made a wall of hay around the wagon. Ed turned the horses loose and one of them got home two years later. The two men had blankets and a lunch so they weren't particularly worried. The blizzard lasted three days, and the second day Ed began to have terrible abdominal pains. After the storm broke, Lee Moore, Billy Irvine, and Ollie Chambers found the men and took them in to Fettermen where Lester Clelland and his wife lived. A young man started immediately for Pleasant Valley but Ed was gone before Nancy could get to him.

Ed was buried in the little graveyard north of Douglas with an Odd Fellow funeral. (His body was later moved to the Douglas cemetery).

Ed Smith was sincerely interested in preserving the history and culture of Wyoming. In the '80's and '90's he was active with the OLD TIMERS, a group from over the state who were dedicated to preserving Wyoming history and good fellowship, and believed that Wyoming artifacts should have fireproof museums. He passed his enthusiasm to his daughter, Pauline E. (Tottie or Lena). In later years the OLD TIMERS invited her to meet with them as her father's representative.

In addition to the Pleasant Valley School, the Smith children had tutoring. Pauline E. went to normal school in Independence, Kansas, and taught school for one year before she married Albert Peyton. Stella and Robert graduated from Douglas High School. Stella then graduated from Capitol City Business College in Des Moines, Iowa, and Robert from Parks Business College in Denver. Stella became a buyer for George Bolln Company before she married James Stone. Robert went into the oil business, served in France in World War I and returned to oil contracting.

Elvira was a talented musician who graduated from Lexington College, Lexington, Missouri, and graduate work at Bethany College, Topeka, Kansas. She married Bernard Peyton but was always active in teaching and directing music as well as singing in Wyoming and Montana.

After 1900 Nancy made an ill-fated marriage to Bill Powell. Nancy moved to town and spent much time in Kansas; her marriage was soon dissolved. Nancy purchased the Elk Hotel in Douglas but soon left the operations to her daughter.

Smith, George and Lucy Family

The Smith Ranch, on Sage Creek in north central Converse County, has seen five generations since its beginning as the wintering area of Smith-McPherson Sheep Company in 1898 with its headquarters on Cottonwood Creek, south of the Platte River. George W. Smith established the Smith-Lowry Ranch, on Lightning Creek previous to the above operation, then from 1904 to 1912 he was associated in the sheep business with Joe Lowndes, with the brand of "17" for his sheep. When George was asked why he decided to ranch in such an arid spot in the county, he replied that he liked sage chickens and that the hills about Sage Creek seemed to move with them. His wife, Lucy, was a good shot and liked them too, but later, after the sage chickens were gone, his descendants wished that he had not settled upon this sandy reach of land in the rain pattern between the Platte River and the divide to the north, especially when they could see summer rains following either. After his father's death in 1921, Bill, Senior, ran the ranch until 1940 when he bought a house in Douglas to be nearer his many interests, while young Bill, or William Jay Smith, with his new bride took over active management of the sheep company which now included cattle under the brand of L over 6, "Lg." Today the home ranch is occupied by Bill Jr.'s sons, Stephen and Fred Smith and their families with Steve's son, Mark, the fifth generation.

George Washington Smith was born Aug. 16, 1858 on a farm in Hopewell Township, Muskingum County, Ohio, the fifth son of Joshua Brown Smith and his wife, Mary Anne Poundstone. Joshua was born February 1825, the youngest child of James and Anne Smith, both of whom came into Ohio from Pennsylvania in 1810. Mary Anne's parents were Philip and Anna Poundstone of Fayette County, Pennsylvania.

After the death of James and Anne, Joshua sold his land in 1870 and moved his family of husky teenagers to Wichita, Kansas, to be on hand for the Cherokee Run into Oklahoma Territory. They went by train to the eastern border of Kansas and from there in covered wagons to Gypsum Creek, four miles south of Wichita. However, he was unsuccessful as his claim in Oklahoma Territory, was jumped by claimjumpers and a short time later the family settled in Chautauqua County, Kansas, and two years later still bought lots in the town of Sedan. Here Mary Anne lived out her life, dying in 1911 and willing her town lots to her youngest unmarried son, Edward. Joshua spent the last years of his life with his sons in Wyoming. He homesteaded and prospected for gold on Casper Mountain. He died in 1909 and was buried in Highland Cemetery, Casper, services being held in the family living quarters of the Natrona Hotel which was owned by his son, James Pierce Smith.

Shortly after arriving in Kansas James P. and George, together with two cousins, secured army contracts to freight supplies for the U.S. Army between army posts. They continued to do so until the frontier forts were discontinued, one of their main depots being Rock Creek (now Rock River) on the Laramie Plains to Fort Fetterman, and from Fort Kearney to Fort Fetterman, where George resided in 1882. In 1886 he moved to

Douglas. It was while freighting the Bozeman Trail that George became acquainted with the future ranch area and decided to settle on it. His homestead, still in the family, was on "Poverty Flats" between the present stockyards and the bend of the Platte River. His partners in the freighting business between 1882 and 1886 were Abe Daniels and Harve Allen. The business used horses and mules.

George bought John Coffey's saloon on the second lot south of Second and Center Streets, backing on Harve Allen's livery stable. The family tells of the time when so-called outlaw George W. Pike scooped up the money from the till, ran out the front door, threw it upon the roof overhanging the sidewalk, doubled back through the saloon and rode out of town on his horse, which was stabled in the rear. Naturally he was "clean" when apprehended by Sheriff Malcolm Campbell! Many a down-and-outer was given food and shelter in the saloon in return for "swamping."

Lucy Garfield, born Sept. 5, 1877 came as a young woman to Wyoming from Watseka, Illinois, for her health, living with her aunt and uncle, Annetta and Nathan E. Burns, who was stationed at Fort Fetterman in Company F., Wyoming Volunteer Infantry. After abandonment of the fort they moved to Douglas where Nat was a salesman and where Lucy joined the family as a seamstress and milliner. At the time of their marriage on April 17, 1897, George and Lucy bought and enlarged the house on the corner of 5th and Walnut where they lived for over twenty-five years. A petrified tree trunk can still be seen on the side lawn which was found on the northern reaches of their ranch. Lucy later said the town was laying its water lines and she tottered on narrow planks across the deep ditch in her wedding finery, sure she would fall in.

Lucy won the hearts and thanks of the town during the flu epidemic of WWI, by organizing a Red Cross nursing unit in the Town Hall and taking care of those who were unable to take care of themselves. After George's death on Jan. 1, 1921, Lucy sold the home and moved to Casper where she lived until WWII at which time she moved to the Gilbert place on the home ranch; when in her 80s, she moved again to Douglas close to her original home. She survived her husband by forty-eight years dying on July 13, 1969. Both are buried in Douglas Park cemetery in the Smith plot.

William Joshua, or Bill Senior, as he is known, married Nell Cook, daughter of pioneer Archie D. and Florence Hartman Cook, in Casper, January 12, 1918. A wonderful marriage that celebrated its 65th anniversary in 1983 saw all their descendants present. Bill and Nell had much in common. Children of pioneer parents they were born in the Galbraith Hospital on North Sixth Street at the turn of the century, were baptized in the Episcopal Church, went through the Douglas public schools and graduated from Douglas High School, and shared many friends. Nell worked as office nurse for Dr. Storey after graduation. The Converse County Bank was chartered in 1918 and in 1923 Bill was elected by the bank as a director. In 1973 he received a gold watch from the bank for fifty years in banking. In about 1923 he joined Ashlar Lodge, A.F. & A.M. and received his sixty-year pin in 1984. After moving to town Bill served on the vestry of Christ Episcopal Church and both have been devoted parishioners. Nell was a member of St. Mary's Auxiliary.

One of the community services of which Bill Senior is very proud was the twenty-five years spent on the Converse County Hospital Board. He remembers the hospital in the Prisoner-of-War barracks and his part in the building of the large facility on the site of the old City Park which has just recently been supplanted by yet another hospital to serve a growing community.

Republican circles know him as a faithful servant, having served in all capacities locally, being county chairman for twenty-five years, and as State Committeeman. In 1952 he was one of the Presidential Electors from Wyoming in Chicago at Eisenhower's nomination.

Being a busy rancher did not deter him from having an interest in county education and in School District 14. His children attended school in a school house located on Section 26, one and one-half miles from the ranch house. There being no teacherage for such a small school the teachers at that time stayed at the ranch house, among them Barbara Lewendowski, Ella Hobaugh, Maurine Bower and Hazel Schlichter.

During the course of a long life, Bill's community awareness spread to his state and held positions on the Wyoming Livestock and Sanitary Board; the Wyoming Board of Agriculture; and is a member of the Wyoming Stock Growers and Wool Growers Associations.

To this couple were born four children: Annetta, the oldest, now Mrs. Robert A. Walker of Casper; William Jay, of the ranch, who married Betty Cannon of Douglas; Mrs. Robert Masterson of Enterprise, Oregon; and Sandra Jane, now Mrs. Marvin W. Wilson of Douglas. While this young family was growing, so was the ranch. Between 1929 and 1934 due to drought and the great depression many homesteaders gave up farming and sold their lands, returning to their former homes. Bill was able to buy farms and return the land to range land. Some of the bigger land acquisitions were the ranch holdings of Charles and Iole Read, Frank and Grace Amspoker, Herman and Hilda Diehl, and Ed and Ida Leuenberger. The very first purchase, about 1924, was the home ranch established by Carl Williams. These buildings formed the nucleus of the ranch, with more homes and out-buildings being built over the years to accommodate the fourth generation. Within the last ten years a historic landmark, the Williams Shearing Pens on Sage Creek, built in the late 1890's, just off the Bozeman Trail, was torn down. Some timbers carried signatures of Malcolm Campbell and other old timers and now grace the walls of the den at the ranch.

The ranch became two legal entities as it grew, the Smith Land Company with the third generation as directors and the Smith Sheep Company under Wm. Jay Smith and sons. The ranch employed two or more men from the very beginning. Some of the men were Hugh Nutt, a retainer from George's early youth; Bill Potts who came with his brother from Nebraska and homesteaded near the headwaters of Sage Creek; Harry Brewer, whose family lived at Orpha; Roy Price originally from the Shawnee area; Bruce Goldsby of Hyland Flats; Pete and Steve Hensen from Ohio; Jack Rhodes; and in later years still others who had their own families and were housed at the ranch.

These men were never known to complain about the good food put on the table for them by Nell, a wise, competent and able helpmate those many years. A hearty ranch breakfast was followed by lunches for the men, school children and teacher. The ranch grew its own meat; pork, beef, mutton and venison in season, which together with fresh or home-canned vegetables from a large garden, and home-baked bread made up a western supper. Milk cows furnished fresh milk for growing children in the past, as well as in the present, unlike many ranches of that period that got their milk from a can.

Nell belonged to the Hyland Ladies Extension Club which met once a month in homes about the community and where each tried to outdo the other by bringing in extra delicious carry-in dishes for the noon luncheon. The men drove their wives, and spent the time exchanging news or practicing baseball. Then on Sunday the Hyland Nine would travel to another Converse County community for the big game. The children enjoyed these trips immensely and excitement ran high in friendly competition. Once a month the community gathered on a Saturday night at the Vollman School House for a dance, the women bringing cake or sandwiches for the midnight supper and the men chipping in a buck for the music. Dawn would break before everyone got home. Bill Senior would always milk the cows before turning in, the better to sleep a little longer. Everyone danced at these affairs, six years and up to the grandfolds.

Although work on the early day ranch was hard and bitter in winter, summer Sundays were a day of rest at the Smith Ranch. Homemade ice cream, made with ice put up on Sage Creek the winter before and stored in a hay-lined ice house, with real cream separated the day before, eggs from the hen house and fresh fruit bought on the twice-a-month trip to town, along with fried chicken, set the scene. The afternoon was spent in visiting or reading with the children quietly playing. Sometimes a picnic luncheon was packed and the family drove many miles to the Laramie Peak area to cut Lodgepole pines for hay stackers.

Today Bill and Nell enjoy their retirement years in the same house purchased in 1940 on North Fourth Street in Douglas which has been the scene of many happy family gatherings.

Smith, LeRoy and Helen

Roy, as all of his friends called him, was born in Brighton, Iowa, May 9, 1882. He was the oldest son of Charles and Laura Bell Lininger Smith.

In 1894 the Charles Smith family left and went back to Iowa and Roy stayed with the Ed Smith family. He herded sheep and sat on a rock out in the pasture and learned to play the violin. Later on in life he fiddled for many a dance in and around Boxelder Park.

Roy was much in demand to shear sheep as he sheared around 100 a day which was a good bunch with the blades. He was also a cow puncher and worked cowboying for "Uly" Grant.

Roy took up a homestead just east of the Jim Philbrick place; he didn't have it quite proved up on when he was called for World War I. He sold his cattle and relinquished his homestead, got down to his embarkation point and the war was over.

On February 4, 1925 Roy and Helen Arvilla Grant were married.

Helen was born at Baxter, Iowa April 1, 1905, the second oldest of twelve children. She was the daughter of Ulysses S. and Gertrude Mae Chamberlin Grant. She was the only one of the twelve children that her mother had a doctor with. She was six weeks old when her mother came back to Wyoming. They lived in Glenrock where the Tex Conner place is now and ran a dairy. The older kids delivered milk to the people around town in gallon buckets, two in each hand. Helen went to school in Glenrock until she was in the ninth grade, then they moved to Boxelder Park where she worked out in the fields mowing hay and whatever else had to be done on the ranch.

When Helen was 17 her mother died leaving a tiny baby, one month old. They couldn't get any milk to agree with her so it was up to her to work with the baby and nurse her to life.

When Helen and Roy were married, Roy had a Jewett automobile, which was quite a car. They lived in Boxelder Park, moving to the Laramie Plains in the summer to look after Uly Grant's cows.

They had four children, Laura (Stephens), Jean (Barlow), Sharon (Lindsey) and one son who died in infancy.

Roy took out a homestead on Laramie Plains at the head of Deer Creek and proved up on it about 1935.

Roy and Helen moved out of the mountains because of school. They lived on different places in and around Glenrock. Then in 1941 they moved to Deer Creek on the Herman Fisch place; in 1946 they moved on up to the Barber place where Roy died in 1953. Helen Smith still lives on the ranch.

Roy always had a little bunch of Hereford cows and a horse he called "Red Wing" and a mare "May" he dearly loved.

Smith, Martin and Mildred

Martin "Mart" Smith was born on December 29, 1860 in Johnson County, Iowa, the son of Nelson and Melissa Frye Smith.

Martin entered married life in 1884 by marrying Mildred "Millie" Lininger, the daughter of Pete and Margaret Cochran Lininger. The Liningers were formerly from Pennsylvania. Millie's sister, Laura, was married to Mart's brother, Charles.

Five children were born to the Smiths: Clifford (b. October 1884 in Iowa), Aurora Bell (b. March 1887 in Converse County), Lewis (b. December 1888 in Wyoming), Minnie Olive (b. June 1891 in Wyoming) and Nelson (b. October 1893 in Wyoming).

Mart, Millie and son, Clifford, came to Wyoming in 1886 with his brothers, Ed and Charles. Mart homesteaded on upper Boxelder Creek where Lester Grant lives now.

Mart moved his family to Glenrock shortly after the turn of the century in order that his children could attend the upper grades in school.

He and his brother opened the "Smith Brothers, Glenrock Garage" on July 4, 1917 after obtaining the Paige-Chalmers auto dealership.

Mart died on July 7, 1929.

Smull, George and Flora

George Smull was raised near St. Charles, Iowa. He was born on February 14, 1887. George married Flora Holland in early 1908. She was the daughter of Elwin and Mary Ann Bishop Holland and was born in Madison County, Iowa on December 15, 1890.

They farmed near Larimore, Iowa, and that was where I, Burla Mary, was born December 12, 1908. They moved from there to Nebraska when I was a baby.

I must have been around four or five years old when we moved to Julesburg, Colorado. At that time Papa loaded all of our household goods in one end of a railroad stock car and the livestock in the other end. That is the way we moved.

We settled on a farm out of Julesburg and Papa raised corn, wheat, and other crops. We also raised draft horses for that was the way the farming was done in those days. Of course we raised pigs, cattle, and chickens. There were no geese; but we had ducks. As soon as it got warm we picked the duck feathers and saved them to put in the feather ticks we used on our beds. Sometimes in the summer, we would use straw ticks on our beds. Also we would use corn husks in our ticks. It was nice to sleep on a nice fresh tick.

When the corn was picked we had big bins of it. I remember Papa had a machine that took the corn off the cob. That was fun. Of course, the pigs got the cob and all. The cobs made a very good fuel to burn in our stoves.

I can remember when we would take the wagon and go out on the prairie and pick up cow chips for winter fuel. It was quite a few miles to town to buy coal, especially with a team and wagon. There was no wood in that country, just cottonwood trees along the rivers and buckbrush.

One time Papa brought a man out from town with him to help with the harvest. I thought he was scary and was afraid of him. Anyway, while he was there we had a horse die. Papa had him help skin the horse. The hides at that time were always needed. That same night the man said he was quitting and going back to town. We were suspicious of him so we kept watch that night in case he came back for something or other. He was not seen again.

It was while we lived here that I started school at the age of seven. We lived three and one-quarter miles from school.

Papa got a two-wheeled cart with a shaft for one horse. Old Pet was the name of my horse, just head her down the road and she would take the middle of the road right to school on a morning and of a night straight home. There was one thing about it, my father set more gate posts at the schoolhouse than any other father, for I never could get around one without taking it out. This went on until Papa thought I could have a pony and ride to school.

He got a nice pony named Gent. I was too small to reach the stirrup so a strap had to be put in the stirrup to come down far enough for me to get my foot into and pull myself into the saddle.

There was a barn at the schoolhouse as so many of the children had long distances to come to school. There was room in the barn for hay and the farmers all put hay in for the horses. I carried a noon feeding of grain tied on the saddle horn for my horse. I also tied my lunch bucket there, you can imagine how my lunch would look after the bouncing around it had.

On my ninth birthday I went out to feed my horse at noon, and as I passed behind the horse next to mine the darn thing kicked me out of the barn. I still carry the scar over my right eye.

It was about this time that land in Wyoming was opened for homesteading. Papa drove a bunch of his cattle into Julesburg and loaded them on a train. He went to Denver with them to the stockyards there.

He had an auction sale at the farm. After that we loaded everything on a big Reo truck and went to Douglas, Wyoming.

We settled in the Hamilton Addition of Douglas. Papa got the section lines and all straightened out on the homestead land, Section 17, T39 R 71 Pat. 6/11/1925.

I started school in the fifth grade; Mrs. Brockway was my first teacher in a town school. I went to the South Grade School which was new then.

When school was out we would load up everything we would need at the homestead for the summer. We went north out of Douglas. There were creeks and a river to cross as we went.

One time when we came to the Cheyenne River, it had more water flowing in it than usual; we went ahead to ford it any way. When we got to the middle the wagon started to settle in the sand; the horses couldn't move it. There was an old couple that lived at the crossing so we asked the mister if he would help us across the river. He brought his team and hooked on to the wagon with our team and brought the wagon right across. He asked us to come up to the house and let the horses rest awhile, so we did.

He had dug back in the hill and made a nice sized room. It was so nice and cool in there. The lady was sick and layed on a very nice bed. It was all handmade of peeled cottonwood trees about the size of a person's arm. We all enjoyed our visit then went on to our destination.

The year the Ayres Natural Bridge Park was opened, Papa was the caretaker. There was a house for the irrigation supervisor to live in and right next door was a small old building. We camped in it that summer and I had so much fun! Papa did a lot of clearing brush and building picnic tables. We had our cow in a pasture and chickens enough for our eggs. Of an evening, we would fish; there was a big beautiful trout under a big rock just below the dam. Papa would try and try for him but he was too smart to be caught.

When the new section, the gym, was built onto the high school, Papa dug the basement. He had a team and a hand-trip slip. There was another man with his team, also.

At the time the new bridge was put across the North Platte River at Douglas, Papa ran the pump that kept water out of the places where the pilings were put. He stayed there day and night. I used to worry for fear the river would break the bulwark they had built to keep the pumps in.

The homestead was eventually proved up on, and that was where I really learned to respect the cactus plants. We would lay a blanket down on the ground in the shade of the cabin in the heat of the day. It would be much cooler. Sometimes it would be fun to turn somersaults, which turned out to be the wrong thing to do; anyway I always had to learn things the hard way.

In 1928, I married Fred H. Richter.

Eventually the folks bought the Heaton place on May 2, 1930 and moved out there. They ran the swimming pool for awhile and then closed it down.

George and Flora were divorced. On January 1, 1934, Flora married Floyd Crabb in Harrison, Nebraska.

George Smull passed away February 21, 1961; Floyd Crabb passed away March 30, 1970; and Flora Smull Crabb passed away September 2, 1980. The estate has been left to my four daughters: Nola Millhouser, Georgia Smull, Betty Roberson, and Burla King.

Smyth, Dave and Maud Family

My dad, David J. Smyth, was born in Portaferry, Ireland on Dec. 18, 1871. His parents were John and Mary Smyth.

Maud M. Smith, the daughter of Ed and Lany Eleanor Huss Smith, was born in Ringgold County, Iowa in 1880. She was my mother.

In 1898 my mother married David Smyth, who immigrated from Portaferry, County Down, Ireland at the age of fifteen. He had worked his way West on farms, the railroads, and in Wyoming he was a cowboy and a shepherd. He also labored at the Red Rock Stone Quarry, about eight miles from Glenrock on the Boxelder Road. Here he lived in a dugout.

My parents lived on a ranch downstream from where Ed Smiths lived for two or three years in about 1906 or 1907.

Dave and Maud Smyth went into the sheep business. Their headquarters were north of the Platte River on the old Eskew place. In 1914 they opened Smyth's General Store, the largest in town and carried an extensive line of goods, everything from caskets to cranberries, baby-chicks to bumbershoots, as Dad used to say. Dave had interests in the oil business and was one of the directors of the Glenrock State Bank. He retained his large land holdings and continued in the livestock business. He was a Justice of the Peace and a Converse County Commissioner. Dave was a Mason, belonged to the Odd Fellows Lodge and he and Maud were active members of the Episcopal Church.

David Smyth died February 19, 1947 in Glenrock, Wyoming. Maud died April 20, 1955, in Denver, Colorado. Both are buried in the Glenrock cemetery, as are Ed, Ell, Frances and Jay Smith.

Their first son, Hugh Raymond, was born on the Boxelder Ranch in 1899. In 1916 he was a member of the new Glenrock High School's first graduating class. He attended the University of Wyoming and served in the U.S. Army during World War I. In 1919 he married Helen Frances Fenex in Glenrock and went to work in Smyth's General Store. Their first child, Raymond Edward, was born in 1920. In 1926 the family moved to Chula Vista, California, where Hugh was associated with the Union Oil Company for many years. Another son, William David, was born in 1929. Both boys served with honors in World War II. Ray was a command pilot and served 28 years with the air force. Bill flew for the navy, including carrier duty.

In 1939 Ray married Phyllis Ousley. They are living the retirement life in Kailua Kona, Hawaii. They had three children, Nancy, Timothy and Cherie.

Bill married Diana Brulay, April 10, 1951. They live in Huntsville, Alabama, where Bill is in the oil business. Their children are William, Teresa, Jennifer and Laura.

Another son, Edward David, was born to Maud and Dave in 1905. He died in 1909 of meningitis and is buried in the Glenrock cemetery.

In 1911, I the third son, was almost born in a sheep-wagon, but Mother, by buggy power, made it through the sand hills to Glenrock in time.

Our early years in that wonderful town were happy ones. Family, friends, schools, creeks, rivers, mountains, basketball, church, picnics, girls, dances, Model T's, horses, branding, fishing, bicycles — these words retrieve golden scenes of that past.

The offer of a hashing job at the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity lured me to the University of Colorado at Boulder in 1930. There I studied business, organized a dance band, met and married Peggy Simpson of Denver. After college I entered the radio and television broadcasting business, originating the show Smythe's General Store on KOA, NBC for the West. We bought a farm on the Platte River, near Littleton. Here we raised three children, Peter Jr., Brooke and Shelley.

One sentence in my father's diary brings the song "Why Oh Why Did I Ever Leave Wyoming" to mind. He wrote: "After our son's college days the glare of the city had more attraction for them than the free life we had led, so I sold our holdings and moved to town."

I often wonder how our lives would have been changed, had we stayed. Young folks tend to make their own beds.

Snyder, Charles Thomas and Elsie

"Oh! Mamma look at the beautiful wild roses," exclaimed Catherine, as she and her mother, Elsie May, were on the Burlington train which was stopped along the river near Wendover on Catherine's seventh birthday, May 31, 1914. Catherine was so excited about the roses that the conductor got off the train and picked a bouquet for her. Soon they arrived at Orin Junction where her father, Charlie Snyder, met them with a team and buckboard. He had left Kearney, Nebraska, four months earlier to come to Wyoming to work for Jim Shaw. Jim Shaw was a former cowboy for the Snyder and Coffee outfit that trailed large herds of cattle from Texas to Wyoming in the 1880's. When Charlie was a little boy, he and his mother were on a train coming from Georgetown, Texas to Cheyenne, Wyoming in 1878. The train was stopped near Ogallala, Nebraska, to let a large herd of cattle cross the track to the river. Charlie was so excited when he saw his father with the cowboys driving the cattle that he fell out of the train window. Jim Shaw saw what was happening and rode up to catch young Charlie as he was falling.

After about two months the Snyders moved to Douglas to make their home. Jim Shaw said to Catherine as she was leaving the ranch, "You are a little girl now, but when you grow up I might not know you, so you must always kiss me when you see me." She always did. Charlie Snyder was State Game Warden for several years. Elsie Snyder was a dress maker. She clerked for A. R. Merritt Store, Bob Gentle's Golden Rule Store, the Douglas Mercantile Store, and Kettle and Layton Store. Catherine grew up in Douglas. She married Bill Nuttall.

Charles T. Snyder died June 8, 1928 in Douglas.

Snyder, George and Bessie Family

George Jacob Snyder was born in Hallsville, New York on May 15, 1878. He was baptized in the Universal Church in Victor, New York and spent his boyhood in Victor. He graduated from Boughton Hill School in Victor and attended Business College in Rochester, New York.

In 1899 he decided to go West, first going to the Pacific Coast where he worked in lumber camps. He came to the Douglas area where he engaged in the sawmill and lumbering business at Esterbrook. It was here that he met his wife, Bessie Marion French and they were married Dec. 6, 1903.

The couple made their home in Douglas and established the first steam laundry in town, which they operated until April 1906. The original sign which he had painted could still be seen just a few years ago on the building on South Second.

Their first two sons, George Johnson and Eugene E. were born in Douglas.

In 1907 he filed on government land north of Glendo and started his homestead. That land is now under Glendo Lake. During his first years in the area, he was engaged in dry farming and in the retail lumber business which later became the Foster Lumber Company.

In 1923 he was appointed postmaster in Glendo and he held that position for 22 years. While George was postmaster, mail was delivered in Glendo four times a day by train. During post office hours George took a mailbag to the depot and brought back all the incoming mail. That was in the day when postage for a postal card cost one penny — now 14 cents and that for a letter was two cents — now in 1985 it is 22 cents. A letter mailed in Glendo was delivered in Douglas in 45 minutes. In 1980 it took a day and sometimes two.

George kept the post office open six days a week and until noon on Sundays but if you found a package slip in your box on Sunday afternoon, you just drove to the Snyder home and George would return to the post office with you and give you the package with a smile. The post office stayed open late on Saturday evenings until the Sunday papers arrived and could be put into the mailboxes. This was a very real advantage for rural people who came to town on Saturday night.

George was a public spirited citizen and took an active part in the Congregational Church and social and political activities. He was Clerk of School District No. 8, from 1923 and continued doing clerical work for the school as well as for the town for many years. He was instrumental in incorporation of the town of Glendo and was its first mayor.

He was of Dutch-English descent. He liked music and dancing, home and family life. He disliked publicity and loved to garden and raise flowers. He was always thorough and painstaking in his work.

The first two of their children were born in Douglas: George Johnson, born August 21, 1904 who was married to Emma W. Bansept and Eugene Edward, born December 18, 1905 who married Margaret Kreidler. He passed away in 1974. The other three were born in Glendo. They were Lee Raymond, born August 25, 1908. He married Lula Case of Glendo. He died in 1976. Catherine Minerva was born February 27, 1910 and she married A. T. Covington. They live in Casper. Marion Elizabeth was born July 7, 1914 and she married Cleo W. Neely of Wheatland and are now living in Cheyenne.

Upon his retirement from the post office in 1944, Mr. and Mrs. Snyder made their home in Casper, where they lived until their deaths. George passed away May 19, 1951 and Bessie on August 25, 1965. Both are interred in Douglas Park Cemetery.

Sothman, Claus and Margaret

Claus and Margaret Sothman came to the United States from Germany in the year 1880. They had two small children, Kati (Mrs. Sherd HitsheW), born in Germany in 1877 and Anna, born in Germany in 1879. They located in Clinton, Iowa where John was born in 1881 and William (Bill) in the year 1883. About 1886 they put all their belongings into a box car of the Fremont, Eklhorn and Missouri Valley Railway train and moved to Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming. Claus was section foreman for several years. The house the Sothmans lived in was probably the only house in Keeline. It was called a "Grout" house.

Rosa Sothman was born in Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming in 1889. Emma Sothman was also born in Keeline in 1891.

About 1892, the Sothmans homesteaded some land which is seven or eight miles northwest of Keeline, called the "Sodie" Ranch. They moved from the ranch in 1899 returning to Iowa.

Sothmans rented a house in Manville several winters and sent the children to school. There was no school at Keeline or near the ranch then but later a school was built between the HitsheW and Sothman ranches. It was called the Chalk Butte School. Mrs. Pray recalls there was a prairie fire at the school. The children all helped to put it out by carrying water from the well.

Her mother nearly died of erysipelas when Mrs. Pray (Emma Sothman) was six years old. She wouldn't stay out of the room so she got it too. The doctor had to come from Lusk 35 miles away. After one visit he stopped at the George HitsheW ranch and told them Emma wouldn't live through the night. Mattie HitsheW went to the Sothman place, bathed Emma with soda water and cared for her and she made it.

Mrs. Sothman's brother, Claus Holtorf, lived at Lost Springs. His wife died there and left him with a daughter, Emma, and a boy by the name of John. They lived in Lost Springs many years after the Sothmans returned to Iowa.

William (Bill) Sothman returned to Converse County, Wyoming in 1903 and homesteaded on land between the George HitsheW place and the Sherd HitsheW place. In 1925 he sold his land and moved to Meeteetse, Wyoming.

Indians used to come to our place at the Sodie ranch and demand food. They especially wanted sugar, flour and meat. They would wait until the men folks left the house and come and say, "Man gone, we want food." Mother and we kids were scared to death of them. If we saw them coming in time, we kids would run and hide under the barn and leave Mother alone in the house. They would come right in the house; and if food was cooking on the stove, they would take the lid off and see what it was.

My mother had a large dog, Prince. She would call him into the house and hold onto him or he would attack them. They wanted her to put the dog outside but she knew they would shoot the dog.

One day some black soldiers on horseback from Ft. Laramie came by. The dog ran after them and they shot and killed him. That was such a sad experience, every one of the family cried.

William (Bill) Sothman cooked for roundups ranging from Big Lightning, Twenty Mile, Douglas, Gillette and South Dakota lines. There were no fences then.

Southwick, Hub and Edna

Hulbert B. "Hub" Southwick was born in Bradford, Pennsylvania in September 1876. As a young man he played in Minor League Baseball games and was always a great fan. He and his father came to Wyoming about 1900 where they drilled for oil in the Brenning Basin. He met Edna Willox in a boarding house that was run by her folks, the James Willoxs in Douglas.

He married Edna in 1901. They had four children, Rita, Kathleen, Margaret (born 1906) and "Hub".

We lived in Orin Junction where we had a hotel and boarding house, mostly for train crewmen. The Northwestern came as far as Orin then went back. Finally the Burlington was built. The hotel was torn down to make room for the railroad. We then moved to Douglas where Dad was night watchman under old timer, Malcolm Campbell — he then became Deputy Sheriff under Mr. Messenger and was active in the search for the famous train robber, Carlisle. While Dad was Deputy Sheriff, mother cooked at the flu hospital with my sisters and I helping during the epidemic in World War I. The city hall had been converted into a hospital (many died there). Old timer Clark Coleman was a patient.

Dad then went back to the oil fields where he was a driller and tool fisher. He worked for the Ohio Oil Company for years in Parkerton, then in Lance Creek, where he was killed instantly by a falling bit on June 6, 1924.

Later Edna married Albert Burns whom she later divorced.

She and her sister, Margaret Freeman ran the LaBonte Hotel dining room, then owned by Bill Delahoyde. Later they started Tippie Inn in Glendo during the building of Glendo Dam.

Edna resided in Glendo until she went to a rest home in Wheatland, Wyoming, where she died at the age of 97.

Two children also deceased; Margaret (Feb. 26, 1933) and "Hub" Jr.

Rita Merritt resides in Boulder, Colorado and Kathleen Martindale in Torrington, Wyoming.

Spaugh, Addison, Estelle and Mary

Addison Spaugh was born in Indiana in 1857. Ad's father went broke in southern Indiana, and moved his family to Kansas when Ad was a very young boy. The Spaughs moved from one miserable frontier homestead to another, dogged by poverty and hard luck. Ad's mother and two baby sisters died of "ague" in Kansas, near Topeka. A small amount of cash was brought home to the family by Ad, his older sister, Clara, and younger brother, Ollie, who worked at a boarding house some 15 miles from the family home.

By the time Ad was 11 years old, he was making a meager living for himself range-herding cattle, and working for Kansas ranchers. During the next three years many large herds of cattle were driven from Texas up the Chisholm Trail to the Kansas Pacific Railhead in Abilene. It was estimated that nearly one quarter of a million head were driven north each year.

Ad longed to be a "sure enough" cowboy, as did his brother, Ollie. In September of 1871, Ollie ran away from home to join a group of drovers who had brought a herd to Abilene, and were then returning home. Ollie was only 12 years old at the time. Clara, his older sister, felt that he was much too young for such an undertaking. Mr. Spaugh and his second wife were expecting their first child, so it fell to Ad to go after Ollie and bring him home. In the event that Ad was unable to persuade his brother to return, then Ad would be obliged to continue on to Texas to look after his younger brother.

Ad was overjoyed at the prospect of becoming a trail hand. Ollie was determined, so winter found both boys near Wharton, Texas, some 100 miles from the Gulf, working on a ranch for $30.00 per month.

In February 1872, the boys accompanied the owners to the Rio Grande country to buy up a trail herd. They gathered up 2,883 head of Longhorn cattle which cost an average of $2.67 per head. Eighty-five head of horses would be needed to accommodate the 10 drovers. Ad was 15 years old, Ollie was 13.

Before the Civil War the vast territory later known as Oklahoma had been given to the five civilized Indian tribes, to be theirs permanently and irrevocably. During the war, however, most of these southern Indians had been actively sympathetic to the Confederate cause. At the end of the war, the government punished these tribes for their sympathy to the South by giving the western half of their lands to the roaming horse tribes of the high plains. Across this empire of grassland, civilization marched in two great columns — the plowmen from the east, and the cowmen from the south. They were to become enemies later and struggle bitterly for the free land, but until the late 1870s they fought against a common enemy — the Indian.

The trace, called the Chisholm Trail, began near San Antonio, ran northward across the Red River, and into Kansas. Jesse Chisholm, half breed son of a Scotchman and a Cherokee Indian woman, was a trader. His trading wagons subsequently marked this trail into the Indian Nations. The drovers eventually found the trail with its excellent creek and river crossings and watering places.

The fee to the trailherds for the privilege of crossing the Indian lands was twenty-five cents per head. The drovers grew tired of paying the toll, and later swung west into the "wild Indian country" where they could trail northward for nothing — if their luck held out. It was not uncommon for entire trail herds and the accompanying drovers to be attacked and annihilated by marauding war parties.

A. A. Spaugh shearing crew

Four months later, the herd reached Abilene. The steer beef was sold to a buyer for $22.00 per head. He was not interested in the she-stuff. A man from the Wyoming Territory, who was interested in raising his own calves, bought the females.

Ad and Ollie returned to their family home, riding up on Texas ponies, with their new clothes and jingling spurs. Ad's father, doing a bit better now, but still very poor, convinced Ad that he should remain at home to help with the farm, and attend school during the winter. Ollie, it was decided, would return to Texas to work and contribute his wages to help support the family. For two years, Ad helped his father with the farming, and together they bought a small bunch of cattle. In early July of 1874, there was a plague of grasshoppers. They ate every living thing, laying waste to the countryside. Almost as quickly as they had come, they were gone. Where only a few days before there had been green fields of corn and rich hay fields, there was nothing. Ad and his father were ruined. Ad returned to Texas to find work as a drover.

Ad helped drive herds northward three more times. The last drive made to the Platte in 1877. At the completion of the drive in September, he headed for the Wyoming Territory alone.

Lying in the great triangle made by the forks of the North Platte and running from Ogallala, Nebraska west to the rockies was a cattle heaven of free grass and open range. Since the coming of the Union Pacific Railroad in '68 it had been filling up with Texas and Oregon cattle. The rich grass country above the North Fork in Wyoming Territory had been forbidden to the white man. It had been Indian and buffalo country, but now the Sioux war was rapidly being drawn to a close and the Indians were being herded to their reservations in Nebraska and Dakota. By 1877 adventurous cattlemen were preparing to invade the north country. Ad found work near Pine Bluffs helping with a fall roundup.

The Laramie County Stock Association, later to become the powerful Wyoming Stock Growers Association, was formed in 1873. The Association roughly divided the range into two great roundup districts. The various ranches would send representatives to each of these roundups to help gather the cattle, and to bring their own back to the home range. In the entire country there was not a single rod of fence, and therefore, when the winter storms hit the herds, they would drift before the icy winds until some natural barrier stopped them.

Ranch owners pre-empted quarter sections along creeks, or homesteaded springs and living water, but the grasslands were as free as air. Customs, and the law of "Judge Colt" gave an outfit sole use of the grass that its stream or spring controlled. Squatter's rights were fully recognized legal rights in the eyes of these cowmen, who stood ready with their armed retainers to enforce them.

The spring of 1879 found Ad punching cows in the Pine Bluffs country. The spring roundup was nearly over, when a group of visitors came to the camp which was located about twelve miles north of Cheyenne. Besides Alex Swan and Joe Frank, who owned a cow outfit near Cheyenne, there were H. F. Manville and James Peck, businessmen from Wisconsin, and a Mr. Bailey, accompanied by his daughter, Estelle. Mr. Bailey had come west in regard to mining investments, while Peck and Manville were planning to go into the ranching business. They had contracted for two thousand steers to be delivered on the Laramie Plains the end of July. They wanted to hire a foreman to go to the new range above the North Platte. This had been a red letter day for Ad. He took the job as foreman, but of greater importance was the fact that he had met his wife-to-be, Estelle Bailey.

In late August of 1880, Manville and Ad crossed the Platte at Fort Laramie. Ad urged Mr. Manville to buy a ranch in the Wyoming Territory, and subsequently he bought a ranch called the OW which belonged to O. C. Wade. Wade was a freight contractor on the Cheyenne-Black Hills line. He wintered his bull teams on the ranch on Old Woman Creek. The selling price for the outfit was $36,900. This included 1,200 head of stock cattle, 30 horses, all the buildings, equipment and the ranch rights. Ranches in those days were priced on the inventory of cattle and horses, not by the number of acres owned by the individual.

In February of 1881, Manville and Peck had tossed their own spread into a general pot that bore the formal title of the Converse Cattle Company. A. R. Converse, president of the First National Bank of Cheyenne, was putting up the money against 3,200 head of stock belonging to Peck and Manville, and 5,000 head owned by W. C. Irvine. The directors of the new company were A. R. Converse, president; W. C. Irvine, vice president; James S. Peck, secretary-treasurer; and H. F. Manville, general manager. W. C. Irvine's range was in the Antelope Creek country north of the Platte and west of the OW range.

Spaugh bought 50 shares of stock in the company, and was hired as foreman. Among his other duties, he was to try to locate and buy other outfits, since the company planned to own no less than thirty thousand head of cattle. They hoped that eventually it would become a "million dollar" outfit.

All that late winter and into spring Ad located and appraised various outfits that might be bought. The Horseshoe Bar outfit on the head of Lance Creek, the U Bar L near the mouth of Lightning, the Wulfjen outfit, the TJ Bar in the Harney Creek-Twenty Mile area, and the V5 Bar outfit on Little Lightning were purchased by the company. Altogether these totaled close to 25,000 head of cattle scattered over a range country that stretched from the Nebraska line for 200 miles west up the Platte to Independence Rock. North to south the combined range ran for 100 miles. Not one square rod in any of the ranch properties had been surveyed and every foot was government land, held only by the might of squatters' sovereignty, and tended by some fifty or sixty cowhands carrying firearms.

Custom held that each ten-mile square of country belonged to the outfit that had built a corral in its center. Ad sent men over to Lightning Creek to build corrals, one situated where Lightning emptied into Lance Creek, the second where Twenty Mile met Lightning, and the third at the mouth of Walker Creek. This enabled him to lay claim to fifty miles of range adjacent to the creeks. Local custom also dictated that unbranded cattle found upon your range belonged to you.

Ad's tasks were monumental. He must spread his men out over the prairie and bring the 25,000 head of cattle that the company had acquired during the year to the home range for the winter. He must as well claim as many mavericks for his company as he possibly could.

The Converse Cattle Company prospered, as did the other big ranches. There was plenty of grass, and the range was still understocked. In the fall of 1883, Ad and his men drove almost 6,000 head of beeves to the railhead in Valentine, Nebraska. Prices were good, averaging $50.00 per head. Ad reported almost 40,000 head wearing the now famous OW brand.

The winter before, stray stock had drifted southward from the newly opened ranges of Montana and the Powder River country. The problem of the spring roundup was a serious matter. The all-powerful Executive Committee of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association now divided the whole territory into 31 roundups, defining the limits of each, naming the roundup foremen and their assistants, and setting the dates for the starting of the roundups. The territorial legislature was little more than a roster of the names of the big cattlemen. The rules regarding the roundups and disposition of the mavericks were, in fact, the law of the land. It was deemed actually illegal for any rancher to undertake an unauthorized roundup. Other range customs were incorporated into territorial statutes.

Of all the thirty-one prescribed roundup districts, the most important from the standpoint of cattle numbers was 15. Following is a copy of the bulletin drawn up by the Association regarding this district:

No. 15: Commence May 15th at the head of Sage Creek; thence down Old Woman's Creek to mouth; thence to the head of Harney Creek, down Harney Creek to mouth, working Twenty Mile; work to Beaver Dam of Lightning Creek; thence to Cow Creek; thence down Snyder Creek to mouth; thence up Lodgepole Creek to head; thence down Black Thunder to Cheyenne River; thence up Cheyenne River to mouth of Antelope and tributaries to head; thence down Antelope; then work Dry Creek, Box Creek and head of Lightning Creek. Fall roundup to commence October 15th. A. A. Spough, foreman; Curtis Spough, assistant foreman to the mouth of Black Thunder. Lee Moore, foreman; J. B. Moorsee, assistant foreman, from mouth of Black Thunder to the end of roundup.

It is interesting to note that nearly all of the northern halves of present day Converse and Niobrara Counties, and the southern parts of Weston and Campbell Counties are included in this district.

There was, however, something subtle and ominous creeping over the empire of grass. As a boy on the Kansas frontier, Ad had seen railroads and homesteaders turn a free and open range into a land of barbed wire and plowed fields. He knew instinctively the power of this human tide, and was certain that nothing could stand against its mighty force. He tried to convince his directors that they should accept an offer made them by a foreign syndicate for one million dollars for their company, but his arguments went unheeded. The directors were confident that the golden years would last forever.

Ad became increasingly uneasy about the future. The cows were drifting further and further south in search of good grass. The range was overstocked, numerous homesteaders were coming into the area, and the grasslands were being fenced.

Range managers and foremen of the big outfits were not supposed to take up their own land or own any cattle, but Ad, experiencing a constant foreboding, felt he must start his own ranch or lose his opportunity altogether. He took up a pre-emption claim of 320 acres on the head of the Niobrara (Running Water) River. He sent word to the directors of the company informing them that he had done so, and that he would remain as foreman until after the fall roundup. The claim on the Running Water was located about 10 miles from the OW. Ad took up a tree claim of 160 acres, and a desert claim of 320 acres. Succeeding Ad as foreman was John Kendrick, who later became governor of Wyoming, and still later United States Senator. Ad sold his stock in the company to Mr. Manville.

In May of 1886, Estelle Bailey and Ad were married. He took a job as a cattle detective for the Wyoming Stock Growers, inspecting all beef sold to the butcher shops and to the construction camps now building a railroad called the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley from Chadron, Nebraska to the future town of Douglas, Wyoming.

Estelle named the claim on the Niobrara River Bel Pré (beautiful prairie). Since the house was not completed, Ad and Estelle spent the first summer of their married life living in the mining town of Silver Cliff which neighbored the present city of Lusk. The winter was spent in New York, where Ad worked in the office of his father-in-law. Estelle contracted consumption in February 1887. They moved back to Wyoming in the spring, hoping that the climate might prove beneficial to her health. Estelle died in the fall of 1887. She is buried next to her mother in Elmira, New York.

Although the death of his wife was a great tragedy to Ad, he was determined to continue on with his ranching business. He acquired more and more land and cattle. In 1909 he was married for the second time to Mary Ella Kern of Wilmington, Illinois. She was born in 1869 and came to Wyoming in 1891. Mary Ella died in 1928.

In 1917, Ad became engaged in the banking business along with his livestock business. He was a stockholder in banks in Manville, Keeline, Glenrock and Cheyenne. By 1940, Ad had disposed of all his land excepting the Bel Pré and the 77 Ranch. He was 83 years old.

Ad died in 1943 at her age of 86. He is buried in the Manville cemetery next to his second wife, and only a little distance from the house he had built on Bel Pré.

This account of the life of Addison Spough in no way does him justice. His humble beginnings are the foundation for the compassion and sympathy he felt for his fellow man. He was loyal, honest, hard-working, ambitious without being greedy, and truly a man "to ride the river with".

Spellman, George B. and Florence

I only know a very small amount about the life of Grandma and Grandpa (Florence and George Spellman).

George B. Spellman was born on Dec. 12, 1859 at Bloomington, Illinois. Florence Mable Phillips was born on July 23, 1866 at Greece, New York. They were united in marriage on March 19, 1884.

To this union were born nine children — Lucy, Lewis, Charlie, Jesse, Guy, Perley, Caroline, Marie and Alvin. The first eight were born at Emporia, Kansas and the youngest, Alvin, was born at Dunlap, Kansas.

They moved to Parry, Saskatchewan, Canada in July 1905 where they filed on a homestead. In 1911 George rented his farm to his sons and left the farm.

The family spent their winters in Los Angeles, California where George was a carpenter. In the summers George would go back to Canada to help harvest and thresh the crops from the farm.

I do not know the exact year, but in the early 1920's the family moved to the Bear Creek, Wyoming area and took out a homestead west of where the Manning boys all had their homesteads.

That must not have proved very fruitful and they moved into Douglas and bought a home at 118 No. 6th. George became ill and died at this home on March 25, 1928. Florence resided there until her death on April 3, 1933.

I know that they were devout Christians and were members of the Methodist Church.

Spellman, Henry and Annie

On our dry farm — 11 miles north of Lost Springs, Converse County, Wyoming — a new adventure and experiences began in 1914.

My father, Henry L. Spellman, wife Annie, and daughters, Dolly, Minnie and Bertha, moved from Kelso, Washington where we had lived for several years. My father filed on his homestead June 1914, on 320 acres, a half section, arriving by train, September 10-15 of 1914, living in Lost Springs a short time and moving on to our little dry farm October 1, 1914. There we camped in the big army tent until Dad finished our little log cabin of two rooms. We were so thrilled with our little log cabin — our permanent home on the prairie until Dad built another room - kitchen, moving in just before Thanksgiving. There we celebrated our first holiday with a big dinner — a venison roast. Delicious! There was great love in our family.

Our closest neighbor was one quarter mile to the north joining our little dry farm. They were friends that moved to Lost Springs, the same time that we moved, to settle on their homestead. They were from Kelso, Washington, also. They were Frank Young, wife Millie, son Edwin, daughter Alice. Their ages were the same as ours so we did have a wonderful friendship. They were great neighbors and so helpful for our community. We neighbors had to stick together as there was plenty of unexpected trouble that arose. The cattlemen and sheepmen were very bitter to see the settlers come in, as they had miles and miles of open country to run their cattle and sheep, which meant money in their pockets.

Now the little dry farm didn't look so prosperous, just rocky hills, gulleys, sagebrush, cactus, with long thorns. If we kids fell down, we could pick cactus for days. Also timberland, wild range cattle, deer, antelope and porcupines — some ate them for meat. But not me! Rabbits were plentiful, sage chickens, coyotes, bobcats, packs of grey WOLVES, many, many rattlesnakes lived on the prairie.

For the settlers it surely was rough going.

But my father and mother were determined to stay and fight it out. AND THEY DID!

The stockmen really took advantage of the POOR settlers. The cowboys drove their cattle through our little crops, destroying everything. In the fall of the year at roundup time, they were very destructive cutting our fences, killing our dogs, by poisoning them with strychnine. Our watermelon patch was completely destroyed to bits by the cowboys riding their horses through it. As time went on more settlers came in. That surely helped us.

The sheepmen were more helpful as they had herders for their sheep of 1000 head to a band of sheep. Once in a while they would give us part of a mutton to eat, and that surely helped out, but Mother raised good gardens to keep our table. We also had chickens, pork and wild game and that was great, also finally got some milk cows for our butter and cream. We had plenty of food.

There were no schools, but finally got enough kids to start one, Dolly, Minnie and Bertha Spellman, Edwin and Alice Young, Walter and Frances Hoge. Our first teacher was Mrs. Edith Stark. A building was leased from the "Sunset Mine" which had been an active coal mine at one time. Our first school days were held there. Ed Stark and Edith were lovely and helpful neighbors to the west of us about one mile. They were also homesteaders.

Getting to school was another problem, as my father had to take us to and from school each day. Many wild range cattle roamed the hills, and only just a cow path to follow. Finally a wild cowboy had a bright idea, that my father should buy a pony for us to ride. He said he had a perfect gentle one for kids, so Dad bought the pony. Mother put us on his back and started us to school, but the old pony had another idea, he bucked us off, saddle and all. We were pretty shook up. Dad had to keep taking us to school. Then later our next teacher was Lillie Meinzer. She was a wonderful teacher. The parents got together and got a new school house built in the northwest corner of my father's little farm. There we went to school and had only about one quarter of a mile to walk and no range cattle to look out for. There I graduated from grade school in May 1922. More families moved in having children of school age, Frank Vanderwalker, Mike and George Freeland, and Sylvia, Ralph and Audrey Young.

Friends and neighbors got together — planned to have Sunday School — a fine preacher said he would come to each home Sundays and have Sunday School which was great for the community. It was just in summer time, as winters were too cold.

My father worked for the TJ Ranch to help out. It was owned by Mr. Ad Spaugh of Manville, Wyoming. He was a big sheepman, having several bands of sheep and hired herders to look after the sheep, 1000 to a band. It surely was a terrible loss for the sheep and cattlemen when those big blizzards hit. I shall never forget the big one in 1922. It started raining in early May, filling all of the gulleys full of water. Then it turned into snow on top of that. Drifts were so deep that one could only walk by trying to find the high places where the wind had blown off the snow. This herder, Joe Martinez, was a good herder, but couldn't get to his sheep as it was drifted under with snow. He had his sheep bedded down close to his wagon. He stayed at our house until daylight, then Dad went with him to check on the sheep and to find there had been seven grey wolves there and had killed over 700 of his band of 1000 head of sheep. It surely was a sad sight. Also this storm had killed thousands of cattle and other livestock. The hills and valleys were covered with cattle that had starved and frozen to death.

After this storm the stockmen were broke. Many other snow storms were remembered for many years.

A daring wild cowboy — Henry "Sug" McGowan chased down and roped a grey wolf from his saddle horse. The wolf put up a wicked fight, but "Sug" finally shot him and sold his beautiful hide to a fur buyer. This was a very dangerous experience, as grey wolves were fast runners and vicious. Grey wolves run in packs and I had never heard of them attacking man, but would kill any livestock and horses.

At last my father bought a team of horses and wagon, which was great for we had to go to Lost Springs at least once a week for our supplies, staple foods and kerosene for our lamps. It was a twenty-three mile round trip, leaving early morning and arriving home late afternoon. The horses were tired and hungry. Dad always took good care of them putting them in the barn and giving them grain and hay and in winter kept them in the barn.

As time went on more and more settlers moved in, which was great as they were all good and helpful neighbors and friends. Most of them are gone, some passed away and moving to other states and towns.

For entertainment, barn dances were held in the fall of the year before the barns were filled with hay. The fiddlers were paid by taking up a collection and friends would bring sandwiches and pies and make coffee, which tasted delicious around midnight. Some of the new settlers would have a dance in their homes before they moved in, some served oyster suppers and school teachers also held box suppers, which was a lot of fun, too.

I married Louie Meinzer. Dad (Henry) died June 6, 1938.

Spellman, Jesse and Elizabeth

When Jesse Spellman was a teenager his father, George B. Spellman, left Emporia, Kansas and moved to the prairies in Canada and settled near Parry, Saskatchewan where he (Jesse) grew up. There Jesse met Elizabeth Atkins. She was from Dunlap, Ontario, Canada. With her brother, Jim, and sister, Matilda, they settled near Pangman, Saskatchewan. She worked on the cook wagon for the threshing machine that George owned.

Jesse and Elizabeth (called Lizzy) were married in Pangman, Saskatchewan on Nov. 12, 1912. They heard of land in the Wyoming area opening for homesteading. They applied for and got a quarter section in Converse County seven miles southeast of Shawnee and eight miles southwest of Lost Springs. Both towns were thriving and growing at that time. The railroad also went through there. Jesse's uncle Henry Spellman lived fourteen miles north of Lost Springs near the timber. The two of them cut logs for Jesse's homestead house. Jesse, my father, set the logs up in the daytime and went after more logs at night. It was nineteen miles with a team and wagon. As soon as the house was finished the family moved in. They started breaking sod and built a sod barn with walls about two feet thick.

It was a large barn with a hay loft on top. There were two double horse stalls on each side of a drive through alley plus stanchions for five milk cows on one side and an oat bin on the other. This was a very warm barn and when the stock were inside it seldom froze in the winter time. He also built a garage and chicken house out of sod that was partly dug into the side of a hill. All of the rafters were made of poles and covered with tin. When I remember the house it had been sided with lumber so I didn't know until years later that it was a log house. After a few years he was able to lease additional grass land and had a start in cattle.

In the winter of 1918 Jesse and his family of his wife and five children moved to Manville, Wyoming, where he bought a truck and hauled pipe to the oil fields at Lance Creek to finance the summers on the farm. There was a terrible flu epidemic. Two children, Lyda a twin girl, aged five years, and a boy, Walter, aged four died and were buried in Prairie View Cemetery southeast of Lost Springs. In the winter of 1920 and 1921 we moved to Casper, Wyoming, where Dad worked in the Standard Refinery. There was a terrible blizzard and we moved back to the homestead to feed the cattle. I can remember the snow covered the fences and lots of the neighbor's cattle drifted into the gulleys north of our house and died there for lack of hay. Some were completely covered with snow.

Land was hard to get around there so Jesse traded for a larger place five miles west of Orin Junction. My brother, Byon, (the remaining twin) and I were ten and eight years old and drove a team of horses on a wagon following Dad on another wagon. We moved the cows by trailing them on horseback and hauled the hogs in a wagon box as well as corn to feed them. We still had the truck and hauled the feed and corn in the truck.

This was a Denby truck with hard rubber tires, an open cab with curtains covering the door, and presto gas lights. It traveled about fifteen to twenty miles an hour. Two ton was considered a good load. In wet and muddy roads we had to wrap log chains around the drive wheels to avoid slippage. This move was about fifteen to twenty miles and took considerable time.

The house wasn't as good as the log house we left but we fixed it up and made it liveable. We boys pumped water for the cows at the spring about a half mile from the house. On hot days the cows just drank and drank and we got so tired pumping we would chase the cows away but they wouldn't stay and came right back. We hauled water in a barrel on a sled pulled by one or two horses for drinking and household use. On wash days we would get two barrels of water which was dipped from the spring and pulled up with a rope on a bucket. It was quite a trick to get the bucket to hit the water so it would fill up instead of just floating around.

Dad would trade horses a lot to get finances; also he would trade one broke horse for two broncs so we were always breaking horses to the wagon. Some would kick so we had to lie on our stomachs to hitch up the horses. Some were balky, some would strike with their front feet and some would run away so it was never safe to be around them but we were very careful and were never hurt.

In 1925 we went to Douglas Grade School in a Model T truck bus which started at the Fred Duran place where they picked up George Duran, Harold Schellinger, Wendell Clay; then to our place where they picked up Byon, Helen and me; two from the Stock place; from Irvine, Virginia and Bob Eddy; Fern, Eva and Edward Dorothy; then the Brock kids, Bill, Tom and Tootie and Bob; then Velma and Earl Silver and on to town. The snow got so deep the first winter the farmers had to pull the bus from one place to the next with four head of horses hitched to the front of the bus. This only happened a few times.

About this time the radio came on the market and we would all get in the sled under a blanket with a lantern at our feet for heat and drive over to the neighbors who had the first set in the neighborhood. We listened to jazz through ear phones, one person at a time for a few minutes each. There was a lot of static and squealing on the set but it was wonderful on the clear, cold nights.

We had a light plant that was run on carbide gas that had to be changed about every six months. We bought the granules in hundred pound drums, poured them in a hopper and filled it with water. A few granules dropped in the water chamber made a gas which raised a large bell which created pressure to feed the lights, hot plate and iron. Some of the people bought 32-volt light plants that used gasoline that charged batteries for energy and some had wind chargers that charged the batteries. Any one of these seemed wonderful when they were used for a while.

There was a drought starting in 1926 and crops were getting short. Mother wanted to be near some of her family so in the fall of 1927 we moved to Canada along the Saskatchewan-Alberta border where Mother's sister and family lived. The sister's name was Mary and she was married to Steve Weir. They had two boys and a girl about our age and we really enjoyed having cousins and family for a change. The renter on the Wyoming place wasn't going to get the crop harvested so we came back to Wyoming in 1930. The crops dried up for lack of rain and what we did raise wasn't worth much. We had one hundred fifty head of light pigs weighing about one hundred twenty-five pounds dressed. They were only worth five cents a pound dressed. We would butcher ten or twelve on an afternoon and Dad would load them on the back seat of our 1926 Chevrolet and take them to Casper and peddle the meat a few pounds at a time. We finally got them all sold but didn't have much money left. We had 800 acres of wheat and cut seven wagon loads of bundles from a low spot by the house. One year we sold four rail cars of wheat for twenty-five cents a bushel and collected three-fourths of that. We stored the rest figuring the price would have to come up. By January first the co-op wanted some money for storage so Dad told them to just keep the wheat but they said the wheat wasn't enough to cover the cost of storage.

In the fall of 1934 they had a sale and moved to Washington state. Dad always wanted to farm and intended to buy land in the Pendleton, Oregon area. But it was winter so we went over to Portland, Oregon, and bought two run-down places to repair and sell. It turned out that no one who wanted a house had any money so he couldn't sell them in time to raise a crop in the eastern Oregon country. When the defense of the coast programs started up these places finally sold. In 1936 I came back to Douglas to a dryer climate and away from all the crowds. During the war Dad worked in the shipyards out of Portland. My brothers and sisters stayed with them and still live in that area.

On January 6, 1948, Dad married Fern Clay Duran; they lived on a farm near Winner, South Dakota. My mother passed away April 24, 1962 in Vancouver, Washington. Dad died in Winner on July 31, 1969. Fern Spellman lives in Fruita, Colorado.

Spracklen, Frank and Ruby

Frank was born on August 29, 1890 in Glenrock to George H. and Wilmina Jane Bricker Spracklen.

After marrying Ruby Newell, daughter of Gus and Elsie Newell in 1910, Frank bought Guy Newell's ranch on the East Fork of Rutherford Creek.

Ruby and Frank's children were Mabel, Helen, Frances, Elsie, Frank, Dorothy and Ruby.

Frank worked in sawmills in the area and on the local ranches, breaking horses for several of them. In 1924 he had a shingle mill making shingles for the many homestead houses in the area.

Frank and Ruby's brand was F-5. After a few years they sold their ranch to Lisle Pexton and moved to a homestead over the mountain a mile to the west. In 1927 Frank sold this place to the Pextons and moved away. The draw where they last lived is still called Spracklen Draw.

Frank died on May 20, 1943 in Redding, California. Ruby did on March 17, 1953, also in Redding.

In a few years they moved to Chadron, Nebraska. From there he worked for the railroad as far north as Thermopolis, Wyoming. Two infants died while he was on this job.

George and Wilmina homesteaded on Upper LaPrele Creek. The homestead was east of the Sullivan Ranch on what is now called the Spracklen Draw.

The children of George and Wilmina were: John Simon (born Sept. 20, 1883 in Belle Plain, Iowa), Charles Vernon (born June 12, 1885 in Chadron, Nebraska), Frank Marques (born Aug. 29, 1890 in Glenrock, Wyoming), twins: Willard Ross and Willis Richard (born in Douglas, Wyoming on Aug. 20, 1894), Druzella (born Apr. 8, 1900 at Beaver, Wyoming), and Guy (born Nov. 15, 1898 at Beaver, Wyoming).

Wilmina died in 1901; she is buried at the Pioneer Cemetery, north of the town of Douglas.

George sold his ranch and moved to Kansas but returned to Wyoming and then moved to Montana. He remarried and had one step-daughter. He died in Glendive, Montana in 1927.

John married Gladys Braae, daughter of Andrew and Hattie Braae. They lived on a homestead on the east fork of Reid Creek. It was south of where Charles Pexton lives now. After selling to C. D. Zimmerman in the 1920s the family moved to Sandpoint, Idaho to be close to Gladys' mother. John died June 26, 1957. Gladys is living in Washington.

Charles married Hulda Olin, daughter of Erick and Birtha Olin, in 1908. Charles or Vern as he was known, worked for the Fred Anthony dray firm before they moved in 1914 to a homestead northeast of Douglas on Sand Creek not too far from Bear Creek. Their children are Charles, Marvin, Grace, Mae, Elmer and Lester. Charles

Spracklen, George and Wilmina

This story begins in 1863. I, Patrica Magee, do not know my great grandmother's name but she lived in Mt. Vernon, Ohio. Her husband, a soldier for the Union Army, had been severely wounded and died during the Civil War.

She met a lady in the post office, named Sara Bricker, and her daughter Wilmina. The Brickers later moved to Belle Plain, Iowa and bought a farm.

Mrs. Spracklen stayed in Ohio and raised three sons: George, John and Charles. In 1881 Mrs. Spracklen died and son George went to Iowa looking for work and found the Bricker family.

George and Wilmina fell in love and married in 1882.

Willis R. Spracklen and Douglas Spracklen, 1930 died Jan. 31, 1938, and Hulda May 17, 1962.

Frank married Ruby Newell. (See Frank Spracklen story).

Willard died at the age of one year and a half and is buried in the Pioneer Cemetery.

Guy married Bessie Smith on June 30, 1927 in Billings, Montana. He also homesteaded near the Charles Pexton place, later moving to Douglas where they operated a restaurant and a trucking business until moving to California where he found work in the defense factories. Three children were born to them, two were twins. They both died in Nevada. Guy on Oct. 17, 1978 in Sparks.

Druzella was put in a convent in Cheyenne when her father went to Kansas, later she lived with the Rice family in Glenrock and lived with her older brother, Charles V. and his wife for awhile before her marriage when she moved to Montana. She had a beauty shop for awhile before her death Aug. 22, 1974.

Willis married Mildred Poirot, the daughter of Emile and Nevada Poirot. Their homestead was on Indian Creek located south of where Tim Pexton lives now. Willis served in World War I while with the Fourth Company, First Battalion of the 164th D.B.

Willis and Mildred's children are: Quentin "Bud," Patricia, George, Richard, Douglas, Willis A. and Eugene.

School was held at the Mills Place nearby to the Spracklens. It was here that Quentin and Patricia were taught in the first grade by Margaret Southwick.

In about 1927 Willis and his family moved to North Horseshoe Creek west of Glendo, Wyoming. School was held in a rural school nearby. In 1934 the family moved to Glendo to let the older children go to high school. After living there they moved to a place located on Horseshoe Creek where the county road makes the first crossing going west. It was here that two tragedies struck the family. The first was the death of Eugene who died on Feb. 29, 1935 of scarlet fever. The other tragedy happened on May 30, 1935. Pat Spracklen Magee tells about it in the following narrative:

"It had been a very rainy spring and the ground was saturated. We did not know there had been a cloud burst on Horseshoe Creek west of us. The people living on Macfarlane's ranch warned the people below by phone letting them know of the wall of water coming down the creek. As we didn't have a phone, the man living up above us didn't have time to tell us about the water before it reached us.

"The time was six or six thirty p.m. My father and mother went out to milk the cows after we ate a light supper. My brothers Richard, Douglas and Willis and I were washing the dishes. My other brothers, Quentin and George were taking the calves out to another pasture after bucket feeding them.

"All at once we heard the roaring and looked out the window toward the corral. Mother and Father were letting the milk cows out of the gate as the water was already floating the cows around inside. They rushed to the house to take care of us. The water filled the basement and the floors had raised until it was like trying to climb a dome to reach the front door. As we left the front porch, it fell off the foundation.

"We managed to reach the county road but the water was so swift it swept us off the road into the barrow pit and into the fence on the lower side. I received scratches on my ankles and thighs. At this point it was decided that each one of us would take one of the boys and try to get out in pairs because if we stayed all together we would all drown. I took Richard, Mother had Douglas and Father took Willis. We had no time to see what was happening to each other as we were trying to save ourselves as best we could. Richard and I were swept to the left with the water over waist deep, the current was very swift. Richard had cramps and was partly unconscious. I had lost one shoe and to keep my footing I dug the heel of the other shoe into the ground. I was holding Richard's head above water and praying for help. I was doing all I could do.

"In the meantime my two older brothers were working their way around to come in from the north to get us. They got to us in time to help us out onto drier ground and they went on to help Father and Willis who had passed out from the cramps. I pushed and pulled Richard toward our nearest neighbor, who had come to help us. By this time Richard had passed out completely. They took him in their car to their house and then came back to help Mother and Father. They worked over Willis and Richard all night to bring them back from their unconsciousness.

"It was not until daylight that I was told that Mother and Douglas had not been found. After daylight they went back to look for them and found them bound by the wire from the fence hooked to a tree. They were still together. They were buried beside my brother Eugene, in the Glendo Cemetery.

"My mother and I had decorated Eugene's grave on Memorial Day. My mother missed him very much and I have always felt she knew somehow that she would be with him sooner than any of us knew. She was so sweet and loving that day, more so than usual. She was a wonderful mother and taught me more in my first 15 years than some girls learn in a lifetime. This teaching was a great help to me as I was to manage our home until I was married in 1938 to Ray Magee."

In 1941 Willis sold the ranch to Bill Morton and moved to Douglas where he bought the Plains Motel from Clark Bishop. He also had a little grocery store where he sold groceries and gas. Willis later married Marguerite Goodwin White Roe. Willis died on Sept. 8, 1974.

Springer, John and Henry

After going West to Idaho in 1879 from Sullivan County, Missouri by wagon train, the Springer brothers, Henry (born 1860) and John (born 1863) decided to head east. In 1882, Henry was married to Alice Bottenburg in Green City, Missouri. They then returned to Idaho, but shortly afterwards headed back east again and came to the Laramie Peak area settling two miles east of John Newell.

Mrs. Henry Springer was a little woman weighing eighty-seven pounds and four feet eleven inches tall. The story is related by her granddaughter that "Alice was so short she had to knead her bread on a chair seat."

John Springer was married to Alice Bottenburg's sister Mary. Mary died of "Valley Fever" shortly after moving to Wyoming.

The Springer brothers were horse breeders and traders having traded with the Umatilla Indians in Idaho, then trailing them back to Nebraska where they sold them to the cavalry at a post near present-day Bridgeport. While living in Wyoming they pursued the livelihood of breeding and running horses.

In 1890 Henry, Alice and daughter, Odessa, along with John Springer, moved to the Mitchell Valley in Nebraska.

Steffen, John and Louise Family

When the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad came through to Wyoming in 1886, J. J. Steffen came with it. J. J. had studied and served as an apprentice to a pharmacist and now was ready to set up a drug store of his own.

Towns were set up along the railroad route and Douglas and Lusk were founded the same year, 1886. J. J. set up a pharmacy in Lusk in 1886 and the next year, 1887, he set up one in Douglas where the R. D. Pharmacy now stands.

J. J. Steffen was born May 10, 1855 in France and probably came to this country as a child. He met and married Louise E. Ireland in Muscotine County, Iowa on February 21, 1878. Their first son, Murry J. Steffen was born in Muscotine County, Iowa on January 12, 1880. He lived to the age of eleven years, two months and five days and died in Lusk, Wyoming, March 17, 1891. Other children of J. J. and Louise were Benton J., called Ben or B. J., who was born in Adair County, Iowa, September 20, 1883; Lorraine, who was born November 24, 1887 in Lusk, Wyoming and Louis Vernon, born September 12, 1894 in Douglas, Wyoming.

After J. J.'s drug store in Douglas was pretty well established, he sold the one in Lusk. He called the Douglas store, the Steffen Drug Store. Years later, when young Ben joined him, it was called J. J. Steffen and Son Drug Store. The Palace Fountain, a real fancy soda fountain was located in the basement of the Steffen Drug. It was one of the popular meeting places of the town, especially for the young folks.

J. J. Steffen took a very active part in the affairs of Douglas and the state of Wyoming. He was an officer in the Rough Riders of Wyoming. Few people realize that the Rough Riders of Teddy Roosevelt fame usurped this name from the Rough Riders of Wyoming, the Second U.S. Volunteer Cavalry that was officially organized at Fort D. A. Russell in Cheyenne in 1898 (Fort Russell is now Francis E. Warren Air Force Base). The Rough Riders were part of the Wyoming National Guard, started during the Spanish American War and organized under Colonel Jay L. Torrey, an Embar, Wyoming rancher. The Rough Riders of Wyoming were made up of "cowboys, ranchers, expert riders and ropers, hunters, miners, horseshoers." All splendid specimens of physical manhood joined the riders. It was originally organized against the Indian threat and cattle and sheep disputes.

J. J. Steffen was an officer in the Rough Riders of Wyoming group. His son, Ben, was a member also, as was Arthur Cook, a brother of Mrs. Ben Steffen.

J. J. also belonged to the Douglas Cornet Band from the time it was organized in about 1887. From the town paper of February 25, 1887, "The band boys covered themselves with glory last night at their first annual concert. It was held at Drury's Opera House and after the concert followed a ball and refreshments."

A quote from the "Budget" of February 28, 1912, "Harry Ruhl was up from Lost Springs last Thursday to help at the Band ball. Mr. Ruhl has missed but one dance out of the 21 the boys have given, and that was the year he was in Indiana. Mr. Ruhl and J. J. Steffen are the only two charter members of the Douglas Band organized shortly after the town started, that are still here."

Besides a good musician, J. J. was a great collector of western artifacts, mostly Indian artifacts. In fact he was recognized as having the finest collection of Western and Indian artifacts in the U.S.A. He finally sold his collection to a museum in Denver.

J. J. was a Mason of the 32nd degree. He was a member of four lodges, Casper, Cheyenne, Douglas and Lusk. He was also a Shriner and traveled all over to meetings.

He was mayor of Douglas in about 1910 and also served as county commissioner.

He and his family also were part owners of the Opera House on Third Street at one time. From the paper of November 28, 1900, "Mr. J. R. Slaughter yesterday sold to Messrs. A. D. Cook (who was Mrs. Benton Steffen's dad) and J. J. Steffen, the opera house on Third Street for $800. The new proprietors plan to make it into a modern showcase (for emodramas, plays and programs, etc.)"

J. J. and Mrs. Steffen's son, Benton J. married Ethel M. Cook. Their children were Florence Louise (who never married) and Janet L. who married Bernard Van Dine. Their children were John and Jane Van Dine. Another daughter, Beatrice C. Steffen, married Bernard's brother, Richard. Beatrice and Richard have one daughter, Janet, who married Robert Harris. Their children are Joyce, Greg, Judy, Julie and Richard Harris.

J. J. Steffen died April 24, 1914 in Douglas and his wife, Louise E., died September 29, 1923.

B. J. Steffen died June 26, 1952 in Douglas. He was a very quiet man in comparison to his father, J. J. His idea of a good time was to go to his cabin in the mountains. He wasn't much of a joiner.

Lorraine Steffen worked many years in Steffen Drug Store. She died at Douglas, March 20, 1975.

Louis Vernon Steffen, a veteran of World War I, lived in Douglas up until the time he married and moved then to Kansas where he lived until his death on October 18, 1972.

Steinle, Adolf and Louise Family

Gustaf Adolf Steinle was born in 1872, a year after the formation of the Second German Reich of which Otto Von Bismark was Chancellor. Adolf, as he was always called, had an older brother and two sisters. The Steinle family was considered well-to-do in Germany, and Adolf must have had a good education, for he spoke French and possibly Italian as well as his native German. Later in life, he would pick up a Swiss dialect and broken English. He was trained as a cooper, a maker of wooden barrels, and completed his compulsory military training in the German cavalry. On September 27, 1897, he married Louise Benninger. Their first business venture was in owning and operating a mountain resort, probably near Ehrenstetten, Germany. Louise prepared meals for the guests. She'd taken cooking lessons while spending time in England and when someone ordered trout, her young husband would go out and catch one with his bare hands. Later, Adolf and Louise moved to Basel, Switzerland, where he worked as a superintendent in a wine distillery. Their sons, born in Germany, were named Ernest William and Frederick Otto. Two little girls, Elisabeth Hedwig (later known as Betty) and Rose Helen, were born to them in Switzerland.

In May of 1911, Adolf, his wife, and the children said goodbye to the old country and family. Their ship was the Chicago and they were headed to the land of opportunity, America. The sea was rough, and Louise was seasick during much of the crossing. Ernest and Frederick, ages 12 and 11, found life on board very exciting. They discovered that they could spread their coats to the wind, set their feet and "sail" across the icy decks. They had to watch for the ship's officers, though, who tried to prevent this dangerous pastime. The boys must have been underfoot a lot, for once a bothered seaman held Fred out over the sea by his suspenders and threatened to let go! Upon arrival in America, the Steinles stayed briefly with one of Louise's cousins in Sandusky, Ohio, then moved to Findlay, Ohio, and finally to Omaha, Nebraska. They remained there for five or six years. Adolf had immigrated with the intention of settling in the west and he was interested in both Wyoming and Montana. Wyoming won and in 1917 Adolf traveled there with Ernest, now 19. Adolf filed claim on a section of land with a small lake about two miles north of what is now Bill, Wyoming. They built a dugout on the north shore of the lake, and soon Louise, Fred and Rose joined them. Betty came later after she completed some courses she was taking at a business college in Omaha.

Louise later looked back on their times in the dugout as some of their happiest. Although it was crowded and had a dirt floor, it was cool in summer and warm in winter. Twelve year old Rose, who had been very frail, attended school a mile and a half away. Her mother said years later that the sweetest sound she ever heard was that of Rose scraping the bottom of the pan to get the last little bits of food.

They didn't stay in the dugout for long. Adolf was a man with ideas, and he had the energy and ingenuity to make them work. His first project was a nice home. It was built of sunbaked homemade adobe bricks. They tromped the mud and straw with their feet, and Adolf used a hot water heater tank with a lever-run plunger to press out the bricks. The whole family took turns providing the lever power and it must have been hard work because both girls complained about it years later. When the house was finished it had a basement, four rooms upstairs, and a porch on the south side. The place would later boast a barn, workshop and ice-house, all built of rock gathered by hand and transported by wagon. Ice was cut from their lake in winter, stored in the ice-house and used in summer to make ice cream and other treats. Since the Steinle place was a convenient day's drive from Douglas, overnight guests were very common. They found the Steinle ice especially refreshing.

The family dug their own coal from a coal mine about eight miles north, on Woody Creek. Louise kept a big garden, lots of chickens and milk cows to sell the cream. It took Adolf three days to go to town; one to get there, one to do business and let the horses rest, and one to drive home. In a pinch, the trip could be accomplished in two days. There was mail service twice a week, and the Steinles sent cream and eggs to town with the mailman.

Of course, Fred and Ernie were not young men to enjoy all work and no play. They built a boat for use on their lake, and dances and other entertainments were easy to find. They would saddle up when evening came and join the other young folk riding to where the fun was: at Dull Center, Dry Creek or String Town (six to eight miles southeast of Dry Creek). When they arrived back home at daybreak they would find their father up and organizing the day's tasks for them. Adolf didn't allow "dumbheida" (foolishness) to get in the way of work.

Inevitably, the children began to leave home. Betty soon went to Casper to make use of her secretarial skills. She had met George Boyle while at business college, and she found that he was also working for the Standard Oil Co. where she was a secretary. He came into the office to do his paperwork and he proposed by dictating a love letter to her. They were married on June 26, 1920. She was 18 and he was 31. They moved to Mills, Wyoming where they owned a general store which Betty ran while George continued to work at the refinery.

With the homestead spruced up to their satisfaction, the Steinle men began to buy cattle. To obtain money to do this, Adolf, Ernie and Fred took turns working at the refinery in Casper. Casper was booming and jobs were always available. They stayed with Betty and George and helped in the store part time for their keep. Once during this time, Adolf walked home from Douglas through several inches of snow in order to be with his family for Christmas. It was during one of Fred's stints there that he met his future wife, Mildred Parkhurst. They met at a St. Patrick's Day dance, a meeting Fred claimed to have engineered. It seems he had watched her while hiding behind the counter of the Boyles' store and decided that she was the girl for him. Three months and ten days later, on June 27, 1923, they were married. Both Fred and Ernie had bought relinquishments on homesteads as soon as they were old enough, and Fred had obtained a leave-of-absence from his in order to earn money to improve the homestead. When that time was up, the couple moved out to the homestead four miles north of Dry Creek until they could prove up. A few months later, the Douglas bank that held their entire savings of $170 went bankrupt and plans had to be changed. So early in 1924 they moved back to Casper where Fred would work in the refinery. A close neighbor and friend, Chris Neilson, gave them a ride to town in his one-seater, one-half windshield car. For some reason, they had a large supply of chewing gum along and, as it turned out, it was a good thing because the gas line had a leak that had to be plugged. So the young Steinles, Mildred, perched on Fred's lap, chewed madly all the way to town, stopping every few miles to replace the gum plug that the gasoline kept dissolving! While living in Casper, Mildred made the journey to the homestead alone in order to be there the week out of every month necessary to prove up on the place.

Rose was the next Steinle to leave the nest. At 18 she was working at her sister and brother-in-law's store. At 20 she married Hedrick Chromer Nelson, aged 25, at her parents' ranch. They too took up residence in Casper. Hed enjoyed hunting on the ranch and even ran some cattle.

About this time, Ernie began to court Mary Riehle, the oldest daughter of a homesteader five miles to the south. They met at an area party and Ernie was immediately impressed. That summer, Ernie spent a lot of time with the Riehle family, but Mary had two younger sisters; and it wasn't until they all spent a day at Natural Bridge (west of Douglas), that it was certain just which girl was being courted. There Ernie carefully presented a wild Mariposa lily to each young lady, a single blossom each for the two sisters and a double blossom for Mary. They were married three years later, a long wait made necessary by Ernie's determination that things were to be just right for his bride. His homestead relinquishment was six miles north of the Dry Creek Hall on the Cheyenne River. With the aid of a horse-drawn slip he dug a hole to build a basement house with thick stone walls.

He farmed a field near the river and bought a few cattle. An extra cash crop of navy beans, hulled by hand in the evenings, paid for Mary's diamond engagement ring. Mary kept busy too, working at home and in Douglas taking care of the old Aunt Lucy of Mrs. Brenner. She used the money to buy dishes, linens, and other necessities. The wedding was set for May 2, 1928, to be held at the parsonage of the Methodist Church in Douglas. It rained hard the night before, and the wedding party had great difficulty getting through the 30-some miles of mud to town and had to back over the "divide" ten miles out to accommodate the gravity fed fuel supply. They did succeed in tying the knot, and when a charivari party arrived at their place some days later and the rifles began to sound, Ernest joined in with his own rifle, just as delighted as could be.

By this time, Adolf and Louise were grandparents many times over, and their daughter, Betty, had died of blood poisoning from a boil.

In the early 30s there came a series of drought years. When Adolf's house well became too low to draw water for the livestock, (the lake having gone dry some time before) he had to drive them to Dry Creek for watering every day. Both he and Ernie had to put up thistles for hay because it was the only thing that seemed to grow. All this discouraged Adolf from remaining at the ranch, and in 1933, when the Billings, Montana, brewery reopened after prohibition and advertised for experienced help, he applied and was accepted. He soon built a large home there.

At this time Ernie and Mary were the only Steinles remaining in Converse County. They milked cows to sell the cream in town during their early years and raised crops including potatoes, beans, corn and cane. They ran cattle and managed Adolf's place for him as well. During the dry years, Ernie hauled water a quarter mile to keep a garden alive, and they survived. Bad times would come again in future grassless years, Ernie would attach a wide boom of burners to a propane tank which in turn was mounted on a trailer. Pulling it behind a tractor, he burned the spines off acres of cactus, and the cattle ate it and grew fat.

In the early '40s they were briefly joined by other members of the family. Fred's boys, Dick and John, moved to their parents' homestead. Dick had bought a bunch of old ewes to lamb in the spring, and John, still in grade school, was along to keep him company. The ewes were mountain sheep and didn't do too well, but not for lack of ingenuity on Dick's part. He fixed a saddle-like harness with a tall flag waving from it. This, tied to various ewes' backs, was intended to scare the coyotes away. His design for false teeth for the old ewes was thought worth patenting. In this he took after his grandpa. Adolf would tackle anything from building his own tractor to fixing his wife's false teeth, and succeed. Aware that he would soon be drafted, Dick sold out after a year and the Ernie Steinles were alone again.

The end of WWII enabled Ernie and Mary to buy surrounding land and the ranch grew. Adolf built his wife a retirement home in Billings. Rose was divorced from Hed Nelson and moved to Billings too. In 1949 Adolf sold his stock to Ernie. Adolf and Louise continued to love Converse County though. On a visit during the '50s they chanced to find the fair in progress and many of their old neighbors in town. They so enjoyed renewing the old ties that they felt this was their real home and asked to be buried in Douglas. In 1957, at the age of 81, Louise Benninger Steinle died. Adolf stayed with Ernie and Mary for a short time, then with Fred and Mildred on the Bates Creek ranch they had bought in the Casper mountains. He passed away on January 14, 1960, one month to the day after his 88th birthday. Both were buried in Douglas.

In Converse County, Bill, Ernie and Mary's oldest, married Connie Whiting and soon they bought the old Rupe place just four miles east of his parents' ranch. He ranched on his own and worked for his parents. When Ernie began to fail, their younger son, Carl, moved to the ranch to help care for him. When Ernie passed away on October 8, 1979, the Steinle ranch was put into a partnership involving Mary and her three children, Bill, Carl and Betty.

Stephens, Edward and Letty

Edward Joel Stephens was born March 21, 1892 in Fayette County, St. Elmo, Illinois. He was the oldest of seven children having two brothers and four sisters. His parents were Joel Julius Stephens and Edna Ross Stephens. He spent most of his early childhood around Mattoon, Illinois.

Ed's father, Joel Julius, a charter member of the brotherhood of railroads, was dragged across the Illinois Central Railroad yards by the cow catcher on a train engine. He was too badly injured to be of any use to the railroads and having no pension and no disability pay he decided to go west. So he shipped his son, Ed, cows and furniture in freight cars to Arkansas and the rest of the family went by covered wagon. From there they went to Oklahoma, where they spent a year or so. Then, due to lack of jobs and malaria being so bad, they went to Steamboat Springs, Colorado. Here they met up with the Fisch family who they discovered had also come from Oklahoma and that they too had rented land from the Indians and had lived close to where the Stephens had lived.

In 1909 they all left Steamboat Springs and came to Casper by covered wagon. They crossed the Platte River just below the Pathfinder Dam which was being constructed.

On December 25, 1912 Ed was united in marriage to Lucy Arletta Fisch, "Letty" as all her friends called her, was born at Parkensburg, West Virginia on February 3, 1895. She was the only daughter of Harriet Bennet Fisch and William Clark Fisch. She had five brothers. Her brother, Herman Fisch, had homesteaded in Deer Creek Park and has lived around here all his life. She also had two brothers who were burned in a gas explosion as young men in West Virginia.

Ed and Letty homesteaded in Deer Creek Park, where two children were born, Melvin and Helen. At this time, Ed worked in a chrome mine in Deer Creek Canyon. While he was away from home a mountain lion got up on the roof of the house where Letty was staying with her two babies. Needless to say this gave her some anxious moments.

They moved to Casper in 1916, Ed and his father freighted one winter to the Salt Creek oil fields. After the moved to Casper, four sons were born, William Clark, Chester Joel, Wesley and Edward Daniel. Two of the sons died in childhood from diphtheria.

Ed drove a dray one winter for Townsend in Casper, then went to work for the Standard Refinery, where he worked for 23 years.

In 1934 they bought a ranch on Deer Creek where the family moved to a couple years before Ed quit the refinery and made ranching his full time occupation.

Ed and Letty did a lot of traveling; they both loved to fish. Ed liked his gardening and hunting. Letty also liked her fishing, painting and fancy work.

When Ed was a teenager he had typhoid fever. He lost all his hair and when it came back in it was pure white.

They made their home on Deer Creek where Ed was a member of the Masonic Lodge #22 and charter member of Converse County Farm Bureau, president of the board of the PMA and a census taker for the county.

Letty died in 1958 and Ed in 1963. Their son, William, died in 1972 and their daughter, Helen, in 1976.

Stevens, James and Alma

James Madison Stevens, the son of Logan and Rose Stevens, was born September 4, 1898 at Page, Nebraska. James was named after his grandfather, James M. Stevens who served in the Civil War and was with Sherman when he marched to the sea. James spent his childhood at Page and as a young boy he moved with his parents and sister to Broadwater, Nebraska where he attended grade school and high school. He moved to the Douglas area in late May, 1920 and filed on a homestead in the Dry Creek Community, north of Douglas.

Alma Copenhaver was born at Pawnee City, Nebraska, May 23, 1896. James and Alma were married on June 2, 1920 in Douglas. They lived on James' homestead for a few years and then they bought the Verse Store. After selling the store they bought a farm west of Douglas. He worked several years for the LaPrele Ditch

Alma and Jim Stevens, 1927

Company and then he worked for the County Assessor as a deputy assessor. They sold the farm and moved into Douglas in 1962.

James and Alma enjoyed fishing. They spent many hours sitting on the banks of the Glendo Reservoir waiting for the fish to bite. They also liked to hunt elk in the Dubois area. James collected John Deere cast iron trucks and tractors. In early years James threshed for neighbors. Alma was a school teacher and taught for several years, before and after she was married. She was active in club work, church, Sunday school, etc. She liked sheep and took care of bum lambs on the homestead.

James died on March 20, 1982.

Stevenson, Lulu Valora Rhodes

My mother, Lulu Valora Rhodes Stevenson, homesteaded for 14 months, from September 10, 1918 to November 10, 1919 on 150 acres about a mile and one half west of Lost Springs, Wyoming. She was not the one who originally filed on the land and would never have heard of it if she hadn't gone to Wyoming with my sister, Athol.

In 1917, while we were living in Sholes, Nebraska, my father, Brougham Stevenson, bought a 120 acre relinquishment a few miles northeast (I believe) of Lost Springs from the station agent whose wife refused to go to Wyoming to homestead. That fall we moved to Council Bluffs, Iowa where Athol was teaching school for her second year, but not enjoying being a teacher, Papa offered her the relinquishment. She accepted it happily, took a few days off from school to go out to file on the land and when school was out in the spring, set off for Wyoming.

Mama, who was in poor health, went with her not only so that Athol wouldn't be alone but also in hopes that her health would improve in a different climate.

Papa (a landsalesman), Charlotte (my younger sister), who was in high school, and I, Emeline Stevenson, who was working for the C. E. Laustrup Music Co., stayed behind.

Shortly after they arrived, Mama heard of another relinquishment for sale. This one only about a mile and a half from town, and she persuaded Papa to buy it for her so that she could prove up on it while Athol was proving up on her land.

So now they had two homesteads, neither of which had any improvements. This was during World War I. Many men were in the service and the ones who were left were swamped with work. Although some carpenters had just come to town they had so much work ahead of them that it was August before they finished Athol's house and Mama was not able to move into hers until the tenth of September.

In the meantime they stayed with the Woodwards who lived just out of town. Mr. Woodward, manager of the lumberyard, soon went into the service. Mrs. Woodward, whose baby was less than a year old, was running the post office. Almost immediately she asked Mama to be Postmistress and she agreed. I'm not sure what arrangements they made in Washington about it but Athol wrote in her memoirs years later, "Mama loved being Postmistress and as such she was loved. She knew everyone and their problems and was a friend to them all."

Mama's house 12' by 24' was not a typical homestead house, since its inside walls were plastered and its outside walls sided and painted white. But neither was it a typical middle class city house. It had two rooms with a space between them that served as a pantry at one end with a door opening into the kitchen and as a clothes closet at the other end with a door opening into the room which was a combined bedroom and sitting room.

Cooking was done on a two burner kerosene stove that had an oven that could be set on top of the burners. There was a small table in the kitchen to eat on. There was a minimum of things to work with. For example, I remember that she used a pop bottle for both a rolling pin and a potato masher.

In front of the house was a well with a pump and in back a coal shed and toilet. On wash days clothes were draped over sagebrush bushes to dry.

Athol wrote about that first fall, "The winter season had now opened and people were getting ready for cold weather. An almost steady stream of wagons taking coal home from the Onyon Mine passed along the road the other side of Mama's fence. About once a week the little train from the mine chugged into town, the tracks ran just back of Mama's house, and if we signaled they stopped and took us to town and brought us home. This was a real favor because if we bought five pounds of wheat flour we also had to buy five pounds of rice and five pounds of cornmeal and/or five pounds of rye or barley flour. (This was a war regulation.) It also enabled us to carry home the stack of Omaha papers that had accumulated together with the very welcome letters."

People were understandably confused when one spoke about the Onyon (pronounced onion) Mine but that was the name of the mine owners.

Mama and Athol came home for Christmas and I was so thrilled by their stories of Wyoming that I would have liked to go back with them, but I didn't feel that I could afford to leave my good job at the music store. I had started out in September at $15 a week but had two raises and was now getting $17 a week. But later it occurred to me that since I knew a certain amount about music, perhaps if I went to Lost Springs I could work up a music class there teaching piano. Mr. Laustrup assured me that if I did go he would have a place for me to work when I returned. So late in April, on a beautiful day, I boarded the train going west.

Since it was an overnight trip there were Pullman accommodations and although Aunt Bess had packed a generous lunch for me, I chose to go to the diner for dinner. Aunt Bess had also packed a big box of food, a roast of beef, a fried chicken and a cake, as a gift for Mama and Athol, all of which was later to be most welcome.

During the night, an unexpected blizzard came up and the train stalled several miles east of Chadron, Nebraska. The diner had been taken off after the evening meal so food for the passengers was a real problem. I gladly shared what food I had but generous as Aunt Bess had been it didn't even feed those in our coach. People in the other coaches had to wait until some of the hardier men made their way through the snow to Chadron and brought back coffee and bread toward noon.

By late afternoon the railroad company had found transportation to move all of us to Chadron where we were given dinner, sleeping quarters and breakfast at their expense. We were a day late getting into Lost Springs.

As soon as I could, I set about organizing a music class and soon had a sizable one. One day a week I went by train to Manville and another day of the week, also by train, I went to Shawnee. To reach pupils on farms around Lost Springs I either borrowed a horse from William Vandegrift, whom Athol later married, or the Buick of Earl Cannon whom I was dating.

In May, as soon as her school was out, Charlotte joined us. With her came a cousin, Hazel Ayre, who was her age.

I always remember that summer as something special. We all felt the charm of Wyoming. The skies seemed bluer than Iowa skies. There was the delicious smell of sage when we brushed the bushes as we walked to town. The meadowlarks put an extra note in their little song that their eastern cousins forgot or had never known. Occasionally we'd see a coyote and always we'd hear them barking at night. Life was pleasant. There were horses to ride and picnics and weekend dances to go to. Many evenings a group of young people would gather on or around the stoop at Mama's front door and sing

"Till We Meet Again", "The Alcoholic Blues" (this was during prohibition), "Good Morning Mr. Zip, Zip, Zip" and other songs of the era. One of the boys brought a banjo to add an accompaniment.

Hazel went home in a month but Charlotte stayed on through the summer. One day Charlotte and I had an invitation to visit a friend, Elva Randa, for a week. She had a homestead about 40 miles away, near Oil City. We rode out (for a dollar a piece) with Mr. Coggeshell, a homesteader who once a week took mail in his truck past Elva's place and on to the Duell ranch.

The mail truck was a small open one, the seat was uncomfortable, the road was bumpy and we stopped at every homesteader's mailbox along the way. We were glad when we reached Elva's place but our trip was not to end there. Elva came out to the truck, said she knew the Duells well and had decided that we would all go on to their ranch and spend the night.

Unexpected as we were, the Duells gave us a warm welcome. That night we four women slept crosswise on their one bed and the men used bedrolls out in the yard.

After breakfast the next morning I took some pictures. I am enclosing one of the mail truck. This was all 64 years ago and my memory is vague about who the extra people are. Maybe the Duells had neighbors or maybe since this was the end of the mail line, the Duells had a post office of sorts and someone who came by for his mail joined us. After the pictures, the mail truck started on the trip home and we went with it.

Our stay at Elva's one room tar paper shack was interesting. We visited Oil City, not much of a place. We went sage chicken and rabbit hunting, talked over old times in Nebraska where we had once all lived and listened to worn records on her little phonograph. Her steel needles had finally worn out and she improvised by using cactus spines. It sounded all right but the music was soft. Charlotte and I went home on the next mail truck trip.

We managed surprisingly well to get along without either a horse or a car of our own. Generally we walked back and forth to town since it was only a mile and a half. Occasionally we took advantage of the little coal train but there were problems trying to use it. We never knew what day or what time of day it would make its weekly trip. When we saw or heard it coming we had to hurry outside to signal and then make our way through a long stretch of cactus and a barbed wire fence to the tracks. Then we stood in the cab to ride to town.

But in August, Papa wrote to say he had gotten a new car and would send the Maxwell to us by Charley Frey who would drive it as far as Chadron. Aunt Bess, he said, would be with him. Mama and I went by train to meet them. Charley took a train home and I was in charge of getting us back to the homestead. What a trip it was. Roads were almost non-existent in places, high centers were a constant menace and we kept getting stuck in deep sand. Often, the poor old Maxwell couldn't make it up a hill and somebody had to give it a helping hand. Mama wrote this letter to papa about it:

"Lost Springs, Wyoming
August 20, 1919

"Dearly Beloved,
Emeline and I went to Chadron Sunday afternoon and Coggeshell's mailtruck. It ran north from Lost Springs.

got back to Lost Springs Tuesday night. Charley had some things to get fixed on the car and we didn't get started until 4 o'clock. We got off the road three times with only a few posts and seeming cowpaths as guides. Bess and I had to push up several hills and had two days of walking and pushing. We are awfully glad to get the car and the girls have gone over it until it shines. Seems awfully good to have it out here and if you could drop in the whole family would be complete."

Now that we had the car it was of course much easier to get from place to place but it came too late to be as useful as it would have been earlier. Charlotte went back to Council Bluffs the week after we got it and Aunt Bess left soon afterwards. Life was changing. My music class dwindled when school started; and the friends who were Charlotte's age, that we had enjoyed so much while she was there; went back to school too. People began getting ready for winter. Again there was a steady stream of wagons going by with coal from the Onyon Mine. Athol was getting ready to prove up on her place after the required 14 months.

On October 3rd Mama wrote this letter to Papa.
"Dearly Beloved,

We are having our first snow storm, but the snow melts almost as soon as it touches the ground. We are all pretty well and tomorrow we go to Douglas and Athol proves up. Cody Shippen and Joe Wanek go as witnesses. Emeline goes south this p.m. for three music scholars and tomorrow to Shawnee for six. The new bank is nearing completion and Butterfield expects to move in Sunday. We were all there for dinner last Sunday. Mr. Bowell says this bank has already paid a dividend of 60%. Elva spent Sunday with us. She is fencing her whole place and next year expects to rent it for $300 for pasture. She and Elsie have sold much garden truck at the oil fields."

Athol went back to Council Bluffs shortly after proving up but I stayed with Mama until after November 10 when her 14 months were over. She proved up on her place with no contest. Like Athol she paid $1.25 an acre and the land was hers.

We were sorry to leave Wyoming. Mama's health was better there than it had been for years and we had made many friends. But it was time to go home, time for our whole family to be together again. Mama leased the land for cattle grazing, left the Maxwell with William Vandegrift who was later to be my brother-in-law and we returned to Council Bluffs by train.

Stevick, Harry and Agnes

In 1971, my dad, Harry Harrison Stevick, wrote a fairly complete account of his early life, and life after he and Mom (Agnes Harvey Stevick) homesteaded fifty-eight miles north of Douglas on Antelope Creek. Their two homesteads and many homesteads that they bought from others, became known as the "Antelope Creek Ranch". I have had to shorten Dad's story quite a bit, particularly of his boyhood days in Cheyenne, and around the Albin country, where he spent much time with his cousins, the Malms and Palms, because of limited space, but I have tried to include some of the highlights and many stories about the days on Antelope Creek. From here on, until 1971, is an account of Dad's (and later) Mom's life in Wyoming and Converse County.

"My first recollection, I believe, is of my mother, and that is just as it should be. As I look back, she was always a wonderful woman. We lived along side of the old Cheyenne and Northern tracks, definitely the wrong side of town. In those days my father drank heavily, as did his father before him. As I look back, I can understand my grand-dad. He had served a five year enlistment in the Civil War, part of which he spent time in a Confederate prison camp. Both Dad and Grand-dad worked in the harness and saddle shop of J. S. Collins & Co. — later Collins and Morrison, when I was a youngster.

"We lived in a so-called house on Bent Street, owned by a woman by the name of Mag Heaney. She owned numerous non-descript properties on the north side of the licensed restricted district, and many of her properties were rented by women who operated without "benefit of landlords". Mag came around regularly when the rent was due, to collect. She was a real old hag, but many times she brought a bag of "penny candy". There were huge candy replicas of bananas, strips of licorace — likerish to us) and plugs of licorace which made ideal chewing tobacco — and we chewed and spit just like the big boys did.

"All the while my Mother was trying to make a home for my sister and me. (Dad is referring to his older sister, Hazel, mother of Dr. W. A. Hinrichs of Douglas. His younger sister Alice was not born yet.) Dad had two express wagons. In those days Cheyenne had fifty saloons, of many classes, and six retail and wholesale liquor houses. Apparently Dad took care of the deliveries for the last mentioned, and took part of his pay in drinks. There was never enough money to go around so Mother always had a little garden in the backyard. She also had a few chickens, and bought some produce in the fall such as cabbage and potatoes to store in her outdoor cave. This type of produce was hauled into Cheyenne by wagon, by farmers in the Greeley and Ft. Collins area.

"The meat came from a butcher named Adam Louck (one of the jurors who found Tom Horn guilty). Mr. Louck appreciated the hard times for us and for a fifteen cent large soup bone, would always give Mother a tongue, heart, liver and kidneys, which were considered waste in the good old days.

"The first recollection I had of any unusual activity was the summer of 1898 when Colonel Torrey's Rough Riders loaded out on the train, in back of our house, to go to the Spanish American War.

"Mother always tried to give us kids a bit of "social life" too. We had numerous tea parties. The table might be an empty box from the store, but there was always a table cloth, and the refreshments could be frightfully simple, but afforded a special occasion.

"At this point I should add that Mother had been a pastry cook in the home of Senator Warren at the time of her marriage in the late eighties. She quit when she married Dad. For a wedding gift Senator Warren gave Mother and Dad a nice set of dishes from his store, the Warren Mercantile.

"Then came time for school, and my sister and I enrolled in the Corlett School — the West Side School. There we had a fabulous first grade teacher — May Brookhart. She was the first woman with whom I fell in love. An elderly neighbor lady, Auntie Lewis (no relation) encouraged us in our school work by giving us an occasional silver dollar for particularly good work. There were many kids in our neighborhood who started school the same time as we did — Fred (Fritz) Lebhardt, Bob Hanesworth, and Frank Vaura, all of whom did very well in life. Fritz was a court reporter (until his early death) and Bob ram-rodged Frontier Days for much of his early life, later transferring to the Wyoming Stock Growers Association. He also published quite a book, "The Daddy of Them All." Vaura became quite a western artist.

"About this time Dad decided we should move to a better part of town. He bought a nice little house on East 24th Street. Dad and one of his drinking companions, Walter Stoll, decided I should become a lawyer. Stoll had been the County Prosecutor who had been instrumental in getting a conviction on Tom Horn. Incidentally my family all felt Tom Horn was framed and should never have been hung. My sister and I were there when he was hung. Well, I worked for Stoll for one summer, reading law, to become a lawyer. It soon became apparent that this was not for me, and I had no respect for Stoll, so I found another job, in the BeeHive — a forerunner of the Five and Ten. I became the advertising manager of our high school paper, and as such, I met a pioneer manufacturing jeweler, Hugo Buechner, perhaps so fine a gentleman as I have ever known. I became his apprentice for three years.

"In the course of my school years, I got a thousand dollars together, all the money in the world, so I decided to go farther north in Wyoming to start a ranch. First I landed in Newcastle, in 1916, where I got a job at the LAK. Mr. Rinehart was managing it for the Ohio Oil Company. I made a deal for a little ranch for $6400.00. I did not have sense enough to talk to any well-informed person, but one day the banker, Mr. Beard, called me in, and told me how wrong I was. Well sir, I did not close the deal, but came down on Antelope Creek where I found the homestead on which I filed.

"World War I was getting a good start, so I wanted to go make the world safe for the Democrats. I was in the North Sea three weeks after I joined the army, and in France very shortly thereafter. I was hospitalized about the first of November 1918, in the Aerial Gunnery Base hospital at St. Jean des Monts, Vendee. The man in charge had been a coal company doctor at Gebo, north of Thermopolis. I returned to America on the hospital ship, the Manchuria. I was one of the first thousand to be returned, and one of two to be returned to Casper.

"Now began the long, long seige of trying to regain my health. I talked with so-called specialists from New York City to Colorado Springs. Finally the Good Lord directed me to the Mayo Clinic, where the difficulty, which was acute, was eventually relieved. It is partly due to those wonderful people at the Mayo Clinic that I am alive at this time.

"About this time I began to think about the ranch which I always hoped to have, but I had to replenish my funds. Upon my return to Casper the town gave a pretentious banquet for her two returned soldiers, and at that banquet a girl presented herself to me who had known some of my Douglas friends. To make a long story short, we were married (this girl was Myrtle Reaville) and the Salt Creek Oil Field seemed the best opportunity for getting ahead. This was the beginning of the Salt Creek boom. I got work on a rig building crew, and my wife went to work in the Company Commissary.

"This marriage ended up in the Divorce Court, and I felt the sun would never shine again. In the meantime I had transferred to drilling tools and tried to work myself to death. Then I was pretty well floored. I was working on a wildcat well at Nine Mile Lake, north of Casper when I had the mishap which again sent me to Rochester and back to the army hospital, Fizsimons General.

"About this time I met Agnes Harvey, at that time penmanship supervisor in the Casper-Midwest school system. She married me June 12, 1932, right out of Fitzsimons General. I was about so big a physical wreck as one could find.

"Mama (Dad always referred to his wife Agnes as Mama) filed on a homestead before we were married and her homestead house consisted of a Midwest Oil Co. garage 10'x20' galvanized iron on 2'x4' studding. I had boarded up my own house when I went away to war, and it had been broken in to, and the entire interior removed, including doors and windows. The day of our marriage, we went to our homesteads, where we started building the ranch, known as Antelope Creek Ranch.

"We bought nine head of cows, nine calves, five heifers and a fine bull, all purebred and registered, for the sum of eight hundred fifty dollars. These cattle were bought from Greenacres at Uva (near Wheatland) and we bought the brands from Greenacres also — the open A half box, and lazy half diamond half box.

"The Veteran's Administration had classified me as permanently and totally disabled, but when I refused to present myself for examination, I never got another check from them. We had no fences and no pastures, and it was necessary to ride every day to keep our few cattle in the country. I always had to carry a pair of crutches on the horse which I rode.

"At this time the bank with whom I dealt, the Wyoming Trust Company of Casper closed its doors and transferred my account to the First National of Casper. When I attempted to borrow money the man who headed the bank literally sneered at me when he found out how little we had. Now I was up against finding another bank who would loan us money.

"I talked with a pre-World War I friend and his wife, Willard and Emma Saul. They said for me to talk to a banker friend of theirs the next morning, who turned out to be Henry Bolln. All through those depression years he dished out money to us as though it grew on trees. All concerned felt I was a great deal better than I ever was, and that knowledge prompted me to try harder and harder to live up to their expectations. Progress was frightfully slow, but we kept gaining a little each year. There just wasn't any such thing as easy money. Mr. Bolln retired and his place was taken by Wesley Wiker, who continued to be so generous with us as Mr. Bolln had been.

"Many of the homesteaders in the country had droughted out, and left the country, offering their places at the going price of a thousand to fifteen hundred dollars a section. It happened that we were among the very few people in the country who could borrow money; therefore we kept adding a section here and a section there, as our stock required, and our needs grew. At the same time there were neighbors who were extremely jealous of our ability to borrow money, and some of them added to the many difficulties which presented. Some of the nearby homesteaders who hung on, but had nothing, ran quite a bit of stock — usually on us. We fenced and rode from daylight until dark, in an effort to keep them out. I might add that we were one of the few people in the area who hired surveyors, mainly L. C. Bishop, later State Engineer of Wyoming.

"In the course of all these happenings, we had a little boy. In the Good Lord's wisdom we could not keep him, and I felt the sun would never shine again. Mama's faith carried her through and the Good Lord helped me. Then the Honey came, the finest strongest baby girl who ever lived. Anyone who ever knew her can say she is the finest and most competent woman who ever lived.

"For the most part the time on the ranch was a particularly happy time. We never felt that we owned the land at all — only that the Good Lord allowed us a time on it and that He expected us to leave it better than we found it. That I am sure we did. We had many antelope and many wonderful friends who came to hunt, during the season, though in later years we had to try to limit the hunting, after Highway 59 went through, so more people traveled into the country. Mama fed everybody who came along, at all hours of the day and night, and many people spent nights with us. We were never alone at the ranch. In the summer we had my sister's three kids, (Dr. Bill Hinrichs of Douglas, and his sisters, Bonnie and Catherine) my war-buddie's kids from New Jersey and others. The place was alive with wild riding kids. We did not want the Honey to grow up alone.

"All the time our cattle were increasing in number and quality. We fitted approximately twenty-five head of bulls and heifers which we took to the National Western Polled Hereford Show and Sale in Denver. We placed a pen of three to the Grand Championship and the top bull was retained by one of the best Hereford breeders in the business to mate with registered horned Herefords. The Honey was the ramrod, and since they were Grand Champion, they made the cover of the Polled Hereford World — with the Honey, of course.

"I should mention that I was a real old-fashioned boy. I felt that cars and trucks were just a passing fancy, and that there would again be a market for horses. We raised hundreds of beautiful Belgians and many fine Arabs. When I saw they were hurting a thirteen section pasture, we disposed of over two hundred Belgians at one time. We gave away sixty head of the best Belgians and sold one hundred sixty-five to one man who shipped them to France after World War II. They all left the ranch at one time. The Honey and I gathered these horses and corralled them without help — a tremendous tribute to her ability as a horseman, and I question that she was twelve years old.

"She does not remember when she was first on a horse — not a yearling, I am sure. First I would throw her up over my shoulder and she would sleep. Later she rode in front of me in the saddle. We took many a wild ride. When she was four she got her own horse, so ornery a little Shetland as ever lived. He had raised a dozen kids and knew every trick in the book. Many of our friends (Dr. E. W. Robertson, Charlie Bauman, Charlie Miller, and Mr. Engdahl, to name a few) knew we had traded for this little horse, and before we were up in the morning, the gifts started rolling in, including a new saddle, blanket, bridle, chaps, halter and boots. Many a day we would ride sixty miles and the little Shetland, Peter, would come in fresher than my second horse.

"Then the Honey was old enough to go to school, and we had no roads, bridges or schools, so Mama taught her, and without a question, Mama was the best teacher in the world. When the Honey competed with kids from the outside she was always ahead of them. All the while that Mama had school on the ranch, I'd take the Honey away from her school whenever I needed help, and that seemed to be most of the time. It wasn't long until she felt that nobody could do things like she could do them. She was an excellent horseman and a natural with all kinds of stock."

Dad goes on, in his story, relating so many interesting experiences on the Antelope Creek Ranch, but space is lacking. Dogs were a big part of our lives — Teddy, Bobo, Tippy and Goldie being among the most important.

From 1950 or so, on, Dad had several cancer operations, and a knee and hip operation at the Mayo Clinic, always making a very good recovery until the very last one, in June 1979. Some of the fine doctors who operated on him were often guests at the ranch. Dr. Stuart W. Harrington, a senior surgeon at Mayo's was one of our favorites, and of course Sister Mary Corona, of St. Mary's Hospital. Sister Corona was a fine friend to Mom and Dad, and spent many of her vacations with them, as well as taking them under her wing when they were in Rochester. Sister Corona is just as good a friend to us, and is a frequent houseguest.

I went on to high school in Douglas, graduating in 1953. I went to the University of Wyoming for two semesters, then back to my favorite place — home on Antelope Creek. In September 1954, I married Warren Wuthier, from a ranch family near Banner, Wyoming. The following spring our son Warren Stephen (Steve) was born. We were at Antelope Creek until 1958, but it did not seem that we were to stay, much to my sadness.

About 1960 Mom and Dad sold the ranch to Bob Lloyd and his family from Casper. The neighbors, Floyd Jr. and Mathew Reno own it now. My folks moved to Douglas and built a lovely home at No. 1 Ash Drive, supervised by our old friend, and long-time helper at the ranch, Bunny (C. A. Miller). Bunny was an excellent carpenter and cabinet maker, and built many fine corrals and facilities at the ranch in the years he worked for us.

In the late 1960's Mom developed cancer, and passed away July 9, 1972 in Douglas. Dad lived at the Douglas house, and was in fairly good health, until June 1979, when he had very serious surgery at the Mayo Clinic. By this time I was near Riverton, where Dad, Steve, and I owned a small acreage, and had built a nice home. We flew Dad to Riverton in an ambulance plane, and I took care of him until his death. The last few months of his illness were very miserable, and he was more than ready to "Go Home to Mama" as he always said.

In October 1979, Jerry DeFord and I were married at the Riverton home so Dad could be present. Jerry is a Montana native who came to Wyoming to manage the ranches for the Walt Disney family, near Dubois. Dad was well enough after we were married to go up to the old Rocking Chair Ranch (the Disney headquarters), and he enjoyed being up there very much, until he got so sick. He said he wanted to die there at the ranch, with us, and he died September 16, 1980. Both Dad and Mom are buried in the Douglas cemetery, very close to the home at No. 1 Ash Drive. Their little son they lost was first buried in Casper, but was later moved to Douglas, and is buried beside them.

Jerry, Steve and I still own the Riverton place, but Jerry and I lease part of the Bill Barton ranch between Moorcroft and Upton, and Steve leases the place he grew up on between Buffalo and Sheridan. He also is helping his other grandparents, Lucile and Aime Wuthier on their places up there. On December 22, 1983, Steve followed in his grandpa's footsteps, and married a school teacher — Teri Shimogaki, who teaches in the Buffalo school system.

Stine, George and Pearl

In August 1920, George and Pearl Stine and six month old Marion Jane, along with George's parents, Elmer and Emma Stine, left York, Nebraska and went to Wyoming.

George had filed on 640 acres 50 miles north of Douglas, Wyoming. There was a store and post office about twelve miles from us. I think it was called Bear Creek.

A few months after we were settled on our claim, Elmer Stine filed on a section bordering ours on the east.

We had a water hole not too far from the house and that water ended any constipation that we may have had. We sometimes got water for household use from Warren and Elsie Powell, who lived on the Bridle Bit Ranch west of us, until we got our well.

The friends we made while we were living there turned into lifelong friendships; Bill and Flo Vollman and Bill, Jr., Joe and Mary Reynolds and, of course, Warren and Elsie Powell and others.

After proving up on our homestead, we went back to York, Nebraska for a couple of years. George went to work for the Burlington Railroad (Burlington-Northern now) and was there 34 years. George passed away November 1959. We were living in Sheridan, Wyoming at that time. We lived in Casper nine years.

Elmer Stine passed away at the age of 75. Emma lived to be 95. She passed away in 1963.

I have lived in Fairfield, California for eleven years. I have two sons, Gene and Larry, who live here also. Marion Jane lives in Sacramento. Louise in Wauneta, Nebraska and Kenneth in Longmont, Colorado.

Stock, August and Leona Family

August Frederick Stock, son of Charles and Ernestine Pache Stock, was born on September 18, 1891 in the family home, Marshall County, Kansas.

Charles Stock was a native of Dresden, Germany and a member of the Lutheran Church. He was from a family of five children. Ernestine P. Pache was a native of Magdeburg, Germany.

At the age of 20, August came to Converse County to homestead. While proving up on the homestead he found work on the Riverview Ranch owned by Tom Christopher. His fingers became crooked while working for Christopher because he had to milk so many cows.

August met his future wife, Leona Leonard Moss, while he was at the Riverview Ranch. She was washing clothes for the ranch while living nearby on her homestead. August could not speak or write English and only knew German at the time when he first met Leona. She proceeded to teach him English. They were married on December 17, 1917 in Douglas.

Leona Leonard was born on May 20, 1884 in Ash Grove, Iowa, daughter of Smith and Eliza Sapp Leonard.

The Sapp family were natives of Holland. Deciding to come to America, they sold their land for gold and while on the boat coming across the ocean, they slept on their trunk, with the gold in it, day and night because of their fear of being robbed.

August Stock family, 1927. L. to r.: Ora, Hazel, Vireda Moss, Melvin, Lewis and Charles.

Leona was raised and went to school near Ash Grove, Iowa. She was baptized in a creek close to Pleasant Valley Church.

Leona had previously been married to Bert Moss of Ormanville, Iowa. They were married on August 31, 1907 in Bloomfield, Iowa. Three children were born to this union: Baby Moss, Vireda and Ralph.

Bert and Leona came to Converse County in February 1911. They homesteaded south of Douglas near Irvine. They brought their furniture and animals, including two mules, with them. Two families also came with them from Iowa; Thurmond and Della Moss Day and John and Jessie Leonard Leffler. John was to be killed by a train in 1917 at the Irvine Crossing and Jessie married E. E. Tubbs. (See the E. E. Tubbs story.)

Bert contracted TB and the family moved back to Iowa where he died on December 2, 1916. Leona brought her family back to Wyoming. On December 14, 1918, shortly after the family's return, Leona's son, Ralph, died as the result of drowning in a water barrel which he had accidentally fallen into.

After Leona and August's marriage they lived on his homestead five miles south of Shawnee. It was here that one daughter was born; Hazel (b. January 25, 1919). Four more children were born after the family moved to her homestead south of Douglas; Melvin (b. December 17, 1920, d. January 3, 1932 as the result of a gun accident), Ora (b. May 17, 1922 d. March 13, 1975), Lewis (b. July 24, 1923) and Charles (b. December 30, 1924).

August died as the result of a heart attack on February 4, 1955 while visiting in Kansas; Leona died on September 30, 1970 from the effects of a stroke.

Hazel remembers being told by her father that he had to face 40 degrees below zero temperature when he went by horse and buggy to Lost Springs to get Dr. Walkins to attend Hazel's mother when Hazel was born.

Hazel attended public schools in Douglas. Traveling from the homestead to Douglas for supplies was done by horse and buggy for a few years then in the 1920s her parents bought a Ford car. Another way to come was by the Northwestern Train. The cost was 16¢ one way.

One summer a storm left the chicken coop flooded. Her parents were in town and Hazel was in charge. She had half drowned chickens to revive. Building a fire and laying the chickens in the warm oven helped them to live.

During her early teens Hazel earned spending money one summer going by horseback to Orin Junction to sell vegetables. Another way to earn money was fixing ladies' hair at the "Poor Farm" on Saturdays. She and her mother also canned food for the farm.

Hazel met Walter York, son of Henry and Elizabeth York, at a Democrat rally in Orin. They were married on March 4, 1939 in Douglas. Three children were born to this union; Bonnie (Olson), Maxine (LeBar) and Henry.

Walter and Hazel lived in coal mining towns in Rock Springs and Winton during World War II and have lived in Douglas since that time.

Ora married Estol Shaffer and lived in Newcastle.

Lewis contracted polio during his freshman year in high school. It left him crippled but able to pursue his aims in life. He married Lovina Tylee on January 29, 1959. They have three children and live on the family farm south of Douglas.

Charles married Lucille Blackburn. They live in Douglas.

Stoddard, R.H. and Maude

My dad, Richard Henry Stoddard, was born February 20, 1885 in Omaha, Nebraska. At an early age he moved to Mason City, Nebraska where his parents took up a homestead. Here five children were born: two, Robert and Howard, passed away when very young, before they were old enough to go to school. Richard, Phil and Marcia Stoddard Dady grew up and each raised families of their own. All three are now deceased.

Dad's father died when he was nine years old. This interfered with his schooling; however, he worked on the homestead with a hired man and attended school as much as he could; being a good student, he managed to finish the eighth grade and also attended high school. He had managed to get enough education to serve him well all his life; he was always very good with figures.

On January 1, 1907 he married Maude Mabel Gates and together they began farming the homestead in partnership with his mother. They built a small home and later built a larger home. His mother and sister, Marcia, lived in a sod house for quite a while before moving to Mason City, Nebraska.

Dad was a very good farmer; he tended his crops well. He took great pride in his horses and mules; always kept them in tip top shape whether work horses, saddle horses or the team he used on the buggy. This was a beautiful spirited team. Then there was a sleek black race horse, a Kentucky Whip breed. He was Dad's pride and joy and won many races at picnics and celebrations.

He served on the school board many terms and was a member of the Odd Fellows Lodge. In those days the Odd Fellows had to help sit with and care for the sick. He gave much time to this duty.

Mother and Dad had eight children, a baby boy was still born; Paul lost his life in World War II and Betty Jean Corbett passed away in 1980. The living children are Evelyn Stoddard Grant, Glenrock, Wyoming; Wilbur A. Stoddard (Webb) and Richard Harley Stoddard (Pat) of Douglas; Ivan LeRoy Stoddard of Glenrock and Marcia Louise Stoddard Boe of Bakersfield, California.

Our mother deserves a whole story of her own, but much of Dad's is part of hers. I'll add some important things. Mother was born at Kearney, Nebraska and moved to Mason City when young. She was a very good student. She tells about taking an examination in eight subjects and getting four grades of 99 and four grades of 100. She graduated from Mason City High School in 1906. At this time, they graduated from the tenth grade. In grade school she was always at the top in cyphering and spelling contests. She could out run about everyone.

In 1939, after many hard years of drought and hail on the farm, my folks moved to Wyoming and bought the store with a Post Office at Bill, Wyoming. After buying the store, my dad stood out in front of the building and looked at the country side and said to my brother, Ivan, "Son, there has to be something underneath as there is nothing on top." The folks were faithful to the people in the area and served them with much kindness and help. They made many cherished friends here. Later they sold the store and moved to a home in Douglas where Dad bought wool for the South Dakota Wool Growers Association. Dad loved this job, and made the most money he had made in his life and this was when he was in his 70's and 80's. Mother was able to go with him many times. One day while he was at work he was hit by a car at Orin. He was never able to recover from his injuries and passed away in May 1969 at the age of 87. Mother died April 7, 1975.

Some of Dad's hobbies were hunting (he always got his game with one shot to the disgust of his grandchildren and other hunters) and fishing. He especially loved band music, loved his many friends and liked to drive Mother and her friends (his harem) around the country.

Mother's hobbies were cooking, love of family and friends, loved reading her Bible and attending church regularly at the First Baptist Church where she listened to Rev. Clyde Thompson give his wonderful messages.

Stoddard, W.A. and Letha

Wilbur A. (Webb) Stoddard was born March 19, 1911 in Mason City, Nebraska. He went to school in Mason City and was graduated from Mason City High School in 1929. In August of 1934 he came to Wyoming due to drought on the family farm in Mason City.

He worked for his brother-in-law, Fred Grant, in Boxelder Canyon until the fall of 1936. At that time, he went to the oil patch and roughnecked to save losing his car and save enough money so he could marry his childhood sweetheart, Letha Harriet Chrisman; then a teacher at Powder River, Wyoming. They were married June 1, 1937. Two years later his love for ranching took him, his wife, and baby boy back to the Fred Grant Ranch to work until the fall of 1942 when he was able to lease a small ranch on Willow Creek, a tributary to Boxelder Creek. They stayed here for two and a half years, and then he took his livestock to the V R Ranch south of Glenrock where he ran them by the head; and again to earn more money, he went back to roughnecking for four years until 1948.

While working on rigs, working many double shifts to earn as much money as possible, he was able to scrape together enough money in 1948 to pay cash for his first ranch, the Bushy place east of Bill, Wyoming and then in 1948 he was able to pay cash again for the Lynch place. In the spring of 1949 he and his wife, Letha, bought the Wohlford place north of Bill. They moved their family of four there to begin ranching in earnest. Webb laughs, "I guess it was in earnest as the day we took over the ranch the ewes started lambing, and we soon learned about handling sheepherders."

In 1950 they bought the Featherston place and moved there. Over the years they were able to purchase and put together seven ranches in the eastern Converse County area. In addition to the four already mentioned, they purchased the Robertson, Frye and Rollie Sadler ranches. The Taylor place was added in Campbell County and years later four ranches were added in the Niobrara area; Larsen, Gibbs, Beardsley and Prell.

Webb is semi-retired, but his three sons, Bob, Paul and J. R. and families work to make this operation a possibility.

Letha passed away August 25, 1976 following a long struggle with cancer. She has truly been missed as she was very much a mainstay in the operation.

In addition to the three sons mentioned, a daughter, Sally Stoddard Seebaum and another son, Dickie Webb, who drowned in a dike on the Wohlford ranch in 1949, and another daughter, Nancy Lee, who died at birth, were born to this union.

Webb is known for his hard work, love of family and friends, and his love of horses.

Stone, Amos and Alta

Milton "Amos" Stone (1891-1967) married Alta Hendricks Hylton in 1924. His parents were Milton Stone and Josephine Stone Huff. His mother, a brother, Harry, and Amos all had adjoining homesteads about six miles west of what is now Bill, Wyoming. Harry was killed by lightning on July 4, 1923. Several neighbors had been swimming in the Stones' big lake. It had started to cloud up and Harry and Art Scott and three daughters were leaving in a hayrack, when a bolt of lightning struck, killing the two men. The girls were riding near the back and Hazel was burned on the body and legs, Ella and Pearl had the hair burned off the sides of their heads. It knocked the horse down but didn't hit the other people. Harry Stone was not married, but Arthur Scott had a wife and nine children.

Alta had come to Wyoming to homestead in 1921 from Iowa with her two young daughters, Fayne and Wilma, ages three and four. Alta was a widow at the time, her husband having been in a drowning accident.

Her brother, Harley Hendricks, promised to help with the improvements for a portion of the land, but it was Alta's share to spend the required time living there. Harley's section was adjoining Alta's. He already had settled his required time and proved up before Alta arrived.

The trip was made from Iowa to Wyoming in a Model T Ford touring car with side curtains. Just over the Nebraska - Wyoming state line they encountered a wind storm which ripped off the top of the car.

After several bad winters and the time nearing for the girls to go to high school, the Stones decided it would be best to move back to Iowa. They all really loved Wyoming so it was a hard move to make. The decision was made easier, however, when on May 8th of 1930 they lost eight of their cattle in a three day blizzard. That fall they moved to Iowa.

Strachota, Emil

Emil Strachota was born in Nebraska and raised on a farm and ranch north of Whitman, Nebraska.

He came to Wyoming in 1927 and homesteaded in Converse County fifty-five miles north of Douglas in Section 17, Township 39, Range 70.

He built a one-room sod house which he lived in for awhile. Later he purchased the frame house that Dr. and Mrs. H. G. Lynch lived in for a long time. The frame house still stands on the place.

Emil never married. He raised cattle and worked at odd jobs part-time. He worked at the Antelope Coal Mine, helped ranchers during lambing and shearing season, and did other jobs in the community when called on for help.

He received his homestead patent on May 28, 1936.

Emil served in the Army during World War II.

In 1957, Emil sold his place to Bill Rothleutner and returned to Mullen, Nebraska to be near his brother, Samuel. He owned property in Mullen from 1957 until August 1968. He died several years ago.

Strock, Leonard and Hazel Family

Leonard, the son of William and Mary Strock, was born February 7, 1889 in Battle Creek, Iowa.

After living with his family in Britton, South Dakota, where he went to school and grew to manhood, Leonard came to Wyoming in 1910, where he went to work for John Marsden on Wagonhound Creek. In the spring of 1912 he went to work for Sauls on their LaBonte Livestock Company Ranch, where he rode for them for 16 years.

On December 26, 1914 he married Hazel Hammond, daughter of Milt and Clara Belle Hammond.

Their two sons and one daughter are: Charles Oliver, born November 9, 1915; James William, born September 17, 1917; and Jean Raye, born December 27, 1918.

Leonard took up a homestead in 1923, forty acres on Mill Creek, where Hazel and the three children lived for five years until the homestead was proved up. The rest of the land lay on Tatum Creek, southwest of West Fork of LaBonte Creek and was later purchased by LaBonte Livestock Company. Leonard continued riding for the Saults until 1929, at which time the family moved to the Jackson place on LaPrele, owned by Robert D. Hawley. In 1931, Leonard went to work for Dr. J. R. Hylton on LaPrele, caring for his thoroughbred mares and sires. One of the most prized studs being "Sir Barton" who stood from 1933 until his death October 30, 1937. He was buried not far from his paddock. Later his remains were moved to the Washington Park in Douglas where a statue marks his grave. "Sir Barton" was the first triple crown winner in the United States and is listed in the Racing Hall of Fame in Saratoga Springs, New York.

In 1941 Hazel and Leonard went to work on a ranch eight miles west of Sheridan until they found a riding job on the Pax Roberts Ranch in the Wolf Mountains on the Rosebud.

They continued in this job until her horse fell and rolled on Hazel, injuring her back. After recuperating in Sheridan they returned to Douglas where Hazel worked in the (P.O.W.) Douglas Hospital as a nurse's aide for a time, then they worked for Jim Morton on the Cheyenne River, Fiddleback and Sand Creek pastures, pulling their horses in a horse trailer behind a jeep. They were with Jim nine years. When Fritz Roush took over as foreman, he retired them and they moved to Douglas.

Leonard went to work as caretaker and ditch rider for the LaPrele Ditch Company where he worked for twelve years.

Leonard died December 7, 1972.

Sutphin, Derrick and Clara Family

Clara was born in Berlin, Germany on November 20, 1859. She came to the United States in April 1876 along with her parents and a sister, Annie. She was married on November 21, 1880 to a Frenchman by the name of Gustav Leal in Chicago, Illinois. The Leals came west to Wyoming settling near Dana in Carbon County. A son, Leon Andrew, was born in 1881.

Gustav was killed shortly after, while working for the Union Pacific Railroad as a watchman. His death was due to an injury incurred while coming home one dark night when he fell into a mine shaft.

Clara married Derrick Richard Sutphin on May 12, 1885. Derrick had come to Wyoming in 1882 from Michigan. Dick, as he was better known, adopted Clara's son, Leon. The Sutphins operated a sawmill near Laramie Peak for several years before moving to Glenrock where they purchased a hotel and renamed it the Sutphin Hotel.

Leon met and married Myrtle Rice, daughter of Charles and Almina Rice, on November 18, 1903 at the Rice home on Upper LaPrele Creek. They moved to a ranch on Willow Creek where they made their home for several years. Three children, Winnifred, Francis and Maudine Clare were born to them while they lived in the mountains.

Hearing that John Passick had 96 acres for sale at the foot of Deer Creek Canyon, Leon purchased it and moved his family there. Living first in a cave before building a house out of logs, the family was at home once more. A son, Melvin and a daughter, Doris were added to the family at this time.

Leon was involved in a tragic accident in November 1913. While on a routine trip checking his beaver traps above Deer Creek Canyon he was killed when his gun accidentally went off.

After Leon's death, Myrtle remained at the ranch while Francis and Winnie were sent to stay with Myrtle's sister, Anna, and her husband, Bert Sanford. They attended the Bunn School on Beaver Creek at the foot of the steep red rock cliff. Other children attending the school were: Ben LeVasseur and Eva, Claude, Mable and Charles Sanford.

The next year the children were sent to Glenrock to school while they stayed with their grandparents. The next year a school was obtained near the family home on Deer Creek. Two of the teachers were Fanny Knittle Hakalo and Adelyna Goff Smith.

After Dick Sutphin's death in 1918, Winnie was sent to stay with her Grandma Clara to go to school.

When Winnie started high school, Myrtle sold the ranch to George and Annie Barber and moved to town to operate the Sutphin Hotel. Clara had purchased the Manhattan Rooms which was close to where the Four Aces is now. Roy and Helen Smith later bought the ranch from the Barbers. Clara Sutphin died on July 24, 1933.

Winnie married Roy Lowrie, son of Walter Lowrie, on June 15, 1924. They have two sons, Roy Jr. and Leon Sutphin. Roy Sr. worked for Standard Oil of Indiana at Glenrock and Casper before transferring to the east coast where he worked for the Atlantic Refining Co.

Francis married Irene Griffith, daughter of Verne and Helen Griffith, on April 27, 1940. They have one daughter, Connie. Francis died in Denver on September 3, 1974.

Maudine taught school before her marriage to Roy Marburger on November 7, 1931. They had two children; Donna Rae and Roy Eugene. Maudine died on August 7, 1957, Roy in 1976.

On September 17, 1943, Myrtle died.

Melvin married Henrietta Stuka on April 27, 1947. They had one son, Donald. Melvin died on March 24, 1980.

Doris married Ralph Case on March 13, 1938. They live in Basin, Wyoming. One son, Rick, was born to them.

Swan, L. J. and Emma Family

L. J. "Lewis" Swan was born in Greene County, Pennsylvania, October 19, 1845. He was a direct descendant of Charlemagne, the Great Christian Emperor of the West, who ruled about 742 A.D.

He was the son of Jesse and Phebe Jennings Swan. The Swans were originally located in Loudoun County, Virginia. The first of that name was Joshua Swan. His son, John, had a son named Charles, who was a colonel in the Revolutionary War. Charles was born in Loudoun County in 1749. He was married to Sarah Van Meter in 1772. Charles and Sarah had a son named Jesse, who was born near the present site of Lexington where his father owned 1300 acres.

Jesse and Phebe raised seven sons and three daughters, mainly in Illinois, where they moved in the late 1840s from Pennsylvania. Jesse died there in 1857.

Lewis and two of his brothers joined the Union Army in 1862 when he was 17 years old. His brother, Thomas, enlisted in the 4th Illinois Infantry. Lewis and another brother, John, were in the 77th Illinois Infantry. Their unit joined the Army of the Cumberland at Covington, Kentucky. They took part in several major battles, including Vicksburg, Ft. Gibson, Champion Hills, and Black River Bridge. They were soundly defeated at Sabine Cross Roads, April 8, 1864. L. J. took part in the defeat of the City of Mobile and mustered out of the service in July of 1865. His brother, John, was wounded and died in a St. Louis hospital in 1862.

Lewis then returned to Illinois, remaining there until 1874 when he moved to Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, where he settled near some of his cousins, Alexander H., "Black Tom" and Wm. H. Swan of the Swan Land and Cattle Company, who had their headquarters where the present town of Chugwater is now. L. J. was in the Cheyenne-Chugwater area until late April of 1886, when he returned to Indianola, Iowa. There he married Emma Dyke, the daughter of Thomas and Emma Hobbs Dyke, who were natives of Gloucester, England. They were married in May of 1886.

Lewis J. Swan

Verna and Jimmy Swan

Ronald L. Swan was born January 24, 1887, and later that same year the family moved back to Cheyenne for a short time until the lure of new land in the Powder River Basin was too strong to resist. In addition, it was getting crowded around Cheyenne.

Mr. Swan took up a homestead on the head of Box Creek, where he ran around 15,000 head of sheep, utilizing part of what was left of the open range.

In 1890 the family moved to the bustling town of Douglas where they had a house built on North Fifth Street.

In 1906, Mr. Swan, along with other prominent citizens of Douglas and Converse County, established the Douglas National Bank, which had its first offices in the Temple Building. He was its first vice-president.

L. J. Swan was an immaculate dresser, a very proper gentleman, as is usual for your neighborhood banker.

Emma was a large, raw-boned woman, who was somewhat of a snob. She had a domineering personality and tried to arrange other peoples lives.

When Ronald was around seven years old, he was playing on First Street, which is now the alley between Second and the railroad tracks, and he fell into a hand-dug well and broke his collar-bone. He had to be pulled out with a rope.

At the age of nine, he was sent to an Episcopal school back east, the Swans being of the Episcopalian faith. At the age of twelve he was put on a train in Douglas and sent to a military school in Syracuse, New York. he had to change trains in Chicago and the terminals were clear across town from each other. Evidently he couldn't find a means of transportation because he ended up walking all the way across Chicago. After completing military school he attended Simpson College in Iowa, majoring in accounting.

In 1910, Ronald Lewis Swan married Verna Mae Allen in Douglas. Verna was the eldest daughter of H. P. and Edith Allen, also early Douglas pioneers.

L. J. and Emma continued to reside in Douglas in the summers and spent their winters in Long Beach, California, where Lewis died in April of 1931 at the age of 86. Emma continued to look after her husband's banking interests until her death in April of 1943 at her son's home at the age of 83.

Verna and "Jimmy" were the parents of four children: Ann, Allen L., Mazie, and Robert. Allen and his wife, Virginia Lindmier, had six boys: Stephen P., James A., William D., Christopher R., Scott L. and Lewis A., all of whom still reside in Wyoming. Mazie and her husband, Al Wilkinson, had two boys and two girls: John A., Constance A., Jerry N., and Terry K.

Sybrant, Bert and Maggie Family

David Oscar Sybrant and his second wife, Lucretia Amanda McFadden came to the sandhills of western Nebraska in the year 1886, to homestead in Rock County. David's first wife, Rosella, had borne him five children before she became ill and died. David had employed a neighbor girl, Lucretia, to help care for the children during his wife's illness. After her death, David married Lucretia, and to them, eight children were born. Pennsylvania was the birthplace of eleven of the children; the two youngest were born in Nebraska.

Bert Mason, the youngest of the family, was born in 1893 in Rock County. Bert received his elementary education in the Sybrant School, so named because it was started by David Sybrant, taught by his daughters and daughters-in-law, and attended by his children, grandchildren, great grandchildren, and today his great-great grandchildren. The post office was located in the David Sybrant home, and the address of the people of the community was Sybrant, Nebraska.

After some years of schooling, Bert worked for his father on the family farm, or helped in the Sybrant store which his brothers had started in the community.

He was united in marriage in 1915 to Maggie May Blake, born in 1895 in Chambers, Nebraska. She was educated in the elementary schools there. Bert took his bride to a place which he had obtained in a trade with his brother, Herbert. The transaction involved trading thirty head of cattle for 320 acres of land.

Eight children were born to Bert and Maggie in Nebraska. Four of the children survived. They were Orva Lavee, Grant Edward, Paul Dwight, and Vida Loraine. The three older children started their schooling in the Sybrant School which Bert had attended.

In 1928, Bert decided to go to Wyoming to take up a homestead. He filed on a claim 70 miles north of Douglas, Wyoming. He returned to Nebraska that spring to plant his farm in crops. After harvest, he and Maggie loaded their old truck with a cook stove and other household furnishings. They tied a tarp over their load, and put their four children on top. They were off to Wyoming!

Maggie and Bert Sybrant

Bert's homestead was bordered on the north by Weston County and was situated on a dry wash called Horse Creek about four miles north of the Dull Center Post Office. Bert built a small two room house, barn, chicken coop and an outhouse on his claim. The house was constructed of sheeting and boasted a tongue and groove wooden floor, a luxury which many homestead dwellings did not have. The outhouse was made of logs; the seat was made of a section of hollow log hauled from the Cheyenne River. These logs had been precut by a very large family living on the river. It seems that this family was hard-pressed at times to find sufficient food, and as a result they pursued the cottontail rabbits which would seek refuge in the hollow logs along the river. The family would chop holes in the logs so that they could remove the rabbits. These ingenious rabbit traps became an integral part of the "Outside Accommodations" for the homesteaders in the area.

The first winter in Wyoming found the three school-aged Sybrant children living with their aunt and uncle so they might attend the school at Dull Center. In the fall of 1929, however, the school district donated a frame building to the community to be used as a school. Bert skidded the building to his homestead, and attached it to his house. Besides the three Sybrant children, two children from a family named Dorothy attended this school.

In 1930, Bert bid successfully on a mail route which ran from Douglas to Bill and thence on to the Verse and Dry Creek Post Offices. For convenience, the family moved into Douglas to live, where the children continued their education.

In those days the mail carrier "carried" much more than mail. Most of the rural population supplemented their meager income by milking cows and selling cream.

The mail man hauled their cans of cream to Douglas, to be shipped. He gathered grocery lists along his way, which he would fill and return the supplies on his next trip. He hauled barrels of gasoline, freight of all sorts and sizes, and even passengers who wanted to go to or from isolated homesteads.

At the termination of his mail contract in 1934, Bert moved his family back to the homestead. He had bought a small bunch of cattle. There was no grass that year due to the severe drought. Bert wintered his stock on Russian thistles, as did so many others. Hay was selling for $40 per ton. Cows were bringing from $12 to $15 per head if one could find a buyer. The government finally began buying the cattle and killing them in the owner's pasture. The government also initiated a program to provide employment for jobless persons. It was dubbed the Public Works Administration. Men were put to work in the north country, building dams to create stock water and to control the erosion caused by the severe drought. Bert worked with four head of horses and a five foot fresno building those dams. In a good day with a short haul, he could move perhaps 50 yards of dirt.

In 1936 the Homestead Act was repealed. It had become apparent that 640 acres of dry land would not provide a decent living for a family. So the government bought many of the homesteads at an average of $1500 per section. These blocks of land were formed into a community pasture. Grazing permits were allotted to persons who owned adjoining lands. The number of cattle allowed to be grazed by an individual was in ratio to the number of acres of land owned by that individual. This particular block of land still exists today, and is called the Rosencrans Community Pasture on the Thunder Basin National Grassland. Bert, along with others, sold his homestead to the government.

The Sybrant family then moved to a ranch which Bert had purchased. It was located eleven miles north-east of Douglas. They remained there until 1956, when they decided to sell their cattle and move into Douglas. Later Bert turned this property over to his four children.

Bert and Maggie purchased the White House Rooms in Douglas, and for a time, rented rooms. In 1960 Maggie was stricken with leukemia, and after a short illness, died. Bert and his eldest daughter, Orva, live in Douglas today. Orva, who never married, lived with her parents all her life.

Grant resides in Douglas with his wife, Mary. They have three children. He looks after the ranch and tends the 150 head of steers which pasture there, and which belong to him and his brother and sisters.

Paul and Vida have both married and each has four children.

Bert was the last member of the original Sandhill Sybrants. He attained the age of 92. Bert passed away in February 1986. He and Maggie lived through drought and depression, hard times for all, but he was able to keep his sense of humor. He was a good friend and neighbor. There have to be bad times to create good times. You would not recognize the good times unless you have had the bad times to use in comparison.

Taylor, Fred and Luella Family

The Charles P. Taylor family moved from Pennsylvania to Minnesota in 1905. In 1910 they moved to Van Tassell, Wyoming. They spoke Pennsylvania Dutch or German at home and I, Minnie Lane, always supposed they came from Germany to Pennsylvania. My father said when his mother, Louisa Wassmund Taylor, passed away on October 7, 1911 they gave the message in German so the little children could not understand. But Dad said he understood, although he spoke only a few words himself. My grandparents and two of their ten children are buried in the Pleasant Ridge Pioneer Cemetery, north of Van Tassell, in the middle of a rancher's pasture.

Fred Malin Taylor was born on August 2, 1895 at Muncy, Pennsylvania. He left home a few years after the passing of his mother, working on ranches around Van Tassell as a teenager. My dad never spent his money on liquor or gambling, so as a young single man he saved enough money to buy a livery stable in Van Tassell which he later sold. When he was old enough to file on a homestead he rode horseback to Douglas, Wyoming. In 1922 he filed on a homestead about 80 miles north on Antelope Creek.

About this time he met my mother, Luella Taylor, from Kaycee, Wyoming; they were married in Buffalo about 1922. He loved to ride and break horses and rode either in state fair rodeos or in rodeos in Douglas, Wyoming, an activity Mom talked him into giving up when I was born. Their friends gave them a big charivari at my mother's folks near Kaycee on Powder River. One old friend started the celebration by shooting off a double barreled shotgun which knocked him through the door of their house.

Luella was the daughter of Orange and Mamie Taylor. She was the second born of nine children, Arley, Luella (deceased), Bill, Viola (Toots-deceased), Velma, Wilma, Bob, Bud (died in WWII), and a baby that died in infancy.

Fred and Luella's only child was born in Buffalo in 1924. I am that daughter, Minnie C. Taylor. I attended country school at Antelope Creek School. We all walked or rode horseback to school. My folks boarded the school teacher and he walked to school with me. It was about one and a half miles to school. The teacher was Mr. William Robertson, Jr. of Douglas. My first year in school we had 18 children, when I finished we only had three left in our school.

As a child we used to get our mail at Bear Creek Store about one mile from home. Mr. and Mrs. Ed Manning ran the store. I always looked forward to those trips and would hope, to myself, that Dad would buy me a one cent sucker, but I never asked for one as those were hard years with hot dry summers and grasshoppers. The other homesteaders had sold their land and moved away. Dad purchased some of the places to add to his ranch. The neighbors were far between, but we did get together for card games and picnics. Sometimes there were dances at a post office and hall called Turner Crest.

I boarded in town to attend high school. In 1943 I married Chester Lane of Shawnee, Wyoming. We have four children: Roberta Lynn Lane Follum (b. December 8, 1945, m. Willis A. Follum, June 7, 1965), children: Dawn Marie, 1965, Shawn Allen, 1967 and William Wade, 1970. Carol Leigh Lane Follum (b. April 11, 1949, m. James Follum, February 14, 1969), children: Christina Hazel, 1971, Shay O., 1974, Aaron James, 1978, Briana Carolyn, 1979. Lee Fredrick Lane (b. February 7, 1952, m. Nancy Ann Pellatz, July 16, 1971), children: Nathan Patrick, 1976, Nicholas Allen, 1979, Sarah Ann, 1981 and Justin Lee, 1982. Julie Luella Lane (b. September 19, 1956, m. Jeffery Lynn Blessing, January 8, 1977), children: Joy Lynn, 1977, Jaclyn Leigh, 1979 and Jessica Lane, 1982.

Fred Malin Taylor died May 10, 1979 and is buried in the Douglas, Wyoming Cemetery. He lived on his ranch north of Douglas, Wyoming until he retired in 1971 and sold his ranch to Ray Bell of Gillette, Wyoming. He lived in Douglas, tending his yard and pretty flowers until his death. He had five brothers: William Taylor (who owned a ranch near his and passed away in 1982), George (who died during WWI), Clarence (who died in the 1950s), LeRoy (who died a few days after his mother), Alva (who is still alive and lives in Buffalo, Wyoming) and is married to my mother's sister, Velma Taylor Taylor.

Two sisters, Emma Robb and Mary Nickolas, preceded him in death. Ada Heldt lives in Lisco, Nebraska and Elizabeth Swope in Centralia, Washington. Both are still living.

Taylor, Ray and Laura Family

"Sorry son, but you just don't weigh enough even soaking wet to make our team." With this statement, Ray Taylor's dream was dashed and his whole life was changed. He loved baseball and had been approached by a scout for the Chicago White Sox, who had told him, if he was able to gain some pounds he would be put on the team, but eating as hard as he could, Ray could not pick up the necessary weight.

Raymond Rutho Taylor and his twin sister, Ethel, were the first children born to John Driscoll Taylor and Katherine Wiser on August 24, 1884 near Decatur, Illinois. Ray's father had come from Springfield, Ohio, one of the pioneering families in that area. Ray's grandfather, William and one of his brothers, had moved into Springfield from Franklin County, Pennsylvania, where the rest of the family remained. John Taylor and his wife, Polly French, moved into Franklin County in 1786, shortly after the Revolutionary War, from Custer County, Pennsylvania. Nothing has been found about the family prior to this time. Ray's father, John Driscoll broke with the rest of the family and decided to try his adventuring youth out by traveling west. He first settled in Decatur, being a farmer by trade and here he met and married Katherine Wiser. Later they moved on west and settled in Holdrege, Nebraska. Here the family grew to one more sister and four more brothers who all remained there, except Ray, who also had the wanderlust and moved further west to Glenrock, Wyoming.

The Vollmans and the Gierloffs, both German families, had also come from Cleveland, Ohio and settled in the Holdrege area. Both Rudolph Vollman and Friederike Marie Auguste Gierloff, better known to their friends as Rudolph and Rike, were born in Germany. They were married in Cleveland and then moved to Holdrege. To this union two children were born ten years apart, Laura, born on April 21, 1885 and William Robert on August 16, 1895.

Ray Taylor began courting Laura, and he used a fine team of horses to do so. It was a team that was mighty fast when the need was there, but very slow on a moonlight night. Ray and Laura were married on February 17, 1909.

They set up housekeeping on a farm near Elm Creek, Nebraska. But then Laura's father, Rudolph, was struck by lightning while standing in a barn door watching the thunderstorm, which had suddenly blown in, killing him instantly on July 13, 1910. Laura's mother needed help with the farm, therefore Ray and Laura took over the farming operation. The place was not big enough for more than one family. Rike Vollman and her son, William, along with his wife, Flora, took up a homestead near Douglas, Wyoming and moved into the area around 1917.

The Ray Taylors had three children born to them while on the farm at Holdrege. The first baby died and several years later their second son, Kenneth Eugene, was born on June 18, 1922 and a daughter, Iola Gay, January 8, 1924. Ray and Laura were not able to make the farm in Nebraska pay out and therefore, in 1924 they held an auction, sold the Nebraska farm and filed on a homestead in the same vicinity as William Vollman.

For several years, in trying to make ends meet, Ray worked in Glenrock at the gas refinery cleaning the stills, a very hot, dirty job. Here, their third son, Darryl Dean, was born on January 5, 1926. After accumulating a little stake, the family moved onto the homestead. These were some very tough years and even the good years meant many long hours of back breaking work to even try to break even. Many a homesteader could not make it and Ray and Laura were one of the families that could not. But the family remained on the homestead until 1940, raising their family there and the children speak of this period in their lives as a very happy time.

They never went hungry and always had a roof over their heads. Kenneth tells about raising tons of potatoes and these were stored in a potato cellar. One winter the snow got so deep that it was impossible to go through the doors of the potato cellar to get to food staples stored there. Darryl, or "Tuffy" as he was known, being the smallest was placed into a bucket and lowered through the air vent into the cellar, whereupon he would quickly fill the bucket with the necessary commodities, and you can be sure there were always potatoes included. The bucket was then pulled out and this repeated until the necessary quantity was reached. The bucket was then returned and Tuffy would scramble back into the bucket and take a fun trip back out the vent.

The house was built so as to someday be used as the granary. One big room was used as the kitchen and dining combination. This room was connected to a proposed drive through granary. The drive through was used as the front room and one room to the north was used as the bedroom. The room to the south of the alley was used to store grains that had been harvested, usually this was wheat or flax. The cow barn was connected to the grain room and about eight or ten cows were milked. The cream was sold to the creamery in Douglas. Of course, all water in the house was carried in from the well which was about 200 yards from the house and no indoor plumbing. During the dry years, water had to be packed from the well to the cows. To complete the farmstead, there was a chicken house about 200 yards from the house. Kenneth said everything was about 200 yards. Chickens were raised to sell along with eggs to help supplement the income. In order to keep the chickens laying and from freezing to death in the winter, hot ashes from the house were placed in containers in the chicken house and hot water was carried to them several times a day.

All lumber had to be hauled into the area and most of it came out of Glenrock. One time Ray Taylor and Bill Vollman loaded Ray's truck so heavy that going up Monkey Mountain Road the front wheels wanted to come up off the ground. But when Bill climbed onto the front of the truck it made just enough weight to balance the truck to get it over the top of the hill. Kenneth was sent on foot up the hill and he declares that that hill was much steeper then than it is today.

Ray always liked to have a team of horses around. Bill Vollman told the story of when Ray still lived in Nebraska, he would head the team down the corn rows and shuck corn, throwing it into the wagon without ever looking up. As long as the horses heard the corn hitting the side of the wagon they kept right on moving up and down the corn rows. When the wagon got full and the corn quit beating a staccato against the wagon the horses would stop and wait for their master to drive them off to the storage area. There was a time when Ray had three teams trained to haul the corn to town with Ray driving just one of the teams. After getting unloaded, Ray would send two of the teams and their empty wagons back home while he would load up the other wagon with needed supplies and head home several hours later. The horses never failed to do their job well. However, a team would run away once in a while, which Ray said showed they had plenty of spunk, otherwise they might not be worth having around.

When living on the homestead, to give a neighbor a helping hand was a way of life. Neighbor helping neighbor. Probably the only way they could survive through those many tough, dry, depression years of the '30s. Once, one of the neighbors, Mr. Tulley, broke his leg right at planting time. Four of his neighbors showed up one day with their tractors and took care of his farming for him. A picture shows them as they pause in a day's work. They were Ray Taylor, Mr. Fisher, Bill Vollman and the fourth gentleman is not remembered. Ray Taylor built a cab around his tractor, probably the first cab to be built around a tractor, but the cold always bothered Ray so he took care of the problem out of necessity.

For entertainment, many dances were held in the community hall or school, a community picnic was held about every other Sunday. Sometimes this was included with a baseball game. Kenneth says he remembers those baseball games and how he hated them because it was always hot and the cheat grass filled his socks. In the summer time the baseball game was about an every Sunday event. The teams would travel to Douglas, Orpha, Walker Creek and Dry Creek. They in turn, would come to play the Hyland team for which Ray was the catcher. One summer university students were hired by the government to come out and clean up all the old abandoned homesteads. They were known as the "Posey Pickers". They formed their own baseball team and Ray joined them as their catcher. Ray had the only truck in the area so it was his truck that was rented to do the job for the "Posey Pickers".

Dances were usually an all night affair. Some of the neighbors would do the playing of the music and Ray Taylor would do the calling of square dancing. The whole family would go. One time some rowdies came out from Glenrock to the Hyland School, which was being used as a dance hall, got to drinking and started fighting in the building. The Domsalla boys took charge and would grab one up, shove him through the window where upon his brother caught him and commenced to take the fight out of them, thereby maintaining order within the school building.

Of course, many memories are built around a school house. Once, when Mr. Dugan was teaching the school near Taylors, the children started peppering the outhouse with rocks, dirt clods or whatever else they could lay their hands on while Mr. Dugan was in the building. Mr. Dugan came out of the outhouse and, needless to say, was very upset and began to reckon with the incident. The children ran as fast as they could into the school house locking the door, but Tuffy Taylor, who was the smallest child and could not keep up with the older children, got left with Mr. Dugan. He caught the brunt of Mr. Dugan's anger.

The children went to high school in Douglas and Ray and Laura finally gave up the homestead in 1940 moving to a small place west of Douglas about four miles. Ray worked for the LeBar Motor Company for a number of years as night watchman. He was known as Shorty Taylor. Laura went to work in the old seed house, which has been moved and is now known as the Douglas Livestock Exchange. Ray passed away in November of 1967 and Laura followed in May of 1968.

The eldest son, Kenneth, who lives near Douglas, married Dorothy Leman. They have five children: Kenneth, Linda, Dennis, Frank and Lois Ann. Iola lives in Casper and has three children: Barbara, Debbie and George. Darryl "Tuffy" lives in Virginia City, Montana and has two sons, Dana and Russell. Whenever the bunch gets together, the talk invariably turns to the good old homestead days.

Taylor, William and Laura Family

William Guy Taylor met Laura Jane Keel while working for her father, Robert Keel, on the Keel place eight miles north of Harrison, Nebraska.

Will, as a young boy, moved with his family to Wyoming from Minnesota where Charles P. Taylor and Louisa Wassmund Taylor had farmed. But in the early 1900s when drought hit that state and the cracks in his fields were big enough to lose a large wrench, the Taylors left for Wyoming.

Taylor located on a place near Van Tassell where he opened a livery stable. During World War I Will helped his father in this business by sending Charles the army checks that he received each month. About the end of World War I Taylor's livery business folded, taking Will's service savings along with it.

On May 16, 1920 Laura Keel and William Taylor were married at her parents, Robert and Birdie Virginia

Laura and Will Taylor in their garden.

Keel's ranch home, which was located down the scenic winding Sow Belly Canyon from Harrison.

After working for a short time at the Agate Oil Field, she as camp cook and he as roustabout, they moved to Wyoming trailing Laura's cattle herd of about 20 Short-horns and Will's truck piled with their belongings. That was a wet year and Laura mentioned that there was "a swarm of mosquitoes behind every sagebrush."

On the way a calf was born and since it could not keep up it held a place in the passenger's seat of the truck. It was a brocco faced calf which they named Pet. To this day there is a brocco faced cow named Pet in the Taylor's cattle herd, and might just possibly be a descendant of that first Pet. Laura's cat rode on top of the loaded truck, but as they passed Bear Creek the cat decided to get off.

They could never persuade it to rejoin them and at last sight Tom was sitting in the middle of the road crying after them. In the Taylor family that draw is still known as "Tom Cat, Stinking Water, Hold Up Hollow" Draw!

While Will was in France guarding German prisoners during World War I, Fred, Will's brother, and Laura and other family members had come up to Wyoming to homestead and Fred and Laura had built a shack on her land, T40, R74, Section 21. As Laura and Will approached the place where that shack should be they discussed their future. "If the shack is still there, we'll stay." They stayed for 60 years until their passing on that ranch.

About 13 years later they bought a bunkhouse from the old Salt Creek Field and had it moved to the ranch. It was cut in two and Will joined the parts, added a roof to cover it and turned the bunkhouse into a nice home for his family.

At first Laura stayed on the place and took care of the livestock, selling cream and eggs while Will trucked for local people (he hauled hogs mostly) and worked at the Salt Creek Oil Field.

Early in March 1927 Laura rode the train to Nebraska to be with her parents where with the help of Dr. Priest and a midwife, Mrs. Scott, Ella Jane was born March 16. The letter which Laura had written Will telling him of their new baby stated that the doctor had charged $50 and Mrs. Scott, $5. In the letter she described their new baby for him as, "the picture of you (Will)...even to the finger-nails, but not her face. She is dark skinned with lots of hair...her eyes are so dark blue they look black." She sent him a piece of baby's hair, "you be sure and put somewhere so we won't lose it."

In those homestead days there were many people in this country and each helped shape the history of the other. Bill and Henryetta Blood were Taylors' best friends and they shared many Sundays and holidays. They would visit each other at home (although they lived about ten to twelve miles apart) or meet at picnics or other gatherings. Taylors' barn came from the Blood place, and one of the chicken coops is still called "The Blood House".

"Old Charlie" (Mathers) was a single fellow and a good neighbor; and because he was single and could milk, he was hired from time to time to chore for his neighbors. One year he picked and canned many quarts of plums for the Taylors, who were gone to visit relatives in Texas. When Charlie invited you for coffee, he meant just that, as he never served anything but coffee.

A note here that many people were called "old" even though they were all about the same age. "Old Lady Cobb" was an example. Her name was never mentioned in any other way. She was known for traveling around to visit everywhere and making roads where none had existed before.

Carl Sager had grown girls, but lived alone close to Taylors' mail box. He had run a store before ranching and was in the habit of filling Ella Jane's pockets with nuts and candy whenever she and Will visited on their way to the box. Once, when she was wearing a new coat that Laura had made her (Laura sewed everything for her family from pajamas to the dressiest of clothes), he tried filling her pockets as usual, but discovered the large pockets. He only put one of his big hands full in each pocket exclaiming in his German accent "Oh, you've got big ones (pockets) in that coat!"

Mr. and Mrs. John Macken were an Irish couple from a big city. Everyone called them Jack and Maggie. The first year that they were in Wyoming they stayed with

Will and Laura and then moved up about  $\frac{3}{4}$  mile south to the Brownie house, which had no well. They had one horse but carried the water from Taylor's well all the way up the hill to their house. Since they had only one horse they took turns riding it. They were an unusual sight and easily recognized from a distance. Killing chickens to be eaten and hanging them from the eaves of their house, uncleaned and unpicked until "cured", was an old world custom carried out in Wyoming. When a chicken became sick it was removed to a nearby hillside with a small supply of food and water to pass its remaining days.

Since Taylor did not have enough cattle at shipping time to fill a railroad car, this meant getting together with other ranchers at shipping time. Harold Carson and Elmer Spracklen usually made up the extra cattle for the carload. Ella Jane and Will would trail their cattle to Carsons, stay overnight and the men would leave the following day for the drive to Orpha. This drive usually took about a week as the cattle were allowed to graze along the stock trail, (left especially for this purpose), and allowed the cattle to gain as much weight as possible before being sold.

Girls were never allowed to go on this trip, but Ella Jane and Vivian and Arlone Carson always dreamed of the day that their parents would let them make the trip like Dale (Carson). The parents decided that one girl could not go and two girls would be "Too many girls!"

As Will became older he still went on the drives, driving the pickup with bedrolls and food and cooking meals for the riders. Finally this practice came to an end as everyone began trucking their livestock to markets not so far away as Sioux City, Iowa!

When children became of school age all country parents had to make plans for getting them to school somewhere. Laura and Ella Jane moved to Jess Katren's bunkhouse for Ella's first school year at North Point School. The parents took turns taking the children the mile or so to school. This left Will home alone to do chores and with only a saddle horse to travel with. Since the bunkhouse was a little drafty, Laura hung a quilt over the head bedstead and made this a cozy place for them at bed time. If anyone went to Katren's house during the news, everyone was required to be quiet enough so that he could hear the news on his radio.

Laura moved to Douglas with Ella Jane for the rest of her schooling. During the war years (WWII) Will worked in the seed house and for the Gene L. Payne Co. while Laura stayed at the ranch and took care of the feeding for the winter.

When Ella Jane was married to James Norris Odell on August 3, 1956 the wedding was held outside in the beautiful yard. Laura prepared and cooked the entire meal including the wedding cake, which was served following the ceremony.

Taylors always enjoyed taking their grandchildren, Chris, Frank and Pat Odell to the annual Farm Bureau Picnic. The Odell kids always came home with their share of the contest money to buy school supplies when school started in September.

Homemade ice cream was another fun job. Ice cream was Laura's favorite food and she made the cooked cornstarch pudding type which left lumps in the sieve to be eaten and enjoyed. Licking the dasher was even more fun; if only the kids could get a big enough bowl to keep the ice cream from melting onto the table before they could eat it!

When Laura hurt her back February 28, 1978 Elmer Spracklen drove her to the Converse County Memorial Hospital, as the weather had already begun to get bad and some roads were impassable. It had been snowing, storm after storm, ever since Laura's birthday, November 9. After receiving a message that her mother was in the hospital, and her dad was alone, Ella Jane Odell with a blue heeler pup and necessary luggage got as far as the Sun Gas Plant by car. At the plant, Rex Edwards loaded everything into his four wheel drive and plowed through the snow to the Taylor ranch.

This was to be only a short stay and as soon as Laura got out of the hospital and the weather cleared, Ella Jane would go back to her home in Meeteetse, Wyoming. Well, about mid March the roads did clear enough that she went back to visit her children at Meeteetse. Pat and Frank were attending NWCC at Powell and Chris at Billings.

From then on Laura's health forced her to make many short stays in the hospital and on March 13, 1980 she passed away at the Converse County Hospital. Ella Jane stayed on the ranch to help Will and in September 1980 Frank and Erin Odell and Will's great granddaughter, Teresa Kay Odell, moved to a mobile home to continue the ranching operation.

After a very short illness, Will Taylor, too, passed away at the Converse County Memorial Hospital on November 24, 1982. Both he and Laura had fulfilled their lifelong dream of being able to live on their ranch to the end.

In 1984 Ella Jane Taylor Odell and her son, Frank, and wife, Erin Odell, and their children are still raising cattle on the Lazy TN Ranch as Will and Laura Taylor had before them.

Teter, Everett and Blanche Family

George Everett Teter known to almost everyone as Everett, was born in Carlton, Nebraska on November 20, 1891. He came from a family of eight brothers and five sisters.

In 1916 Everett and his oldest brother, Roy, came to Douglas to file on a homestead in the Ross Road area, later known as the Bombing Range, or near Bear Creek.

He became employed by J. D. LeBar of LeBar Motors as a mechanic and worked for them until after J. D. LeBar's death, which was about 40 years. Everett and his brother, Roy, let the north homestead go and Roy moved to California. Later, twelve more of Everett's brothers and sisters moved to California.

On November 1, 1917, Everett went into the army. He was a member of the 107th Sig B.N., 32nd Inf. Div. also known as the Red Arrow Division. He saw action in several battles and was wounded in action August 31, 1918 with shrapnel in the shoulder. Being discharged in May of 1919, he returned to Douglas and his employment with LeBar Motors.

Frances Blanche Daddow, known to everyone as Blanche, was born in Loop City, Nebraska on November 26, 1900. After attending college in Kearney, Nebraska she came to the Douglas area in 1923 to teach school. She married Everett Teter on June 3, 1931. She continued to teach school for several years. Shortly after their marriage they homesteaded together in the area known as LaBonte Canyon, in Albany County. They built a cabin there and later used this as summer pasture for cows they raised until 1970 when they sold the property to Bill Canaday. In 1937 they purchased their home in the Charles Addition in Douglas where they raised their family of two boys. Joseph Everett Teter was born October 6, 1932 and Thomas William Teter was born on February 6, 1936. Everett and Blanche bought some surrounding land adjacent to their home, for back taxes, and accumulated enough land to raise milk cows and other animals, which was a hobby, until Everett retired from the Ford garage in 1956.

After Everett retired, he drove a school bus for several years. He then became interested in raising Black Angus cows which he did until about 1970 when he started to lose his health.

About 1970 the family entered Everett into the Sheridan VA Hospital, due to his poor health, and they held an auction of their household goods. Then Blanche moved into Irwin Towers where she lived until her death in July of 1976. Everett was later moved to the nursing home in Gillette, Wyoming where he lived until his death in July of 1980.

Everett and Blanche were known in the community as honest, hard working, good Christians.

Joe Teter married Dorothy Meyers of Caldwell, Idaho and later moved to Baker, Idaho, where they have a drugstore. They have two sons, Robert Everett and Stephen Arthur.

Tom Teter married Louise Kay Teets in Casper in 1964. They later moved to Douglas in 1966 where Tom was employed in ranching with his father until 1974 when he started working for Converse Lumber. He later quit and went to work at the Converse County School District as maintenance in the Douglas Middle School where he is employed at this time. They have three children: Murial Beth, who married Randy Roby of Newcastle, Wyoming. They have two children, Nikolas Delos, age two and Katherine Louise, age one.

Tom's oldest son, Michael Allen Teter, is presently a student at Casper College, and the youngest son, Martin Fred Teter, is in Middle School.

Thayer, Walter and Rosa

Walter Thayer was born in Beloit, Wisconsin, September 12, 1861. His parents moved to Michigan where they were in the grocery business. He studied for diplomatic service at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.

After finishing college he got the urge to "go west, young man, go west." About 1890 he filed on a homestead eight miles southeast of Glenrock, Wyoming. Later his father, mother and a sister came from Michigan and filed on adjoining land.

He had several hundred head of cattle and 50 or 60 horses and was at one time involved in sheep.

A log house of four rooms was built where he lived for several years before returning to Ionia, Michigan, to get his bride-to-be, Rosa Wilkins. They were married in Chicago on December 27, 1898.

Mrs. Thayer (Rosa Amelia Judson Butterworth Wilkins) was born in Pouleshot-near-Devises, England, August 15, 1871. At 14 years of age she accompanied an older sister, Alice Wilkins Underwood, to Michigan where she lived until she married Walter Thayer and came to Wyoming.

The Thayer cattle brand was a "cannon" and the name of the ranch was Cannondale.

The Thayers had three daughters; Minnie, Mabel and Alys. Mabel, Alys, two grandchildren and five great grandchildren survive.

Ill health made it necessary for Mr. Thayer to return to the lower altitude of Ionia, Michigan. He died September 23, 1915. Rosa Thayer died at Casper, Wyoming, January 22, 1974 at the age of 103.

Thomas, Henry and Esther

Henry Thomas was born in Missouri on November 9, 1880, the fourth in a family of five children. His parents, Sam and Addie Thomas, came in a covered wagon to Sioux County, Nebraska when Henry was nine years old. They settled 17 miles north of Harrison, Nebraska. At first they lived in the covered wagon until a home was built.

Esther Hamlin Thomas was born July 2, 1888 in Iowa, the fourth child in a family of ten. Her parents, Burton and Emma Hamlin, came west and settled in Harrison, Nebraska. Burton was a carpenter.

Henry and Esther Thomas were married on Thanksgiving Day, November 25, 1914 at Esther's family home in Harrison, Nebraska. They lived at the Sam

Esther and Henry Thomas, 1955.

Thomas 33 Ranch for the first twelve years of their marriage and Henry worked for his father. Two children were born to Henry and Esther, Flora Lugena Thomas on October 8, 1918 and Sydney Burton Thomas on April 8, 1923.

In 1926 Henry Thomas moved his wife and children to a home on Antelope Creek which he had purchased from Mr. Moore of the Ogalalla Ranch. Henry's ranch was about one half mile west of the old Antelope Coal Mine. This was sixty-five miles north of Douglas, Wyoming and there mailing address was Verse, Wyoming. Jack Lindsey built the house and other buildings on the ranch and I, Flora Rash, have no idea how Mr. Moore came to purchase or sell it.

The thing that stands out in my memory of the time we lived on that ranch was June 1, 1929. We went to bed early for my father had just arrived home from lambing camp and we were all tired. About midnight my father heard something that woke him up and when he got out of bed, he put his feet in water on the floor. He knew immediately what had happened so he told my mother he would take some blankets and take them to the red shed and then come back and take the rest of us up there. He never could get back to us because the water was too high by then. My Aunt Ferna, Mother, Brother, and I sat on top of the piano and I held a kerosene lamp on my lap until daylight. While we sat on top of the piano we thought the water might come higher and drown us or that the house might wash away. I sat there shivering as we watched the wallboard being pushed toward us and the water gushing through. Trees went by on both sides of the house and the house would have been hit by one of them if our root cellar hadn't been just where it was and it kept the trees going to one side or the other. Because those trees went between my father and the house, he was afraid the house had gone but he couldn't do anything about it because of the rushing water. My father came at daylight to rescue us when the water receded.

We lived in the red shed the following winter while Happy Lewis built our house up on the hill using the logs from the house we had on the flat.

After we moved to this ranch I went to school in a school house right in the yard until after the flood of 1929. Then I went to the Koch School for one winter and to the school a mile and a half from home for two years. This school was for the Gladson children and my brother and me. The Gladson children were Forrest, Lucille and Ruth. When I was in the seventh and eighth grade we went to the consolidated school at Verse. Gladys Hanlin was our teacher.

My brother and I went to Converse County High School. I graduated in 1937 and he graduated in 1942.

Henry Thomas welcomed all the new settlers and helped them in any way he could to get started. This was a wonderful community where neighbor helped neighbor when they needed help, in case of sickness or accidents. In my father's lifetime his family always came first.

Even though the families in the community had to work hard, we also had fun. We had card parties, picnics, parlor games, and dances with the whole community including the children taking part. Card parties were at the homes, first one and then the other and I'll never forget the wonderful times we had.

In 1941 Henry Thomas sold the ranch to Jim Morton and moved to Miles City, Montana. He could get no more land where he was and moved to increase acreage and livestock. He bought the Hog and Miller Ranch ten miles south of Miles City, Montana. He operated this ranch until he passed away August 12, 1955.

With my brother helping her, my mother sold the ranch and moved to Billings the next year. She later moved to Bozeman and bought the Range Hotel which my brother ran for her. She died September 4, 1979.

My brother Sydney, now lives in Townsend, Montana. I live in Harlowton, Montana.

Thomson, Rod "Zip" and Catherine

John F. Thomson, Roderick's father, was born in Scotland. He came with his family to Nebraska in 1883 to homestead, locating on the land where the city of Chadron now stands. He is credited with having built the first houses in Chadron, Crawford and Harrison. John was a carpenter, dairy farmer, and rancher during his lifetime and also operated a freight line from Valentine, Nebraska to the Black Hills of South Dakota, using oxen to pull his cumbersome wagons.

Agnes Landles Thomson, also born in Scotland, came to Pennsylvania with her parents when she was a young girl. It is probable that both the Thomson and Landles families migrated into Iowa, since John and Agnes were married in Boone, Iowa and evidently lived there for several years.

Five children were born to this union, Jim, John, Mae, Clara and Roderick David. Roderick, the youngest, had the distinction of being the first white boy born in Chadron, Nebraska, on the fourth of December in 1885.

By the time Roderick "Zip" was four years old, he was sent with his older brother, John, to help herd milk cows on the open prairie near their home. One cold December day while the boys were tending the stock, a cow became mired down in a bog. They were trying to get the cow out of the mud when they caught sight of riders coming in their direction. Since there were many Indians in the vicinity at that time, the frightened boys ran to hide in a thicket of willows.

As the riders neared, it became apparent that they were soldiers, not Indians, and so the boys came from their hiding place to watch the column pass. At the head came a group of mounted soldiers, then foot soldiers, and in the rear, the supply wagons. The mounted vanguard of the "all-Negro" regiment passed the boys without so much as a glance in their direction. The foot soldiers, however, stopped to help the boys, laughing and joking over their predicament. One soldier went to a supply wagon and returned with a rope which he put on the cow. Then several big, husky soldiers pulled with all their might, trying to free the animal. All at once, the rope broke, letting the Negroes fall like a row of ten-pins. This mishap caused the rest of the company to howl with laughter, hooting and pointing at their muddy companions. The men doubled the rope, placed it once more on the cow, and this time were successful in dragging her from the bog. The column, which had been dispatched from Fort Robinson to quell the Indian uprising at Wounded Knee, then continued their return trip.

The three brothers were riding horseback one day in 1890, when they met several mounted men, who stopped to talk with them. The men told the boys that they were going to visit a sheep camp a short distance away and asked if the boys would like to ride along. Having nothing better to do, and being curious, the boys agreed to go. Upon their arrival at the sheep wagon, the boys witnessed a brutal murder.

A man named Eckman, who was inside the wagon, came out to stand on the wagon tongue. He and one of the mounted men had a heated argument, the end of which came when the rider drew his pistol and shot Eckman. He fell off the wagon tongue, dead. Eckman and his murderer had been associated with one another in the sheep business and it was thought that the murder was the result of a dispute between the two men over the management of the land and livestock. It was a terrifying experience for the boys, and one which Zip remembered vividly.

Zip, born only nine years after the Battle of the Little Big Horn, spent the early years of his life in close association with the Sioux. 15 years later, the white settlers were still apprehensive and distrustful. The townspeople of Chadron, in an attempt to convince the Indians of their peaceful intentions, invited Red Cloud and a few of his warriors to a Fourth of July Celebration. Red Cloud came and brought with him two thousand warriors. The settlers, fearing that the visit might develop into warfare, hurriedly slaughtered more beeves to feed their guests, hoping to avoid a confrontation in which they would be hopelessly outnumbered.

Zip remembered Red Cloud as a proud, intelligent man. While it was true that by the white man's standards, the Indians were a savage people, Zip did not entirely agree with this point of view. Red Cloud, when inside his tepee, went about naked, throwing a blanket over his body when he was summoned outside. The living habits of the Sioux were vastly different from those of the settlers and unacceptable to them. Zip, who spoke the Sioux tongue, knew Red Cloud and had talked with him a few times, and though Zip thought that the invasion of the Indian lands by the white men was inevitable, he also believed that the Indians had been treated unfairly in many cases. He was firmly convinced that he would have fought to protect his home and his land as the Indians had done.

During his teenage years, Zip worked for Jules Sandoz as a chain man when Sandoz was surveying in Nebraska. Sandoz told him that if he found some land to his liking, they would survey it out, and Zip could file a claim. Zip, however, was not of age at the time and refused to file illegally.

Though he attended the Buffalo Bill Cody Wild West Show a couple of times, Zip did not hold Cody in high regard. Part of the performance was an exhibition of Cody's expert marksmanship. After one show, Zip and his brothers picked up some of the empty cartridges, among them, one which had not been fired. They discovered it to be filled with birdshot, which explained Cody's unerring accuracy.

For a time, Zip was employed by the Spade outfit, trailing cattle into Casper, Wyoming. He happened to be there when the railroad was finished into that town. He also spent time working in a roundhouse for the railroad.

When Zip became of age, he and his brother, John, took homestead claims near Ardmore, South Dakota. They were engaged in raising horses, for which there was a good demand. A large number of their animals were sold to the United States Government to be used in the cavalry and the light horse artillery. In addition, some stock was sold to the Mexican government for use in their military operations.

About this time, the government issued wagons to Indians for their use on their land in the reservation. One particular Indian, feeling he had no use for his wagon, sold it to Zip, who used it on his homestead.

By 1914, the open land near Ardmore was becoming thickly populated as settlers filed their claims. The Thomson brothers' operation was experiencing difficulties. There was less open land upon which to run their horse herds and since each settler fenced his property with fences of jack pine posts and barbed wire, many of the animals suffered varying degrees of wire cuts. The Thomsons decided to look for land which was less crowded, and therefore, they sold their claims in South Dakota. They moved into Wyoming where they had bought relinquishments on Big Lightning Creek, northeast of Douglas, in 1916. At that time, they owned about 500 head of horses and were acquiring some cattle as well.

When the homesteaders began to file on land in the Big Lightning area, Zip and his brother seriously considered moving on once more, but finally decided against it.

After their arrival in Wyoming, John Thomson married and became the father of two daughters, Ruth and Irene. In 1926 a school was established for the girls. Catherine Gentry, aged 16, was employed as the teacher. It was there that she became acquainted with Zip, whom she married April 20, 1928 in Douglas, Wyoming.

Catherine Gentry Thomson was born in 1910 in O'Neil, Nebraska, one of a family of seven children. Her father, William George Gentry, was born in Weeping Water, Nebraska in 1880. Her mother, Ina Miller Gentry, was born in Pender, Nebraska. William and Ina were married in 1908 and made their home in Nebraska for five years, after which they moved to Manville, Wyoming where they had traded for a ranch. In 1917 they homesteaded north of Lance Creek, Wyoming. Ina served as postmistress at Lance Creek for some years.

Catherine received her common and high school education in Denver, Colorado, later attending normal training courses at the University of Wyoming. Catherine and Zip were the parents of three children, Maybel, Genevieve, and David Ray. These children were educated in the rural schools, completing their studies in the high school in Douglas.

Though the Thomsons bought an automobile around 1928, Zip never completely trusted the modern "tin-lizzy." He much preferred to do his traveling on horseback or by horse-drawn wagon. That way, he said, you'd be sure to get where you wanted to go.

Then came the years of drought and depression. Zip sold his starving cattle to the government along with the other sheep and cattlemen. For 600 head of cattle, he received around $6,000. The government sent their agents to slaughter the livestock. Zip filled his corral with cattle and the agent went into the corral where they began to kill the stock with sledge hammers, hitting the animals between the ears. This was not an effective method of slaughter, since many of the animals were not killed by the first blow and staggered, stunned, around the corral. When he could stand it no longer, Zip provided a rifle and shells so that the animals could be mercifully shot. After it was over, it was up to Zip to drag the carcasses of the animals out of the corral.

When the agents came for the second time, Zip had driven his remaining stock into a sort of box canyon some distance from his house, where the slaughter took place. The big, two-year-old steers tried to climb out of the trap, up the steep walls of the canyon, but could not. After this killing, Zip did not bother to gather the dozen or so strays which had escaped. He decided that it would be less cruel to let them try to live through the coming winter. Perhaps they would survive, perhaps not.

Zip hitched his team to the wagon he had bought years before from the Sioux Indian, and departed for Chadron, Nebraska, where he still had an interest in some land, to spend the winter of 1934-1935. When he returned to Lightning Creek about a year later, he found that the cattle had survived wintering on the dead cottonwood leaves which lay around the bases of the trees.

The land in Converse County upon which the last skirmish with the Indians occurred is a part of the Thomson ranch. In 1936 a party of Indians came to Wyoming from the reservation to ask Zip for permission to visit the site for the purpose of removing the remains of their tribesmen who had perished there. It was in this battle that Billy Miller and Louis Falkenburg lost their lives along with several members of the Sioux tribe.

Zip accompanied the braves to the battleground, and watched in awe as the Indians located their dead. The Indians would locate a certain cottonwood tree, or a shallow depression where a tree had once stood, converse with one another, and when they came to an agreement, they would pace off a certain number of steps from that point and there they would dig, each time uncovering human bones. Four graves were located in this manner, the bones exhumed, and taken back to the reservation for re-burial. It is hard to believe that those Indians were able to come and locate the graves 33 years after the battle occurred.

One grave, that of a warrior who was severely wounded in the battle, remains on the Thomson ranch. This brave was too ill to be moved, and after the others had been returned to the reservation, his squaw came to care for him. For some reason, the squaw moved her husband off the battleground, and after his death, buried him. Thus, when the Indians came to move their dead, they had no way of determining just where the grave was located.

John Thomson sold his property in the late 1930s and moved his family to Denver to make their home. Zip and Catherine remained on their ranch, operating it together until their son, David, became old enough to be associated with them in the operation. At the age of 81, Zip was still riding horseback, taking an active part in the ranch management.

He was a member of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association, a devoted husband and father. Catherine was a member of the Zonta Club, Cow-Belles and a life member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association. She was a kind and gentle lady. Zip died in May of 1973, Catherine on November 4, 1984. Both are buried in the Douglas cemetery.

It must be said of Zip Thomson that he was one of the most colorful and most interesting pioneers in Converse County.

Maybel, now Mrs. William Hitschew, had three children: Genevieve, wife of Darvel Funk (deceased) has two children, and David Ray, who married Rose Lee Robertson, has three children. David and his family operate the Thomson ranch on Big Lightning Creek today.

Tillard, Andrew and Emma Family

Andrew Tillard came to the Douglas area in 1904. Andy was born in Albany, Oregon on December 19, 1859. He married Miss Emma L. Rhea at Albany in 1891. Emma was born in Heppner, Oregon in 1869.

Andy grew to manhood in Oregon and for a number of years was engaged in the sheep business in and around Heppner, Oregon. Two of his three children, Rhea and Faye, were born in Oregon. The youngest daughter, Mildred, was born in Douglas.

In the late 1890s, during the Cattlemen Sheepmen War in Oregon, all of Tillard's sheep were killed. Andy was wiped out and dead broke. Being a man of strong will, he didn't let that defeat him. In 1898 Andy loaded his family in a covered wagon and migrated east. Andy had heard about Douglas, Wyoming from Dr. J. M. Wilson of McKinley. Dr. Wilson was in Oregon buying sheep to trail back to Wyoming. That is how Douglas came to be Andy's ultimate destination.

It was a long, hard trek for the young family. Rhea was only six at the time and Faye was four years old. Rhea rode horseback all the way. It's an interesting story of Rhea's horse. When he was born, a neighbor, Mr. Nelson, told Andy if he would name the boy after him, he would give the baby a horse. He got the horse, but by golly, he turned out to be a one eyed horse. But he was a pretty good horse, anyway. He got Rhea all the way to Wyoming.

Rhea loved to tell the story about his mother, Emma. She kept all the family money in an onion sack for safety during their trip. At night she kept the onion sack close by while they slept. One day she discovered the onion sack missing. They had to go clear back to where they had camped the night before. Sure enough, there the sack was under the tree. Nobody had bothered looking in an old onion sack, so the money was safe.

The Tillards first stop was in Dillon, Montana where Andy ran a sheep outfit for a few years. From there they went to Lander. They rode the stage from Lander to Brenning Basin. Brenning Basin is just twelve miles west of Douglas. They were on one of the last stagecoach runs from Lander to the Douglas area.

In 1904 they moved to Douglas where they made their home. They built a big two story house on South 4th Street where the old Safeway Store now stands. They felt they didn't have enough capital to finish off the top floor, so they rented it to the W. C. Irvine family. They moved in and finished the top floor.

In 1904 Andy bought half interest in the Smith Bar from George W. Smith. Mr. Smith was wanting to have more time to spend in the country, so it worked out great for both of them. The bar was located on Center Street, just east of the old Livery Stable (where the Kwik Print Shop now stands). It was a good location because there was so much activity around the railroad and livery stable.

Andy and George owned the bar for 15 years. But they could see the handwriting on the wall and sold out about a year before prohibition came in.

In 1918 Andy went into partnership with his son, Rhea and Mart Madsen. They formed the Mart Madsen Sheep Company. They ran their sheep on the Cheyenne River, in northern Converse County.

Andy passed away on October 31, 1931. Emma died in 1942. The three Tillard children grew up and were educated in Douglas.

Faye was born on October 27, 1898 in Portland, Oregon. She married William Kenneth Edwards at Douglas in 1922. They moved to Ridgewood, New Jersey, where Faye lived out the rest of her life. She had three daughters, twins, Joan and Susan, and the youngest being Patricia. Susan died at age two. Joan and Patricia have remained in the east.

Mildred was born in 1905 in Douglas. She took her higher education at Northwestern. She married Herbert Fowler. They owned and operated the Fowler Peth Lumber Company in Cheyenne for many years, until the death of Mr. Fowler. Mildred is now living in Denver.

Rhea remained in Douglas. Rhea Nelson Tillard was born in Heppner, Oregon on March 27, 1893. As a young lad, Rhea had quite the reputation of being a fast runner. When a new guy would come to town and thought he was fast, somebody would match Rhea against him. They would go get Rhea off the dray wagon, as he was working for Slonaker at the time. There would be a foot race right down Second Street. There was a lot of money won on Rhea.

Rhea loved all types of sports. He was a member of the first football, basketball and baseball teams organized in Douglas. Other team mates were Nealy Moore, Jesse Morsch, Howard Esmay, Frank Schmidt, Claude McDermott, Les Logan, Merritt S. Covington, F. Anthony, D. Grimes, J. McCrillis, F. Houghton, and Y. Slaus. They had a great football classic against Casper on Thanksgiving Day. A special train carried Casper fans to Douglas. It was a three hour trip.

In 1914, Rhea homesteaded 320 acres north of Douglas on the Cheyenne River, where the present ranch headquarters are today.

As a young man, Rhea worked for various outfits, including the "M. S. Bar," Lee Moore, Jim Shaw and the Keeline outfits.

Rhea served in the U. S. Navy during World War I and was discharged in 1919. During that time his father, Andy, assisted in the operation of the ranch.

Rhea married Angeline O'Leary, September 9, 1919. She was the daughter of James and Mary O'Leary. Angie, as she was fondly known, was a teacher. She taught in Iowa and later in Wyoming, teaching the first country school in District 17. It was the first school erected in that area. The school was called the O'Leary School, named in her honor. It was located about 31 miles north of Douglas on Highway 59 on the west side of the road. Several of Angie's former students still live in and around the Douglas area.

Rhea and Angie worked hard at their ranching business and continually added land to the original tract of 320 acres. They raised Rambouillet sheep of a commercial grade. They also ran Hereford cattle with registered bulls.

In 1935 Rhea bought half interest in the College Inn from L. V. Jones. He sold out to Jones a few years later.

The Tillards were very active in the community. Rhea was President of the Thunder Basin Grazing Association from the time it was formed in 1936 until his death in 1959. He was a County Commissioner from 1938 to 1942. He served on the American Legion Rodeo Board. The legion put on the Douglas Rodeo during the war years. Rhea was their arena director. He was an Executive Commissioner of the Wyoming Wool Growers and a member of the Wyoming Stock Growers.

Rhea and Angie loved the sport of rodeo and attended many to watch their son, Bud, compete. They had a host of rodeo cowboy friends.

Rhea didn't have many hobbies, except for his race horse, Ed Heller. He purchased him in 1949. Ed Heller was an outstanding quarter horse. He set four world records and numerous track records. He was Champion Two Year Old Quarter Horse of 1949. The Quarter Horse Association sent the Tillards a Certificate of Supreme, which is a very coveted award.

Angie was very active in her own right. She was past President of the American Legion Auxiliary. It was under her direction that the fireplace in the Legion Hall was built. She acquired a rock from every state in the union to be laid on it, which made the fireplace very unique. In the early '30s Angie taught an acrobatic class. A lot of the pupils in her class live in the Douglas area today and will fondly remember the many programs put on.

In 1963 Angie founded the local Gray Ladies Chapter and was President of that organization for eleven years.

One of Angie's proudest accomplishments was founding the Converse County Cancer Fund in 1953. She served as President of the Board when ill health forced her to retire. She felt very close to this organization as it was designed to help cancer victims of Converse County. She would be very pleased to know that the Converse County Cancer Fund is still going strong and that her son, Bud, is President of the Board.

Angie's fun hobbies were canasta playing and dancing. She won many card games I understand. She won many awards for her dancing. Angie was a fun, full of life, person. She passed away June 24, 1980.

The Tillards had two children, Helen and Bud, Helen was born in 1921. She graduated from high school in Douglas and took her higher education at Colorado University in Boulder, Colorado. After completing school she worked in Washington D.C. for Senator Frank Barrett. She married Dean Merritt. They owned and operated a western store in Cheyenne for many years. They had five children: Frank, Jim, Candice, Cindy Lou, and Melissa.

Helen is an accomplished interior decorator and has done many jobs throughout the state. She was the decorator for the Governor's Mansion in Wyoming. Helen is married to Dales Oakes of Cheyenne, where they make their home.

Helen's oldest son, Dr. Frank Merritt, D.V.M., died in 1982 as a result of a roping related accident. Frank was an outstanding veterinarian in the Seattle area, renowned for his work with horses.

Helen has three grandchildren, Frank's son, Justin, of California, and Jim's daughters, Cami and Stacy, of Cheyenne.

Their son, Rhea A. "Bud" Tillard was born July 28, 1923 in Douglas, Wyoming. He was raised and educated in Douglas and attended the University of Wyoming. He married Bette Jean Turner of Douglas, June 25, 1947. They have three sons, Andrew, Martin, and Timothy.

Bud's early life was spent in learning the ranching business. He has great love for the old west. One of his time consuming hobbies is rebuilding old sheep wagons, grain wagons and trap wagons that were used on the ranch by his forefathers.

Bud still lives at the ranch headquarters and is engaged in the ranching business with his three sons, all co-owners of the Mart Madsen Sheep Company, raising sheep, cattle, and quarter horses. In 1983, the Tillard brothers, with their father, acquired the "55" Ranch Company, north of Glenrock.

Bud and all three sons take a keen interest in rodeos and participating in steer roping throughout the state of Wyoming and adjoining states. They have put on many ropings at the home ranch. Bud qualified for the National Finals Rodeo in 1968 and 1969. His son, Mart, qualified in 1980, some eleven years later.

Andrew and his wife, Barbara Burgland Tillard have two children, Tara Lyn and Tyler Andrew. Andy and his family live in the original house on the ranch, making five generations having lived in that home.

Martin with his wife, Billie Laird Tillard, have two children, Casey Rhea and Kelly Jean. Mart and his family live on the "55" Ranch.

Timothy and his wife, Debbie King Tillard, have two sons, Troy Nelson and Timothy King. Their home is located near the ranch headquarters on the Cheyenne River.

With all of this heritage for the six grandchildren, it looks like there will be Tillards living in Converse County for many years to come.

Trenholm, Leo and Eva

Leo Trenholm and Eva Dorothy Trenholm, daughter of Roy and Carrie Dunivan Dorothy, were married in 1937. That same year they built the Riverside Service Station on the Platte River at Orin. They owned and operated the business until Leo's death in 1953. He was injured in a car accident on the Bosler cutoff between Wheatland and Laramie on the way to a basketball game. He died of injuries two weeks later.

Eva sold the business and went to work as a Secretary for the Atomic Energy Commission which had just established an office in Douglas for the exploration of uranium. The office was later moved to Casper where Eva now resides.

Tubbs, Ernest and Jessie

On June 15, 1922 the headlines of a Douglas newspaper read: "THREE DEAD IN ORIN TRAGEDY Tubbs and Wife Riddled With Bullets and Seth S. Magnussen Innocent Victim of Insane Attack—McPherson and Graham Wounded."

Ernest Tubbs was born in 1882, coming with his wife to Converse County about 1917. He was employed for a short time as a blacksmith by W. H. Athens. Later he moved to Casper where his wife died and a short while afterward he returned to Converse County to the Irvine neighborhood.

Jessie M. Leffler, a widow with two children aged five and two, was living on her homestead near Irvine at that time. Mrs. Leffler, born January 4, 1889 in Iowa, was the daughter of Smith Leonard. Her husband John had been killed at the Irvine Crossing when the wagon in which he was riding was struck by a Northwestern passenger train on November 19, 1917.

Upon his arrival in the community, Ernest Tubbs met the widow and the two were married two weeks after their first encounter. Tubbs took charge of the farm and the widow's affairs but from the very beginning there was friction between the neighbors and Tubbs, resulting from Tubbs' attitude towards the others of the community and the underhanded way he dealt with them. For instance, a neighboring farmer had put out the spring crops on the Leffler farm as a gesture of friendship and pity for the widow. Tubbs took over the crop and refused to compensate the neighbor for his seed and labor. Others in the community tried to be friendly to the newcomer at first but were rebuffed.

Tubbs' brutal treatment of his wife and nine year old stepson was resented by the entire community who felt pity for the woman and her children. Bennie, the stepson, left home because of the cruel treatment which he had received from his stepfather. It was in February of 1922. He was caught in a severe snowstorm and when he was finally found, he was in a pitiable condition. His feet were frozen so badly that the greater portions of them had to be amputated. He recovered, however, and in several weeks he was taken to the State Home for Children at Lander.

Evidently, Mrs. Tubbs was a weak minded, meek individual, for she followed blindly after her husband, not crossing him even to protect her child. Although court action against Tubbs was threatened after Bennie's tragedy, no action was taken. However, the neighbors, feeling that some punishment was due the man, waylaid him one day as he was returning from Douglas and gave him a whipping that confined him to his bed for several days. Tubbs then attempted to have those neighbors prosecuted, but no action was taken.

After these events occurred, the Tubbs lived a life of isolation on their homestead, having no intercourse with the neighbors. Through the abuse of his wife and stepson and his method of dealing, he forfeited the friendship of his neighbors and was ostracized by the entire community. Mrs. Tubbs' sister, Leona, who was married to a man by the name of Stock, lived near the Tubbs, but even the Stock family had no use for Tubbs. Tubbs and Mr. Stock were bitter enemies. The Tubbs lived in solitude, brooding over fancied wrongs and the weird hallucinations of a couple who believed that a mob of masked men were persecuting them. On June 13, 1922, Mrs. Tubbs went to Irvine, two miles west of the homestead and flagged the Northwestern westbound passenger train. She told the conductor a story of persecution on the part of a mob that had held them prisoners, asking that the conductor notify the sheriff when he reached Douglas so that protection could be given the Tubbs family. The conductor sent word to the Sheriff's office upon his arrival in Douglas. The undersheriff, McPherson, consulted with the Acting County Attorney Showalter regarding Mrs. Tubbs' request.

In the meantime Mrs. Tubbs returned to the homestead where she and her husband made preparations to start for Orin Junction with their three children. They loaded a box and suitcase filled with clothing in the wagon, in addition to firearms for protection against the imaginary masked mob. During their trip to Orin they evidently stopped at some farm having a telephone, for Mrs. Tubbs made a call to the Sheriff's office in Douglas, begging for protection. McPherson left immediately for the Tubbs' homestead, and upon arriving there, found the place deserted. He interviewed some of the neighbors only to find that there was no basis for the woman's statements and that the "mob" existed only in the weak, confused minds of the Tubbs!

When the Tubbs arrived in Orin, they went to Henry Hern's Mercantile Store, carrying their weapons inside with them. Shortly afterward, McPherson arrived, and leaving his gun in the car, entered the Hern Mercantile. Tubbs was sitting on a box, holding his infant child. Henry told Tubbs that McPherson was the man for whom he and his wife had sent. Tubbs, convinced that McPherson was part of the mob, drew a .45 Colt and fired at McPherson who was standing about 15 feet away. The pistol failed to fire the first time but a second attempt was successful. The bullet struck the officer in the right thigh, passing completely through the fleshy part of his leg. McPherson escaped through the door and Hern, who had been standing behind the counter, tackled Tubbs, wrestling the gun away from him and smashing Tubbs over the head with it. Tubbs fell to his knees and Hern turned to see Mrs. Tubbs aiming a .22 rifle at him. He knocked the gun aside trying to pull it from her hands but then he noticed that Tubbs had regained his feet and was apparently reaching for another weapon. Hern escaped from the building.

After he had left the store, McPherson telephoned the Douglas Sheriff's office to report and was told that a posse was being formed to come to Orin to capture the Tubbs who were holed up in the Hern Mercantile. Residents of Orin were soon on the scene, armed to engage in battle with the insane pair. They fired at anyone who appeared outside the store. In this way, S. S. Magnussen, agent for the Northwestern at Orin, met his death. He had come from his office in the depot when he heard the shots and had walked within 100 feet of the store. He was shot in the left side and in the shoulder and fell to the ground. A clerk, J. A. Graham, who worked at the Mercantile, ran to rescue a young child from the line of fire, and in doing so, was struck in the cheek by a bullet. Henry Hern at the rear of the building and George Howe in the front kept firing into the building. It gradually became evident that the battle was over for there were no answering shots. Cautiously they entered the store to find Mrs. Tubbs lying in the front part, her four month old baby beneath her. The infant was uninjured but crying loudly. Mrs. Tubbs had been shot five times. Tubbs was lying further back in the room with gaping wounds in his head and back. Both Tubbs were dead.

Acting County Attorney Showalter had called Doctors Hylton and Sunderland when he was first notified of the shooting. They immediately left for Orin where they ministered to the wounded Magnussen, McPherson and Graham. Magnussen died on the following day, the bullet in his left side having passed through his liver. Both Graham and McPherson recovered from their wounds.

An inquest was held shortly afterward with H. P. Allen, E. R. Romine and C. E. Clark composing the coroner's jury. It was evident that both the Tubbs were mentally unbalanced. The mob which the Tubbs thought to be a threat to them was actually a crew working for the Mountain States Telephone Company. They had come to repair the lines after a storm had damaged them.

Turner, Elmer and Marymond

Elmer Elijah Turner was born in April 1865 at Knox, Indiana and his wife, Marymond "Mate" Smiley Turner, on March 8, 1871. They were married there on June 26, 1892, later moving to Argos, Indiana where they lived for a time and where their four sons were born. Their first and second born sons, Paul and Robert, died as young children and are buried at Argos. Elsworth E. "Babe", was 9, and Harry D., 5 months, when the parents arrived at Lost Springs, Wyoming on March 10, 1910 to make their home. A house was built in town, leaving one room in front, later to become a butcher shop.

Soon thereafter Elmer filed on a homestead about three miles south of town. Others filing on homesteads in the same area were: Clyde Howell, Ed Kamp, Whites, Art Croco, Omer Moore, Wm. Miller and W. J. Donnelly, all had one thing in common—leaving Argos, Indiana to make their new homes in the vicinity of Lost Springs. The road on which most of these homesteaders lived, south of Lost Springs, was called Hoosier Avenue.

A butcher shop was opened to supply meat for the Rosin Coal Mine north of Lost Springs. Mr. Turner also put up an ice house and delivered ice and also used ice in the cooler at the butcher shop where the two or three beeves and also pork were hung to cool out after they were butchered each week. When someone wanted a piece of meat, a quarter was brought from the cooler; and the piece ordered was cut from it, and the rest returned to the cooler, much different from the pre-packaged meat we buy nowadays. The butcher shop was continued until the closure of the mine in the spring of 1912. During the operation of the shop, the homestead was contested because of insufficient time spent on it. This led to the filing of another homestead approximately three miles northeast of Lost Springs. Elmer farmed and raised some cattle on this land; and his spare time was used to pick up freight from the railroad and deliver it to the various merchants in the town or anyone else who wanted freight delivered.

Dr. Watkins and family moved to Lost Springs just prior to World War I and proved to be quite an asset to the community and especially so during the influenza epidemic of 1918. He also took a homestead two miles west of town. There were three children in the family; an older daughter, Leah, son Fred and daughter Evannah.

The Turners opened a cafe in the old saloon building at the beginning of prohibition in about 1920 and operated it for two or three years. Since there was no plumbing in the cafe it was Harry's job to carry water from a well into the building for use in cooking and for washing dishes and also for the various other needs of the cafe. While Mrs. Turner ran the cafe, Mr. Turner operated the farm, did butchering for neighbors, operated the dray business and did grading for the town. The Lost Springs town books show that on June 4, 1919 E. E. Turner was paid $4 for grading the streets and Mrs. M. M. Turner $3 for serving on the town election board; and at a special meeting in July 1919, Mr. Turner was not allowed $3 for grading the streets. After this Mr. Turner worked in the oil fields at Lance Creek until failing health overtook him and he retired in 1930 living in the home at Lost Springs until his death on October 5, 1936. His remains were returned to Argos, Indiana to be interred beside his two young sons. Mrs. Turner continued making her home at Lost Springs until returning to Indiana the fall of 1942 where she passed away on February 7, 1943 and is buried there.

Elsworth E. "Babe" attended school at Lost Springs and later became a cowboy working on ranches in and around the area. He married Gladys Decker of Lost Springs in July of 1920 at Douglas, Wyoming and they lived on the H. B. Card ranch south of Lost Springs where their daughter, Bette, was born on December 5, 1921. Later they lived on the 77 Ranch north of Lance Creek where Babe broke horses for A. A. Spaugh and himself. Babe and Gladys' son, Edson E., was born here on September 3, 1926. Harry recalls that Babe received $5 per head for breaking some 30 horses and it took most of the summer to do it, also that the first one they roped stood up on its hind legs and came at them. Most of the horses were mavericks about 7 to 8 years old, so really didn't pan out as good saddle horses gentle enough for anyone to ride. When on their way to deliver the horses one of them bucked Marshall Kamp off and also the saddle and bridle. Babe and family returned to Lost Springs and lived on the Manorgan place where he raised some cattle and sheep and also worked as a cowboy for ranchers in the area. Daughter, Mary Lou, was born here on July 2, 1928. From the Manorgan place they moved to the Salt Creek and Midwest area where Babe drove a truck between there and Casper for a time. Later they moved to Roby, Indiana in the early 1930s to operate a riding stable and it was there that he and Gladys separated. Babe returned to Wyoming in about 1940 and operated a service station at Kemmerer for a few years before running an irrigated ranch for Harry at Boulder, Wyoming. When Harry sold the ranch in 1947 Babe returned to Gillette where he lived until his death in an automobile accident in 1963. He is buried at Gillette. His children continued to make their homes in Indiana and Illinois.

Harry attended school from first through twelfth grades at Lost Springs, graduating in 1928. During the summers, while in high school, he worked for A. D. Brink doing farm work, wrangling horses at sunup, running a 4-horse fresno building reservoirs during the day and milking cows after dark for 50¢ per day. The third summer he was paid 75¢ per day.

Harry remembers that Mrs. Sadie Fenton could roll a Bull Durham cigarette faster than any cowboy in the vicinity and she could also handle a bullwhip as well as any bullwhacker and recalls her chasing Mrs. Watkins home with the bullwhip one time. He also remembers the finding of the body of a man in the railroad water tank and of skipping school to watch it being removed from the tank. It was said the man was murdered as the result of a high stakes poker game.

He also recalls that the Citizens State Bank of Lost Springs was the first bank in the State of Wyoming to go under and then the first one to pay out dollar for dollar. Harry participated in the rabbit drives during a winter in the early 1930's. On Sundays the ladies of the community would take lunches to a church in the area where the men would come in at noon for dinner. A section of land would be surrounded in all four sides by the hunters and the drive started winding up near the center of the section. On one Sunday over 2500 rabbits were shot. They were shipped to Omaha. Niobrara County gave one gun shell for every pair of rabbit ears brought in. Edward Hale of the Lost Springs community was a good shot, starting the season with a box of shells and finishing it with only 10 shells less than the full box.

Harry attended Chillicothe, Missouri Business College for one year, coming back to Wyoming where he went to work at Lance Creek in July 1929 and worked there until he went to work for the State of Wyoming in November of 1933 at Lusk for the Wyoming Employment Service, remaining with them at Buffalo, Gillette, Kemmerer and Rock Springs until 1946 when he returned to Gillette where he operated a livestock auction market for a number of years and later owning and operating the Stockman's Bar and Cafe there, retiring in 1974.

Harry and Frances Henrichsen were married at Deadwood, South Dakota May 16, 1932. A son, Douglas R., was born at Lusk on February 4, 1933, and a daughter, Vee, at Lance Creek on June 27, 1934. Douglas graduated from high school at Gillette and was in business with his father at the Stockman's Bar and Cafe until he became a real estate broker in 1972. Douglas and wife, Isabelle, have four children; Debbie Nuss of Worland, Vee McKim and Douglas R. "Beaver" of Gillette, and Roy Douglas "Ricky" of Denver, Colorado.

Daughter Vee and husband, Sonny Bjornsted, make their home at Sheridan and her children are: Billy Percifeld of Buffalo, Donald Percifeld, and also daughter, Toni Kell of Gillette, and son, Kelly McKim, who is a welder there.

Harry and wife, Carol, live at Buffalo and spend their winters in Arizona. They are the proud grandparents of eight lovely grandchildren.

Turner, Thomas and Eva Family

Floyd Turner and brother Clarence came to Converse County in 1917 and took up homesteads 32 miles north on the Ross Road in the vicinity of the 88 ranch. They returned back to Iowa in the fall and with brother Glenn enlisted in the first world war, serving together in the Army Air Corp. in England, and at the end of the war in 1918 were among the first troops to return to the states. They spent the winter in Iowa with their folks and together they returned in the spring of 1919 to the homesteads.

Sister Nellie and husband Jim Carpenter came to Converse County in 1920 and took up a homestead on the Bill Henry ranch, later moving to Douglas and going into the dairy business. Their two children, Dorothy and James, were born in Douglas and later moved to California.

Sister Bessie spent her summers with the brothers, then she filed on a homestead on the Cheyenne River and in 1927 married Dick Hornbuckle. They had three children; Dick Jr., Evelyn and Elaine.

Brother Glenn also proved up on a homestead.

Brother Earl and Helen, with family, moved from Iowa to Douglas. They had six children, Lorraine, Bud, Floyd, Virginia, Bette and Gordon.

Then the Turners' parents, Thomas and Eva Turner moved to Douglas to live.

In 1928 Floyd Turner and Beryl Hornbeck were married and had three children; Eva, Edna and Larry, who were all born in Douglas. The Brown Springs school was three miles farther north, and that is where Eva went to school for three years and Edna attended for one year.

In 1935 Floyd had surgery and was in the V.A. Hospital for three months and could not work for a year, so we moved to Douglas in 1936. Eva, Edna and Larry went to the North Grade and High Schools. Floyd then worked for the Government Rodent Control, was Deputy Sheriff with Clyde Ivester, and the Douglas Police with Lem Carmin, then twelve years at the LaBonte Hotel for Roy and Dee Ball; he then retired. Floyd was Commander of the American Legion at the time that the present building was bought, which was in 1945.

Beryl worked as a clerk at the Modern Store, Golden Rule, Peyton Bolln's, the Frontier Drug for about ten years and as nurses aide for 13½ years at the Converse County Hospital; then she retired. Beryl was Past President and District President of the American Legion Auxiliary.

Eva married Don Cook and they have three children: daughter Cheryl who married Roger Boespflug, and they have two children; daughter Chris married Michael Smith and they have two children; and son Kelly is married to Jeanette and they also have two children.

Edna married Bill Stevens and they have two boys, Zack and Greg.

Larry Turner and wife Yvonne have four children; Rory, Ted, Drew and Melanie. Melanie is married to Artie Bullock and they have two children.

Urban, Albert and Sophia

The province of Hanover, Germany was one of several small areas which together constituted the country of Prussia in the early 1800s. Each province had a king who ruled over the citizens. During the period from 1806 to 1862 there was political unrest and upheaval in the country. Austria and Prussia struggled to unite. Finally in 1862 Prussia demanded German unity with a liberal government. Shortly afterward, the Prussian King appointed Prince Otto von Bismarck to a powerful position and Bismarck finally succeeded in uniting Germany in 1871. The small provinces were absorbed into the German Empire at that time and all were under the rule of the first Kaiser, Wilhelm I.

Julius J. Urban and his wife, Minna, were natives of Hanover. Julius was the royal weaver for the King of Hanover. After Germany was united he became discontented with his life and immigrated to the United States in 1872. He settled his family in New York City where he engaged in the weaving business.

Albert Urban was born on March 26, 1865 in Walstrode Province, Hanover, Germany. When his family moved to the United States, Albert was seven years old. He began working in his father's weaving shop as a boy, attending school at night to obtain his degree in engineering. Having finished his education he migrated to Wyoming in 1890 where he was first employed as a surveyor on Morton's ditch near Douglas. He later served as County Surveyor over a period of years. Sometime during the decade from 1890 to 1900, Albert filed a homestead claim on LaPrele Creek south of Douglas where he raised Shorthorn cattle.

Albert and a friend took a trip to Yellowstone National Park before the turn of the century. They made the trip, which took two months to complete, by team and wagon.

Albert returned to the east to be united in marriage with Sophia M. Rumpleton of New Jersey in 1899. Sophia was born there on March 26, 1873 and received her education in the New Jersey schools. Upon the completion of her studies she was employed as a secretary in New York City. She continued to live in New Jersey, commuting to her job.

After their marriage, Albert and Sophia returned to Wyoming to make their home. Sophia's first years on the homestead were filled with learning how to cook and keep house. She had always worked after she finished school and had learned none of the arts of homemaking. There were two neighboring homesteads, each about two miles from the Urbans. One of the ladies, Mrs. Gore, taught Sophia how to bake bread.

Sophia had not learned to ride horseback so if she decided to visit with her neighbors, she had to make the journey afoot. Tales of marauding Indians and ferocious wild animals prevented her from doing this, however. As the years passed, Sophia gained confidence, learning to enjoy her new home and surroundings.

Albert, who had always traveled by team and wagon, or on horseback, bought his first automobile from Tom Virden. It was a second-hand Buick. He had never driven a car, so Mr. Virden obligingly gave Albert instructions for about 20 minutes, leaving much for Albert to learn for himself by trial and error. He managed to drive the vehicle home, about a mile and a half, and when he arrived there, he felt he had had enough experience to take his daughter, Minna, for a ride. Off they went up the meadow at the incredible speed of 20 miles per hour.

After the death of his first wife in 1922, Albert married for a second time to Dora C. Potter, a widow with a family of her own. He died on the fifth of March in 1946 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Minna Urban Cross was born on December 31, 1901. She received her common schooling in the rural schools of the LaPrele community. She was united in marriage to Alexander "Sandy" Cross on October 16, 1929. Sandy had a ranch in the LaPrele area and was engaged in raising Shorthorn cattle. He was the son of George H. Cross and Lea LeVasseur Cross, who had come to Converse County in 1874, among the first of the settlers of the LaPrele area. Sandy was born on June 8, 1894 at the home ranch in Converse County. To this union four daughters were born, Dorothy L., Elsie, Margaret and Frances. Sandy is now deceased, but Minna continues to make her home at the ranch.

Minna remembers that during the last illness of her father, Albert, when he was sure that the end was near, said to her, "I don't mind going because I don't owe anybody anything. I am happy!" It seemed a wonderful thing that his life ended with no debts left unsettled.

Valdez and Gurule Families

The Gurules came to Converse County from Colorado in 1934. Miguel Antonio Gurule was born in France around 1870, and immigrated to the United States when he was about two years old with his grandmother. His parents were presumably killed in the Franco-Prussian conflict before he left France.

Miguel and his grandmother moved to New Mexico. His grandmother's name was Juanita Cortez. She worked in a grocery store in Rancho De Taos, New Mexico. She is described as being a very pretty woman with red hair and green eyes. She died in 1925.

After Miguel grew up he worked as a ranch hand and miner when he could get the work. His first wife died after the birth of their first child who was raised by relatives. She now lives in Denver, Colorado. Her name is Julia Quintana.

Miguel later married Lazara Vigil Maestas. She was born in Talpa, New Mexico in 1866. Her parents presumably passed away as a result of Mexican/American conflicts, or possibly an Indian/white conflict. Before she married Gurule, she had previously been married to a man with the last name of Maestas. He died of black lung from working in the coal mines. Lazara and Maestas had eight children, six of whom survived. (One of these children, Saveda, had 22 children.)

After marrying Gurule, Lazara had six children, two who are presently living in Douglas, Elidia Valdez and Mary Lueras.

Miguel and Lazara moved with their family back and forth from Colorado to New Mexico, wherever work could be found. He played the fiddle and guitar for dances in between jobs or for entertainment. But mainly he worked as a miner near Leadville, Colorado.

During the depression years, they decided to move to Douglas as work was hard to come by. Also Miguel had developed a serious heart condition as a direct result of poisons the ranchers used to spray grasshoppers with. They decided to move to Douglas, Wyoming for the financial and morale support of his wife's son, Andy Maestas, who worked for rancher Bill Smith. They arrived in 1934, and Miguel died in 1935. Lazara continued to live in Douglas with their two daughters, Elidia and Mary, until her death in 1937. Before she passed away, her daughter, Elidia, married Pete Valdez in 1936.

Pete was born in a little village near Des Moines, New Mexico where he lived for 12 years with his grandmother, Marina Aveta. She was a full blooded Apache Indian. Her husband had been murdered by Indians while his family, Marina and their two daughters, Sara and Maria (Pete's mother) witnessed his death.

After Pete's birth, his mother, Maria Valdez, moved to Colorado and worked as a cook for ranchers who employed migrant farm workers. Nothing is known of Pete's father. As was mentioned earlier Pete was raised by his grandmother.

Eventually Maria found her way north, and settled in Torrington, Wyoming. Pete went to live with her there, attended school in Torrington, and later worked for ranchers in the area.

After school, Pete moved to Sacramento, California. At this time his mother moved to Douglas, Wyoming in 1934. Marina moved here to live with her daughter and resided with her until her death in 1954. Pete moved back to Douglas in 1935 where he met and married Elidia Gurule in 1936. Together, they had eight children, seven who survived. These are; Mike 1937, Ray 1939, Maria 1942, Nick 1944, Vicki 1945, Richard 1948 and Cisco 1953.

Pete worked for RH Fulton Construction, Union Pacific Railroad as foreman, Knisely Moore Construction, Gilpatrick's in Riverton, and had a mail route to Casper in later years. These are just a few of his jobs.

Pete passed away after a lengthy illness on February 22, 1971. He was survived by his wife, Elidia, and their children, and his mother who passed away in May of 1981. His wife and two sons, Richard and Cisco, presently live and work in Douglas; Mike lives in Salem, Oregon; Ray in Albuquerque, New Mexico; Marie in Rock Springs, Wyoming; Nick in Riverton, Wyoming; and Vicki in Idaho Falls, Idaho.

Valentine, William and Lula Family

William "Bill" and Lula Valentine came to Converse County, Wyoming from Beaver County, Oklahoma, June 19, 1919. They homesteaded 17 miles northwest of the town of Glenrock, Wyoming. Bill worked in the oilfields at Big Muddy and Tea Pot Dome to earn enough money to "prove up" their homestead and support the family, and Lula stayed on the homestead. She raised chickens, turkeys and milked cows and sold cream, butter, eggs and turkeys to the people in Parkerton and Glenrock. After they received title to the homestead land in 1925, Bill left the oilfields and worked for a neighbor, who was a sheep rancher. They raised orphan lambs and bought old ewes and cows to stock their 640 acre homestead. A humble beginning which has expanded to 70,000 acres and is still managed by their two sons.

William Noble Valentine, the eldest son of Elam and Laura Valentine was born in Squire Station, Arkansas on August 13, 1889. After he completed the fourth grade he went with his father to Texas where they ran race horses. In later years he joined the cattle drives north through Dodge City, Kansas and into Montana.

On November 29, 1916 he married Lula O'Neal, a school teacher at Ivanhoe, Oklahoma. She was the eldest child of James and Mary O'Neal. She was born in No Mans Land, Oklahoma on November 29, 1894.

After their marriage they lived in Beaver County, Oklahoma on the family farm with his parents and brothers, Louie, Aaron, Floyd, Otis and a sister, Mary.

On September 16, 1917 at Madison, Oklahoma, Lula gave birth to their first child, a daughter, Avis Marie.

The family farm could no longer financially support them so in the summer of 1918 Bill and Lula joined a wheat harvesting crew in Kansas. This crew was managed by Mr. Harlow, whose son had filed a homestead claim northwest of Glenrock, Wyoming. They harvested wheat north into Colorado and Nebraska.

In the fall, after the wheat harvest was over, Bill left Lula and Avis in Ft. Collins, Colorado and went to investigate the available homestead sites at Craig and Baggs, Colorado and Glenrock, Wyoming. His choice was Section 17, Township 35 North, Range 76 West, Converse County, Wyoming, 17 miles northwest of Glenrock, Wyoming. In October 1918 he boarded a freight train to Cheyenne, Wyoming and filed his claim on this tract of land. He then returned to Ft. Collins, Colorado where his second child, a son, Aaron Noble, was born on October 21, 1918.

Immediately following Noble's birth, the family moved to Scottsbluff, Nebraska where Bill shod horses and earned enough money to buy a covered wagon and a team of horses to move the family to the homestead in Wyoming. They loaded all their belongings on the wagon and set out along the Platte River. On June 19, 1919 they arrived at Parkerton where they crossed the river and headed north to complete the final ten miles of their journey to their new home.

Parkerton, Wyoming was located seven miles west of Glenrock. It was an oil boom town with a post office, grocery store, gasoline station and a high school. (The old teacherage for the high school is still occupied as a dwelling on the Valentine ranch.) There were several oil company camps in Parkerton, i.e., Ohio, Texas, Sinclair and Continental.

As they crossed the river bridge, Lula admired the big white house to the west, which was occupied by the Ed Smiths. He was the foreman for the Mountain Home Company. The fact this house would someday be her home would have seemed an impossibility to her.

After they reached the homestead, they set up their tents near Edith Lake. There were also some seeps nearby to provide some water. They became acquainted with their neighbors to the west, the Frank Whortons. Bill left Lula and the children to satisfy the occupancy requirement of the government and returned to Nebraska to work on the farms and harvest beets.

In early fall 1919 Bill again boarded a freight train toward Glenrock with enough money to buy material for a cabin. He got off the train at the Cole Creek Road at Parkerton and walked the ten miles to his home. During this fall they built a cabin, horsebarn, root cellar, drilled a well and erected a windmill. All the material for the buildings and windmill had to be hauled by team and wagon from Glenrock. He bargained with the superintendent of the Freepo Oil Company, who was drilling for oil to the northeast of the homestead, to drill their water well. It was 180 feet deep and produced good water for domestic use and drinking. The water was pumped into an underground tank and piped to the cabin from the tank.

The next spring and summer of 1920 they cleared, plowed and planted oats and wheat on 100 acres of the land. This provided feed for the chickens, turkeys, horses, cows and made good cereal to cook for breakfast for the family.

Bill and Mr. Whorton used their teams to haul poles for fence posts and corrals from Deer Creek Park south of Glenrock, Wyoming. As they descended Negro Hill with their loaded wagons the brakes failed on Mr. Whorton's wagon and ran into Bill's wagon causing the team to run away. He almost lost his team and his own life. His childhood years in Kansas and Oklahoma had not instilled a love for the mountains in him, even though he recognized their advantages of timber and water. This incident squelched any doubts he had about his decision to homestead in the flat sandhills. He felt he would rather work in the oilfields and earn the money he needed for poles.

In the spring of 1922 he went to Tea Pot Dome with his team to ride pipeline and haul supplies in the oilfields. The oil companies had a mess hall and cooked for the employees but didn't have any provisions for housing. The men slept in tents near the camp. Lula stayed on the homestead and milked cows and sold milk, cream and butter to the people in Parkerton and Glenrock. She also raised chickens and turkeys. She sold eggs the year round and sold turkeys for the holidays.

On August 13, 1922 Noble became very ill. Mrs. Whorton went by horseback to Glenrock to get Dr. Herbert Harvey but they did not return in time to save his life. The cause of his death was never determined but was believed to have been food poisoning.

Dr. Harvey felt Lula should not remain on the homestead for the winter. She was pregnant with their third child. They leased the homestead to Pat and Elma Leach, employees of the Freepo Oil Company. Lula moved to Glenrock and gave birth to Fay on February 2, 1923.

By the spring of 1923 the oil companies at Tea Pot Dome had built houses for their employees. Lula and the children moved there in May. They lived at Tea Pot Dome until the spring of 1924 when Bill quit, and they returned to the homestead to continue their business of building a sheep ranch. He had now earned enough money to buy posts and wire to fence the outside perimeter of the land.

In the fall of 1924 Bill and a neighbor, Robert Smith, formed a partnership and went into the sheep business in a big way. They borrowed enough money from the Glenrock State Bank to buy 1000 head of ewes at $13.50 per head. They used only the sheep for collateral.

On October 11, 1924 their fourth child was born, a daughter, Lena Lois. She was born in Glenrock, Wyoming.

During 1924, 1925 and 1926, the Big Muddy Oilfield boomed and the sheep business prospered. On January 24, 1925 they received title to their homestead from the United States of America.

On September 10, 1926 their fifth child was born, a son, Herbert Jack. He was born at Glenrock, Wyoming.

Avis had attained school age and had gone to live with the Whortons who had moved to Glenrock to work at the Continental Oil Company refinery. She attended school in Glenrock until 1929 when the school building on Sand Creek was moved near the homestead and became the Lone Tree School. There were seven children to attend this school: three of the Valentines, two of the Sayles and two of the Warrens.

In 1929 the Glenrock State Bank had financial problems and went out of business. They had to declare all their outstanding loans due including the loan for the sheep. The price of sheep had dropped drastically over the years so Bill had to sell all his livestock including the chickens, turkeys and milk cows to pay off his loan. This set them back to the beginning with only the land in their possession. Bill started working for another neighbor, Pete Nicolaysen, who was a sheep rancher. Bill used his horses to tend camp for Mr. Nicolaysen.

On July 8, 1929 their sixth child was born, a daughter, Vera Florence. She was born in Glenrock, Wyoming.

During the next several years Bill and Lula gradually built up another herd of sheep by feeding orphan lambs and buying old ewes and old cows.

On August 28, 1933 their last child was born, a son, Dale Lee. He was born at Casper, Wyoming.

In 1936 Bill was stricken with tick fever and was hospitalized in Casper which created serious financial hardships for the family. But again they stuck together and endured and prospered.

By the year 1938 they had acquired enough equity to buy more land. During the next two years they bought the homesteads of Hamlin, Henderson, Phillips, Wiley, Ford and Melberg. These tracts were all in the same general area of the homestead. In 1939 they purchased the Mountain Home Company land along the North Platte River. During World War II period they bought the ranches of Spencer and Smith in the north country and Hawkes and Cromwell south of the river in the Big Muddy oilfield. By this time, the town of Parkerton no longer existed and the high school had been torn down and moved to Glenrock.

In the fall of 1946 Lula moved into the big white house of the Mountain Home Company which she had admired while crossing the river bridge some 25 years earlier.

During the 1950s they purchased the ranches of Kothe, Lennox and Beck in the north country near the homestead and the Kron, Cornell and Goff property south of the river. During this time they also bought the farmland along the Platte River from the Crosswait brothers. This farm was formerly the Glenrock Sheep Company.

On July 10, 1961 Bill and Lula transferred all their holdings, land and livestock into a family corporation, William Valentine and Sons, Inc. All the children received stock in this corporation.

There has only been one major purchase of land since the business was incorporated and that was the Robert Hiser place on Boxelder Creek south of Glenrock on August 1, 1980.

All the Valentine children attended schools in Glenrock and graduated from Glenrock-Parkerton High Valentines working cattle.

School, except Avis who graduated from Natrona County High School in Casper in 1937.

All the children married except Herbert. Avis married Charles Nicholas Carlon on June 17, 1953 at Carson City, Nevada. They had two children, Margi and John. Fay married Mary Martha Wagner on February 19, 1955 at Glenrock, Wyoming. They had three children, Mary Ann, William Frederick and Jim Fay. Lena to John Robert Blackwell on May 12, 1956 at Thermopolis, Wyoming. They had one child, Reva Jo. Florence married Alva Harlen Baughman on December 26, 1948 at Colorado Springs, Colorado. They had five children, Bertha Lena, Albert Gene, Roy William, Beverly Ann and Lu Eva Lee. Dale married Verna Lee Boyd on July 20, 1958 at Oakwood, Virginia. They had three children, C.B., Lesa Lois and Terry Lee.

Fay died at Casper, Wyoming on July 9, 1967. Bill died on April 10, 1968, also in Casper. Lula died in a nursing home in Ft. Collins, Colorado on September 16, 1973.

All the sons have worked and lived on the ranch continuously except for four years from 1963 through 1967 when Dale worked on a ranch for Harold Josendal southwest of Casper, Wyoming and Herb worked at the Billings Livestock Auction in Billings, Montana.

At the present time the ranch corporation controls approximately 70,000 acres of land, 32,000 acres of this land is deeded. It extends 50 miles from the sandhills north of Glenrock, Wyoming to the Medicine Bow Forest south of Glenrock, Wyoming and is stocked with 3,600 head of sheep and 500 head of cattle. The livestock are trailed from the north range to the Hiser place and the Medicine Bow Forest for pasture during the summer months. The trailing is conducted in the same manner as it was 65 years ago; on horseback and sheep wagon, although the sheep wagon is pulled behind a diesel powered pickup truck instead of a team of horses. Gathering techniques have been modernized with two way radios, motorcycles and or snowmobiles and an airplane.

The ranch business is managed by Dale and Herb. the third generation is actively involved in the management. C.B., Dale's son, supervises all the work involving the sheep and cattle. He and his family also live on the ranch property.

Vandegrift, William and Athol

William C. Vandegrift's ancestors came from Holland originally. William was born in Austin, Minnesota in 1886.

William was raised by his uncle, Thomas Hart Benton Vandegrift, who adopted him after the death of his mother. He was raised in Egan, South Dakota and received his common school education there. He attended the Agricultural College at Brookings, South Dakota, as well as being a student at the Art Institute of Minneapolis and at the Chicago Art Institute.

Vandegrift came to Wyoming to establish a grain elevator and potato cellar called the Lost Springs Co-Op. William's father had operated a grain elevator in South Dakota.

Athol Stevenson was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa in 1896. Her parents were Brougham and Lulu Rhodes Stevenson. When Athol was a young girl the family moved to Omaha, Nebraska. Athol's father purchased a 120 acre relinquishment northeast of Lost Springs in 1917. He offered it to Athol and she accepted it happily. When school was out in the spring where she was teaching, she set off for Wyoming to file and prove up on her homestead.

Athol's father accompanied Athol and her mother to Lost Springs. He found lodging for them with the Horace Woodward family. Mr. Woodward ran the local lumberyard, while Mrs. Woodward was employed as postmistress. Athol and her mother lived with the Woodwards until their own homestead houses were completed. Mr. Stevenson then returned to Omaha.

Miss Stevenson was employed by the local banker, Mr. Butterfield, to act as cashier on a temporary basis until his permanent cashier, Mabel Buffington, recovered from injuries she had sustained in a runaway accident. Mrs. Stevenson found employment in the post office.

Business in the community was booming. Mr. Butterfield loaned money on short term notes of 90 days at the rate of 10% interest. Aspiring ranchers and farmers with dreams of immediate wealth patronized the bank and readily accepted the banker's terms.

The town in 1918 was bisected by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, running from the east to the west. The depot and water tower were located beside the tracks on the east side of the main street which was laid out at right angles to the railroad. North of the depot on the same side were located a hotel, restaurant, pool hall, post office and a blacksmith shop. On the west side, a scale house next to the railroad, Freeland's Hotel, Cheap John's Meat Market, a garage, the Butterfield Bank, and the Bee Hive Apartment House, which also housed the printing presses of the local weekly newspaper called the "Bee Hive." At the extreme northern end of the street stood the two room school house. Southeast of the school the modern home of Charlie and Lillian Hitsheew was located. Besides being the local midwife, Mrs. Hitsheew ran a dairy.

Paralleling the railroad at right angles to the main street was a street along which were located a second grocery store, another pool hall and a garage. Across the tracks to the south were the Woodward Lumberyard, Turner's Meat Market and Pennington's Livery Stable.

The entire population of the area turned out July 4, 1918 to celebrate Independence Day. In the morning a grand parade was to be held, the route commencing at the school house and proceeding south along main street to the railroad. The town rented two costumes for the parade at the cost of $5.00 each. One costume made of red, white and blue satin, clothed Miss Columbia portrayed by Alaska, the beautiful daughter of the local Doctor Watkins. The second costume was one made of mail which clanked and rattled, and was worn by a local girl, aged twelve, portraying Joan d' Arc. She was to ride horseback arrayed in her armor.

Joe Ladgin, the blacksmith, owned the only phonograph in town. The master of ceremonies, leading the parade, carried the phonograph to provide music. The flag-bearers followed the master of ceremonies, and were in turn followed by a group of children carrying small American flags. Next came a dray wagon carrying Uncle Sam, in a homemade costume, Miss Columbia in her glorious satin, and the Goddess of Liberty resplendent in a homemade robe of cheesecloth. The Goddess of Liberty was portrayed by Miss Athol Stevenson. Following the dray wagon were three horsemen, Cody Shippen, Ellis Coggeshell, and Babe Turner. Another dray wagon owned by the Pennington Livery and driven by Les and Roy Pennington completed the parade. Joan d'Arc was missing!

The directors of the parade had feared that the horse Joan was to ride might become unmanageable as a result of all the noise and excitement, and that the beast might also object to the strange garb of its rider. Therefore, Joan's mount, with Joan astride, was tied in the safety of the Posey Stable to wait for the parade to begin.

The parade was all over when Jo Posey remembered the hapless Joan sitting in her brother's stable. The townsfolk must see the costume for which they had paid a rental! Jo grabbed a flag from one of the bearers and raced to the stable. She emerged leading a drooping Joan, but poor Joan could not see the people as the visor of her helmet had dropped down, obscuring her vision.

When Athol's dwelling was completed on her claim, she left Woodward's and moved in. The house was 8' x 20' with a 4' x 8' space partitioned off for a kitchen. She named her home "Castle View Ranch." Mrs. Stevenson's dwelling was much more elaborate, having two rooms. Each measured 12' x 12'. Both houses were painted on the outside, plastered on the inside and shingled. Athol and her mother spent the weekends at Castle View and the weekdays at Mrs. Stevenson's.

Among the "elite" of Lost Springs were the Howard family and the two Cannon families. Pertinent to this account is the family of Earl Cannon, since he "kept company" with Athol for a time after his divorce from his first wife was final. Earl was the son of Mrs. Widdie Cannon. He owned the only threshing machine in the area. After the harvest season, he invested his money in a big open Buick automobile in which he came courting Athol.

Though money was not easy to come by, the laborers in Lost Springs were selective about the type of work which they would take. William Vandegrift had no trouble finding workmen for the building of his elevator, but when it came to digging his potato cellar, not many were interested. Therefore, the cellar took several months to complete.

William came into Butterfield's bank to deposit money for the co-op. It was there that he first met Athol. Later he asked Mrs. Stevenson if Athol could help him with his accounting. He became a regular visitor at the Stevenson home, though actually he needed no help with his bookkeeping.

One day, a professional gambler came to town. He set up poker games which were played at Turner's restaurant and which took up the men's evenings. The gambler allowed the townsmen to win at first, but little by little the gambler began to win, and the stakes rose. One evening most of the local men were involved and the stakes became worthwhile. Bets were eventually backed by IOU's. Ted Posey and Mr. Cannon, Widdie's husband, were doing some mighty heavy betting. Mrs. Posey walked in, laid her "shooting iron" on the table and stood over her husband to watch the proceedings. This dampened the enthusiasm of the players considerably. The game broke up. Mrs. Posey had convinced all of them that she meant business. Posey's IOUs amounted to several hundred dollars, as did those of Mr. Cannon. The next morning at a very early hour, Mrs. Cannon routed Mr. Butterfield out of bed, drew all the money from the Cannon account and marched out of the bank. The account was not depleted further by Mr. Cannon nor was he seen in town for a long time.

Oil fever infected the population in 1918 and 1919. Ohio Oil Company had capped a well about four miles from town. A gusher was struck at Lance Creek to the north. Everyone was sure that he or she would become a millionaire in no time at all. The Lance Creek field was a success, but the homesteaders in the vicinity of Lost Springs were obliged to make their living in other ways.

Athol Stevenson finished proving up on her claim in September 1920 and returned to Council Bluffs to care for her father and her sister, Charlotte. She enrolled in Van Sant Business College, an exclusive college for girls and women. She married William Vandegrift in 1921, after which the couple returned to Lost Springs, Wyoming to make their home. Shortly afterwards they moved to Casper where three of the children were born.

There were five children born to this union. They were William Brougham, Robert Arthur, Virginia Valora, Donald Richard and Elizabeth Lu. All of the children grew to adulthood with the exception of Donald Richard who died at the age of ten.

William died in 1957 and Athol in 1974.

Vanderwalker, Fred and Olive

Vanderwalkers came to Wyoming to homestead in 1916 or 1917. They came from near Kansas City, Missouri. The family consisted of Fredrick "Fred" (b. 1869), his wife, Olive Harriet (b. 1868), a daughter, Florence Susan (b. 1900), and a son, Frank Olivia. Their homestead was on Twenty Mile Creek north of Lost Springs.

I. Mildred Howell, don't remember much about them until my high school years. My parents, Clyde and Lindie Bowell, had the garage and hotel in Lost Springs. I can remember Fred coming to town with a wagon and team for supplies. He would stay overnight at the hotel and when the weather was cold, my mother would wrap a hot sadiron and give it to him so he could get warm. He was a tall thin man and talked very little.

Florence was married to Howard Smith, October 3, 1922. They also had a homestead near the Vanderwalkers. Howard and Florence had two children. Beatrice was born on November 15, 1923. Beatrice started to school at Lance Creek but most of her school years were in California. Beatrice married and lived at National City near San Diego. She had four children and they live close to that area now.

Jack was born December 22, 1924. He married a nurse at National City. They had two boys and two girls. This family is now in Colorado.

Frank Vanderwalker was born December 8, 1905 at Kansas City, Missouri. He would have been about twelve years old when the family came to Wyoming. He enjoyed horses. He and his dad did some farming and raised cattle, horses, hogs and chickens.

Olive, Fred's wife, was a big woman. She would always smile and she lived a very quiet life, partly because Twenty Mile life had so little to offer. She could make the best bread. Even though her last years were spent in a chair she was always able to smile. She enjoyed Florence's children so much when they were small. She was a very active woman doing the chores, etc. until she injured her back. The cows suffered after this because Fred did not like to milk.

Frank was married to Mildred Bowell April 30, 1928. In 1930 they went to California. Their first child, Betty was born January 1, 1932. Their second child, Donald, was born February 26, 1934. The third child, Richard, was born November 17, 1935. Frank worked for the U.S. Forest Service three years and then obtained a star mail route which he had until his death on February 28, 1949.

About 1930 Fred and Olive sold the homestead home and moved to Douglas. Olive died June 16, 1932. Fred didn't stay too long alone in Douglas. He moved to California to be with Frank but lived most of his life with or near Florence in National City. He passed away March 21, 1955 at the age of 86.

Van Dine, William and Pearl Family

Richard Van Dine's father, William, the oldest of six children, came to Wyoming from Ohio in 1910. He met Pearl Burkhart, the oldest of the four daughters of John William and Cora Bell Scott Burkhart who had come to Douglas from Van Tassell, Wyoming. William Van Dine and Pearl Burkhart were married in Douglas on February 15, 1911.

William Van Dine bought 160 acres near Lost Springs for $1.00 per acre from the government and also had the coal and mineral rights. It was located north of Lost Springs with the east boundary right on the line between Converse and Niobrara Counties. (Richard Van Dine still owns this place today and leases it out.)

William and Pearl's oldest son, Bernard, was born here in 1912.

William Van Dine was in the construction trade and took the team and wagon to Lusk to earn his living as a carpenter. He worked there during the week and came home on weekends.

Pearl Van Dine was a very independent person. One time when her husband was working in Lusk, a skunk got under their house in Lost Springs. Pearl loaded up a double-barrel shot gun and shot the skunk. Then she and her sisters carried dirt for a week trying to cover up the smell before William came home for the weekend.

The family moved then to Douglas and rented a little house in the alley in back of the old Mecum house between 5th and 6th Streets in the 400 block. (The house is not there anymore.) Richard Van Dine was born August 30, 1915 in this house. His sister, Dorothy Van Dine (Widick) was born July 8, 1920. She lives in Napa, California and is a widow now.

The Van Dines lived in this small house on the alley while their dad, William, was building a house at 527 South Sixth Street. He built the house himself and Richard still owns it today.

William Van Dine was a foreman for Ed Reavil who built the LaBonte Hotel and did all the bridge building and most of the construction in the county. He was a hard driving foreman and one time when he told his crew to get busy and get things done, one of the men hollered, "Oh, hell, Bill, why rush? Rome wasn't built in one day, you know!" Bill replied, "Maybe not, but I wasn't foreman on that job either."

When Bill Van Dine's crew was building bridges on the LaBonte, Ed Reavil would come out with his buggy and team to see how they were doing. He would often stay overnight. He needn't have worried though because Bill and his crew had a reputation for good quality workmanship.

Richard graduated from the old Douglas High School and then worked along with his dad and learned the building trade. Later he did construction work in army camps around Ogden, Utah, Camp Hale near Leadville, Colorado and the air base at Rapid City as well as around Douglas.

He married Beatrice Steffen, the daughter of Benton J. and Ethel M. Cook Steffen in November 1935.

His wife, Beatrice, took normal training and was a teacher at Pleasant Valley School. One of her pupils was Alvah Ayres and she said, "He was one of the smartest kids I ever taught."

Richard and Beatrice's daughter, Janet, was born in a house in Douglas, 214 North Fourth on June 7, 1936. She was a premature baby weighing less than four pounds and had to be left in the hospital quite a long time. Beatrice had gone coyote hunting with him shortly before Janet was born and Richard wondered if this was why she was premature. Anyway, she grew up to be a strong and healthy girl. She married Robert Harris and they have five children: Joyce, Greg, Julie, Judith and Richard (Richie).

William died December 11, 1947 and Pearl in 1981.

Richard and Beatrice (Bea) enjoyed life together a great deal. They always shared everything. For instance, every time Richard tried to make the fire in the coal stove, he would put it out with too much coal. Bea always made the fires then and Richard often did some of the other household tasks.

Beatrice had a birth defect of her hip and could not walk very well, but Richard designed the house to make things as easy for her as possible. She became ill and died July 14, 1982 and it's been pretty lonely since then for Richard.

He has many hobbies and collections. He makes beautiful wooden clocks and has at least one in every room. He also has refinished antique furniture. His home is beautiful and very well kept. He has a real good sense of humor and is a very liable person.

As told by Richard Van Dine

Van Pelt, John and Olive

Olive Shelden, fourth child of Rueben and Phoebe, married John Van Pelt in Ringgold County, Iowa. Olive had started to learn to teach but was soon married. Both Olive and John were from farm families so after their marriage they moved to Artesian, South Dakota and started their own farm. Phoebe and sister, Nora, visited the South Dakota farm.

With relatives, two brothers, Leonard and Roy Shelden in Wyoming, Olive and John, with new hopes, moved from South Dakota to Converse County in 1920. They settled near the other Sheldens about 30 miles north of Douglas and twelve miles west of the present Highway 59.

They were some of the best farmers around. John raised wheat, barley and oats. John's large barn is the only building remaining on the homesteads.

Radios came out and John and Olive had the first one in the area. All the neighbor kids came to listen. It was equipped with one headphone so there was only one listener at a time. You could listen until Uncle John came home, then it was his turn.

All the homestead houses were close. Even if you lived close to your family you still didn't have to like each other. Rosie, Leonard's wife, would walk past Aunt Olive's house to get the mail and Olive would sic the dog on her, which made Rosie's trip go faster!

They had three children born in South Dakota, two boys and one girl, Roy, Owen and Lily. During the drought John worked as the foreman on the Fleming Ranch. The homestead was sold in 1937 to Manning. They moved to California and John worked in an airplane factory during the war.

Olive and John lived in California until their deaths. Roy died in California too. Owen and Lily, with their families, still live in California.

Vetter, Jim and Nina Family

James William "Jim" Vetter was born in Stanton, Iowa on February 20, 1891. His father was Adam Vetter, an immigrant from Germany. His mother, Sarah Jennings Vetter, was born in Ohio of immigrants from England.

Nina Erickson Vetter was born in Stanton, Iowa. Her father, John Erickson, had immigrated from Sweden. Her mother, Amelia Anderson Erickson, was born in Indiana of immigrants from Sweden.

Jim and Nina were married in 1915. At that time the railroad had been extended to Douglas and there were many advertisements for people to go to Wyoming, obtain free land and settle the area. Jim and Nina had grown up on farms and thought homesteading would be a challenge and an adventure. After Maurice was born in 1916, Jim went to Wyoming and settled on land 35 miles north of Douglas. In 1917, Nina and Maurice arrived by train to join him. He was not at the train to meet them. A very apprehensive Nina finally went to a boarding house and found lodging for the night. Jim appeared the next day. The mud had been so deep he could not get to town. They travelled out to the homestead in a wagon. It was a year and a half before Nina got to town again.

Jim took whatever work he could find to earn money while they were proving up on the homestead. He worked at Lance Creek and Big Muddy Oil Fields and for ranchers. He was often gone from home for extended periods of time. Jim had worked for the phone company in Iowa and brought three telephones to Wyoming. He hooked up battery powered phones between their house and two other homesteads by running the lines along the fence posts. The women felt less isolated when their husbands were gone, knowing they had a means of calling for help if necessary.

It was often a lonely and hard life, but the neighbors all helped each other. They socialized at community parties and picnics and at church services and Sunday School. Chester and Mary Jane were both born on the homestead. One of the homesteaders was Dr. Lynch, another was a midwife, Helen Keefe. They helped with births and illnesses.

They moved into Douglas in 1922. They lived in a house owned by the Fiddleback Ranch, where the cowboys could sleep and corral their horses when they made the long trip into town. They became active in the Methodist Church, Eastern Star and Jim in the Masonic Lodge. Donald was born September 27, 1923, the day of a big flood that destroyed the railroad bridge. Richard was born in 1927 and Russell in 1929.

Jim was a rural mail carrier for 25 years on the Orpha route. He also had a filling station and a Culligan service. All six children graduated from high school in Douglas. Maurice, Chester, Donald and Richard were in the navy during World War II, and Mary Jane in the Army Nurse Corps.

Jim was the first curator of the Pioneer Museum and worked there several years.

Russell, known as Dutch, died in 1951. Jim died in 1964 and Maurice in 1980.

Nina is the only family member remaining in Douglas. She is 89 and lives at Irwin Towers.

Virden, Frank, Sallie and Hannah

One of the early sheriffs of Converse County as well as a respected rancher, Frank H. Virden was born in Harbenson, Delaware on February 22, 1864, to Joseph B. and Elizabeth F. Rust Virden. Being of adventurous spirit he drifted to Wyoming when 22 years old and worked on the SO Ranch operated by J. M. Carey, who he had known in Delaware. Later he homesteaded on what later was known as the Speas Ranch at Bessemer Bend of the North Platte River and built the first bridge across that stream. In 1891 he sold his homestead to Speas and bought an interest in the GR outfit 18 miles south of Glenrock. His water rights on Virden Creek were granted in 1886.

Bob David, son of E. T. David, in his memoirs tells about Frank Virden.

"Frank Virden was a good friend of the family. He had been a cowpuncher for the CY in the old days before he saved up enough to buy a fine ranch on LaPrele. I heard him telling Father one day about the true story of the "changing of the babies" that became so well known from Owen Wister's book, 'The Virginian'.

"He said that he was one of the cowboys who attended the dance at the old Goose Egg Ranch and that he decided to slip into the bedroom where the babies were lying side by side on the bed, and change their clothes so that the mothers would have a difficult time in identifying their offspring.

"However, the first baby he touched bawled so loudly that several mothers rushed in, discovered his attempt and kicked him out without ceremony.

"His effort fell flat, but when Owen Wister heard about his idea a few months later he built it up into an episode in his book."

He served as Converse County Sheriff from 1892 to 1896. During that time he was credited with the delivery of more cattle thieves at the state penitentiary than any other sheriff in the state. On one occasion, he followed two horse thieves 400 miles, at last capturing them in Montana, returning along with them, and making the trip of 800 miles in seven days and nights.

In 1896 he was married to Sallie Black of Delaware. They had one son, Thomas, who was later associated with his father on the lands now owned by Rory Cross at the foot of Virden Hill on LaPrele Creek and also at Green Valley Ranch on Little Boxelder.

By 1901 he had sold his holdings on Virden Creek to John E. Higgins and moved to the Charles George Ranch on Upper LaPrele Creek which is now owned by Bill Cross. Part of the purchased land lies under the LaPrele Reservoir.

Sallie Virden died on May 20, 1913 in Douglas. Frank married Hannah Brown Johnstone in 1916. Hannah was born on April 9, 1864 in Frelton, Ontario, Canada, coming to Douglas as a manager of the Douglas hospital run by her sister, Mary Brown, and Grace Galbraith in 1908.

Frank and Hannah operated the LaPrele Ranch until 1919 when he moved to Douglas and worked in the First National Bank as a loan inspector. He gave this up in 1923 to become an officer of the Converse County Bank. Mr. Virden died on November 17, 1928 in Denver, Colorado and Hannah on July 1, 1940. Thomas died in 1972 in Montana.

Virden, Peter R. Family

Peter "Pete" Rust Virden was born in Wilmington, Delaware on May 15, 1859, the son of Joseph and Elizabeth Rust Virden.

Pete, a widower, came to Wyoming on December 25, 1897 from Lewes, Delaware. He went to work for Joseph Carey's SO Ranch on Boxelder Creek. He returned to

L. to R.: Leonard Bartshe, Tracy Bartshe, Ed Virden, unknown and Alvah Brubaker, 1914.

Delaware the next year bringing back with him his son, Edward W. They settled on Upper Boxelder Creek which was near his brother, Frank Virden, and his sister, Elizabeth Virden White, and her husband, Capt. Willard White.

Edward W. was born on March 24, 1884 in Milton, Delaware. He was married to Margaret Hiser, daughter of Elias and Mary Hiser, on January 7, 1925. Two sons, Raymond and James Edward, were born to them.

Edward died on June 17, 1930. Pete moved to Douglas upon his son's death and lived until October 20, 1948 when he passed away. Margaret died on August 25, 1967.

Vitek, Tony and Sophie Family

Anton Vitek Jr. "Tony" as he was better known, was born in Uctorlitze, Bohemia on January 9, 1882. The oldest boy of Anton Sr. and Frances Vitek. He had a sister, Tessie, older than he was; a sister, Anna, and two brothers, John and Frank, who were also born in Bohemia.

Being the oldest boy he had to go to the fields with his father when only five years old and carry a long whip, using it to keep the horses going while his father plowed the fields on their farm.

Tony's sister, Tessie, came to America with an aunt in 1890, going to central Kansas, settling in Ellsworth County. Anton Vitek Sr. and his family immigrated from Bohemia, which is now a part of Austria, to Hamburg, Germany and embarked to the United States on March 11, 1892 landing in New York, New York on March 20th. From New York they went by train to Ellsworth, Kansas and settled on a farm close to Kanopolis, Kansas. This farm had been in the family until eight years ago, when it was sold to settle an estate.

In 1894 another son, Ralph, was born. He still lives in Kanopolis, never married and was a U.S. mail carrier for many years.

Tony, my father, (I am Ruby Vitek Burks), was ten years old when he enrolled in school to learn English and the basic reading, writing and arithmetic. He completed the fifth grade when his father needed him to help with the farm work so that ended his education. His other brothers went on to school. One became a County Clerk for a number of years and then became Probate Judge of Ellsworth. His brother, John, stayed on the farm.

Dad became restless and went to Colorado in 1898. He enlisted in the army, as the Spanish American War was on. He lied about his age saying he was two years older than he was so they would take him. After basic training in Troop C of the 1st Regiment of the Cavalry, he was sent to the Phillippine Islands on October 9, 1901 and was released from active service on November 11, 1902. He had gotten dysentery and had also received a bullet wound through the hand while he was in the Philippines. He spent several weeks in the army hospital at Presidio, Monterey, California. This was before he became a citizen of the U.S.

After being released from the hospital he returned to Kansas. He had saved most of his army pay so he bought horses and machinery, rented a farm and went to work for himself. He would buy broncs and mules and work them with his gentle horses and then sell them for a good profit. He told us that one time he bought a horse sight unseen and when he got the horse home it was blind in one eye. He finally broke him but could never walk up to him on the blind side. He always had to be hitched on the wagon with his blind eye next to the horse he was being worked with. Along with farming his rented place, he would break up and farm ground for some of the neighbors. He would go to sales, a great distance from home to buy horses and machinery.

It was on one of these trips when he was in Ellis, Kansas in 1912 that he met my mother, Josephine Mary Kutina. Mother always went by the name of Sophie after she started to school, as there were already two other Josephines in the school and also a Mary. She got to pick the name she wanted to be called.

Mother was one of eleven children of John and Barbara Kutina. Her father had died when she was eleven years old and her mother died six years later. Since she was the oldest girl still at home and needed to take care of her younger brothers and sisters and a niece, Tony Vitek with his crew working on pipeline.

LaRea Rountree, she gave up her ambition to be a school teacher. By the time she met Dad, all of the family was away from home except her youngest sister. On July 3, 1913 they were married at Wilson, Kansas.

They moved to the farm between Kanopolis and Ordway, Kansas and it was while they lived here that their two oldest daughters were born, Virginia in 1914 and Frances in 1915. They prospered in wheat farming, but Dad got to playing the stock market and in the crash of 1917, lost $35,000 in one night. He wanted to get away from Kansas so Mother said, "You still have me and the girls, we'll go wherever you want to." He borrowed $1,000 from his brother, Frank, and took his horses and wagons and a hired man and headed for Glenrock, Wyoming. Mother, my two sisters and Mother's sister, Margaret Lamoree, came to Glenrock several days later by train. Aunt Margaret's husband had just died recently from the flu.

One of the first things they did was file on a homestead not far from Ft. Fetterman. After putting up a tent to live in they went to Glenrock to get their steamer trunk that had come on the train. A sad disappointment was in store for them when they got the steamer. Someone had broken the lock and stolen their silver, a saber, and a gun that Dad had brought back from the Philippines. Mother always said Dad felt worse about that than he did losing the money in the stock market.

They built a small house there so Mother and my aunt wouldn't have to stay in the tent. They had to get their water from the LaPrele Creek, carrying it in barrels, until they got the well dug. After the women were settled in the house, Dad went to work for the Illinois Pipeline, freighting. In the fall of 1917 another daughter, Ruby, was born.

Times were pretty hard that first year they were on the homestead and Mother's sister was always sending after crochet thread when Dad went for supplies, even if she didn't need it. Of course, Mother had never told her until years later that they were broke when they came to Wyoming. Anyway, we girls had dresses with a lot of crocheting on them, even our slips had a big border of crocheted lace.

After my aunt went back to Kansas, Mother followed wherever Dad was working on the pipeline. She would either stay in a town that was close by or go out on the line and stay in a tent with Dad and cook for some of the crew. Some of the places they stayed at were Newcastle, Osage, Lusk, Salt Creek, Casper, Manville, and in Glenrock. Each year they spent some time on the homestead. In the late spring of 1919 Dad bought a house in Manville and that fall my oldest sister, Virginia, started to school. Mildren Wollin was her first teacher.

Mother and Dad had talked Bohemian a great deal when they were alone and my sister could talk better Bohemian than she could English. The other kids at school made fun of her so she told Mother and Dad she wasn't going to school. Mother told her to just talk English. My parents quit speaking any Bohemian except when they wanted to say something and they didn't want us to know what they were talking about. After that first year of school she forgot all of the Bohemian she ever knew.

On May 15, 1920 a daughter, Dorothy, was born in Manville. Mother always took us to church and Sunday school if we were anywhere near a church. While we were in Manville there was some kind of services being conducted from a tent. The folks had taken us one evening and the next day my little sister was sick so Mother let us three girls go by ourselves. I got scared in the tent so my sister, Frances, started to take me home and I told her I could find the way so she went back. I ended up along the railroad tracks where one of the section men found me. He knew who I was as he had seen my sister, with a pink dress with crocheting on it, with my father, and he took me home. Did my sisters ever catch it from Mother when they returned.

In 1921 they moved to Glenrock where Dad was freighting. It was while living in Glenrock that Dad filed his petition for naturalization on March 19, 1921. He took the oath of allegiance on May 11 and received the order of the court admitting petitioner on November 26, 1921. It is signed by Judge P. W. Metz.

When the freighting out of Glenrock stopped, he rented a farm near Kiowa, Colorado where he raised beans, potatoes, corn and also some pigs. He had such a good crop that year that the man he rented from decided to farm the place himself.

We came back to Wyoming and Dad sold his homestead to Tom Fleming. It now belongs to Catherine Fleming Strock. Dad bought a place from C. Bishop on Alkali Creek across the road from Ben Wheelock. He moved the shack from the homestead to this place and we lived in it one fall while he was finishing the house. The old highway separated our place from the Wheelock place and since it was a dirt road, with very little gravel on it, Dad spent a great deal of time in snowy and rainy weather pulling cars through the snow and mud.

One of the memorable Christmases for a little girl of seven was being invited with the family to Ben and Maggie Wheelock's home for Christmas dinner. After Virginia, Frances, and I spoke our pieces and sang the songs that Mildred Blomquist Reed and Perney Block had taught us for the Christmas program, we were served a delicious dinner by Maggie's Negro servant on very fine silver. But the highlight was the flaming Christmas pudding. Then each one of us girls got a bright red sweater. She may have been a madam but she was real good to our family and I heard years later that she loaned money to lots of the Douglas people during hard times. If we were real sick and she heard about it she would send the doctor out and we'd never get a bill. However, my mother fixed many a meal for Ben and Mike Bear, his hired man. Dad always took Ben to town with him as he never had a car. He also put up the hay on Ben's place while we lived there and in 1927 they had a band of sheep on partnership. Dad didn't like the sheep business so it was a one year project for him. He did put up a lot of hay at the Pea Green, on the Slichter Ranch, and the Sandell and Kirwin place for Jesse Erwin.

Sophia Louise was born on this farm on May 4, 1927. She was exposed to whooping cough a couple days after she was born as Virginia came down with it. We had to take turns holding her on a feather pillow and every time she would start to cough we would run for Mother and she would put cold water on her throat and wipe the inside of her throat with a pongee cloth. The doctor said she would never live but Mother vowed she would save her and after a few weeks she began to improve. But she didn't quit having coughing spells until we went for a visit to Kansas in August.

It was when we were living on this place that Dad, Albert Sims, and Robert Lux got gold fever. They were sure there was gold at the bottom of the fall on Wagon-hound Creek. They built a wooden flume to divert the water around the falls and the hole below it. Then they tried to pump the hole dry but were unable to because of the seepage from above them and they probably didn't have big enough pumps.

In 1929, before the depression began, he decided our farm was too small to make enough money to put five girls through school. Dad bought a herd of dairy cows from Frank Spracklen and rented a dairy farm from Dr. H. R. Lathrop, at the foot of Casper Mountain. They had a real big dairy barn and the herd was increased to 90 head, a chore that kept the whole family busy. Ben Sherrill moved to Casper with us to help with the milking. The first winter there was a lot of snow and wind and it was hard to get the milk to the Yellowstone Dairy in town for bottling. When the lease was up at the end of the year, we moved to the M. P. Wheeler place on the river, where there was less snow and not as much wind. Dad bought a truck so he could haul the hay and cake for the cows and he also trucked for the Cowen and Nolan Feed Store.

In 1936 he got arthritis in his hands so bad he couldn't use them. The doctor sent him to Thermopolis for hot mud and steam baths and told him to slow down. The swelling went down but the fingers on his left hand remained stiff. They sold the dairy cattle and moved to Arizona where they bought a cafe.

My two older sisters were married and I started teaching school that year. Dorothy spent the year with my sister, Virginia, who was living in Douglas, and finished her last year of high school there.

Mother and Dad didn't like city life that well and wanted to get out in the country again so they sold the cafe and bought a small farm at Fountain, Colorado. After being there two summers his hands began bothering him again so he sold out and went back to Phoenix, Arizona and rented a cafe.

He became acquainted with Judge Speakman and Dr. Larson. They had a gold placer machine and needed a foreman out on the desert, so they hired Dad to manage the crew and Mother to cook for them. He enjoyed the heat of the desert and worked at placer mining until the spring of 1940. He had been renting his farm on Alkali all these years and the meadows had never been farmed since he planted them in 1925. Moving back to Douglas, he got the meadows back into production and sold the farm in 1943.

He moved to San Diego, California and went to work for Consolidated Aircraft. He never missed a days work until the plant closed after the end of World War II. He received a trophy from the plant as he had never been late to work either. The folks had sold the place but they had to take it back in 1947. It was then sold to T. J. O'Mara, who later sold it to Jesse McKibben. It is now owned by Mr. and Mrs. Paul Geho.

Liking the California climate, they bought an acre of land on the outskirts of Escondido. Here they built four houses, one of which they lived in, doing all of the work themselves except the plumbing and electrical work which had to be done by licensed contractors. On the one half acre in back of their house they planted pears, peaches, grapes, a big strawberry bed and also a garden which they shared with all of their neighbors. Mother took great pride in all the roses she had in her front yard. They continued to live in California the remaining years of their lives and were laid to rest in the Highland Cemetery at Casper, Wyoming, Tony in 1959 and Sophie in 1954.

Vogel and Hooper Families

Slowly moving north out the Ross Route, at eight years old was an exciting adventure for me, Elberta Vogel, to perch on the seat of a canvas-covered wagon between my mother and her brother, my Uncle Ellsworth Hooper. My durable mother was Nettie Hooper Vogel. My father, Conrad, H. Vogel, stayed in Douglas to finance this serious adventure by working at the plumbing trade and my brother, Victor Hugh Vogel, stayed with him. Acquiring land by homesteading was part of family tradition. My Vogel grandparents, who were Swiss immigrants, had homesteaded in northern Oklahoma where my Hooper grandparents from the south had settled.

Pulled by a sturdy team of horses, our wagon was heavily loaded with homestead necessities including a crate of protesting chickens tied on behind and pulling farther behind, a reluctant cow. That summer of 1918 we were historically not true pioneers as my grandparents had been, but like those earlier, land-hungry homesteaders, we had our own role in settling Wyoming.

At that time, Uncle Ellsworth had already built a small shack in a sheltered spot near the dry creek that traversed his claim. This served as primitive shelter for the three of us until he and my father built a simple tarpaper covered house on the adjoining Vogel homestead where my mother and I lived the required time to claim the land. We were located in parts of Sections 19, 20 and 21 of Converse County between the Eskew "55" sheep ranch and the Henry "88" cattle ranch. Two cousins of the Vogel family joined us as neighbors: Albert Strickler adjoining on the south and Charles Strickler with wife Jessie, east of Albert's place.

With marriage to Marion Pryor of western Colorado and permanent residence in mind, Ellsworth built himself an unusually sturdy two room house which still stands, although now unoccupied except by wild creatures. Together, those two labored long days and full years to establish a livelihood and home there working both homesteads but were economically defeated by limited natural resources of the land and climate, although financed by the Vogel half of the partnership based in Glenrock where my father established a plumbing business and built a comfortable home.

With absolutely no living conveniences at our homestead shack, my mother's summers there with me meant hardship for her. For me, those sunburned summers meant delicious freedom to pursue my childhood interest: riding horses (sometimes to get the mail) and falling off them into cactus beds; trapping ground squirrels in the garden for a penny each; perching on the wagon running gear to go for logs in the hills to the west; drinking fresh warm cow's milk; picking green beans in Cousin Albert's garden; going for a wagonload of the soft dusty coal exposed in seams for the taking; learning about wild flowers; birds and animals but avoiding ticks, rattlesnakes and badgers; luxuriously swimming in Uncle Ellsworth's perpetual waterhole where salamanders hid in the water plants and a curious seepage of oil glazed the surface; munching WWI hardtack; and jumping on it to pack the wool in big suspended burlap bags at sheep shearing time.

Ellsworth Hooper died in 1962 in Colorado. Conrad Vogel died in 1960 in Colorado and Nettie Vogel in 1971 in California.

Vollman, William and Flora Family

William R. Vollman was born August 16, 1895 at Holdrege, Nebraska, the son of German immigrants. Rudolph Vollman and Fredricka Gierlof Vollman. His dad was killed by lightning when he was ten. Fredricka leased their places until William grew up. They moved to Lincoln where Bill was in business school and later worked as an electrician. In May 1917, at age 21, he married Flora Brown, also 21. Flora was the daughter of Sherman and Sarah Brown of Lyndon, Vermont. She attended Lincoln School of Business. The next month they came to Wyoming and homesteaded northwest of Douglas in the Hyland community, also known as Williams Flats. Bill's mother, Fredricka, also homesteaded about one half mile north of the couple. Fredricka moved in with Bill and Flora after proving up her homestead and helped with the household duties until her death in 1947.

They shipped their household goods, machines, horses and livestock by emigrant car and unloaded at Orpha. By fall they built a rock house and a small homestead shack for Bill's mother. They had an old Model T car. It was converted to a pickup but most of the supplies had to be hauled by team and wagon from Douglas or Glenrock, which was a two day trek.

William and Flora Vollman: Unloading their belongings from an emigrant railroad car at Orpha.

When they first homesteaded, there was still quite a bit of open range. They saw quite a few roundups of cattle. One of the homesteaders was under suspicion for rustling cattle. Flo and Bill boarded a range detective of the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association to catch the guy but all he found was some stolen wire under a hay stack. The man under suspicion was requested to leave or face prosecution. He left.

One late fall trip to Glenrock for supplies, with team and wagon, Bill found a den of rattlesnakes that had come out to sun themselves. He killed 13 with a halter from one of the horses. There were plenty more but he had to get to Glenrock by sundown so he moved on.

In 1921 a son, Bill Jr., was born. He attended rural school and then graduated from Converse County High School. He went one year to the University of Wyoming. He then worked for Lockheed Aircraft until he was drafted into the navy during World War II. He served aboard an Attack Troop Transport in the South Pacific Theater of operations.

About 1928 Bill bought a threshing machine, after a wooden one owned by Albert Spillman burned. He and Dan Reeder spent about two months each fall threshing for neighbors as far away as 25 miles.

In 1932 they acquired the Kurtz place where they moved because the water was much better. In 1939 they bought the Spillman place. The Martz place and the Ridgeway place were acquired later.

Mr. Vollman served as Converse County Commissioner for four years and was a past member of the County ASC Committee. He raised sheep and cattle and farmed oats, wheat and barley.

Mrs. Vollman taught school for 17 years in Wyoming while attending the University of Wyoming. In 1933 District 17 ruled that married women couldn't teach if their husband was employed. Her job, at $85.00 per month, was lost but she found a job in District 14 which was at the Smith School and later at the Tank Farm, near Carey, for $120.00 per month.

In June 1947, Bill Jr. married Alice Leeling, daughter of Joe and Rachel Taule Leeling of Manville. Their first child, Vicki, was born in October of 1948. She was just a baby during the blizzard of '49. On January 15, 1949, Bill and Alice went to Casper for a crib. The wind came up but luckily we met Fred Domsalla going back to the Badger Coal Mine. He broke the road open and we followed in the car. The rest of the way we followed the ridge road, with a lot of detours.

Robert was born in 1952 and Lori in 1958. Robert married Christie Anderson and live on the Doc Robertson place on the Platte River. They have two sons, Brady and Jared. Lori married David Cole, son of the Stanley Coles.

Mr. Vollman retired in 1965 and later died in 1967. Mrs. Vollman and Vicki, a daughter of Bill Jr., were killed in an auto accident in March 1968.

Von Appen, Henry

Henry "Dutch" Von Appen was born in Halstenbek, Holstein in West Germany on April 11, 1866 to Friedrich and Dortha Von Appen.

His father died early in life and his mother wanted to remarry but Henry resented it so much she put him, a twelve year old boy, on a boat for America to her cousin in New York.

Fascinated by the stories of the West and Indians, he started out for new frontiers, arriving in Chadron,

"Dutch Henry" Von Appen, 1949.

Nebraska in 1879. A German family took him on his arrival there and educated him.

He was 17 years old when he set out with a group of men driving 111 head of horses to Powder River. It was March of 1885 and the party had reached the site where Dutch later settled on the North Platte River four miles northwest of present day Douglas. A severe blizzard comparable to the 1949 storm struck the group. Abandoning the horses, the men made their way to Fort Fetterman where they stayed until the storm abated. Upon their return to gather the horses they found them all alive and well. After working in the Buffalo area, Dutch returned to the spot on the Platte River where he lived until his death.

Dutch lived on his ranch alone for over 50 years except for a brief time in 1925-26 when a nephew, Henry H. Sielck, came to live and work for him.

Dutch died on May 22, 1949.

Walkinshaw, George and Sarah

George Walkinshaw was born in Carlups, Peebleshire, Scotland, May 5, 1856. He left Scotland as a young man and went to Canada in 1879 with an uncle.

He was a "quoit pitcher," a game much like "horse-shoes," and he was the champion of Scotland.

The quoit is a round iron ring quite a bit heavier than a horseshoe and it is pitched at a stake in a pit of mud. The game was played during the early years at the Wyoming State Fair in Douglas.

About 1882 George saw an advertisement for a World Championship Match in Colorado. He attended, played and won the $1,000 prize. He found employment in the mining industry in Colorado and remained in the United States.

George married Sarah Cole Williams at Williamsburg, Colorado, November 28, 1885.

Sarah Cole was born in Wales, June 1, 1857 and came to Pennsylvania at the age of seven. She had four children by a prior marriage. Their names were George, John, Mamie, and Thomas Williams. The latter two remained with George and Sarah and accompanied them to Glenrock, Wyoming about 1887. Mamie (Anson) and Thomas Williams were well known in the Glenrock area. Four additional children were born to George and Sara. They were William, Edward, Robert and Fred Walkinshaw.

George Walkinshaw was employed at the coal mine in east Glenrock where he was the paymaster and weigh-master.

William was born in 1886 in Colorado. He married Helen Nevin of Denver, Colorado in 1915. He was made foreman of the VR Ranch, south of Glenrock in 1915 and stayed in that capacity until the ranch was sold to the Jollys in 1945. Their four children were: Ed, Nevin, Bill (b. 1922) and Margaret (Doll) (b. 1928).

Ed, the first white baby born in Glenrock, was born in 1889.

Robert was born on March 21, 1891 in Red Lodge, Montana. He married Mabel Thayer, daughter of Walter and Mabel Thayer, on April 4, 1920. After ranching in the Wheatland area for twelve years for themselves they went to work for the VR Ranch in Wheatland. They are the parents of two children, Robert and Marian.

Fred was born after his parents came back to Glenrock from Montana.

Mabel Thayer Walkinshaw

Wallis, Charles and Louise Family

Charles Louis Wallis was born in England and arrived with his parents in America when he was ten years old. They settled in New York state for a while.

His father was a tailor by trade and Charles learned the tailoring trade as a young boy.

As Charles grew older he read and heard about the great westward movement to settle the west. Charles struck out for the adventure and excitement in the west as a young lad with boundless and enduring energy.

He first went to the forts and helped with the tailoring of officers uniforms and then drove a dog sled team with the mail during one winter in Montana. On one of his runs he was shot in the back twice with heavy caliber slugs, but managed to make it on to the next mail station. The station attendant cared for him but did not remove the slugs. He carried them for the rest of his life.

He applied to Russell, Majors, and Waddell to ride Pony Express but was just a little too heavy, even though he was a small man.

Charles joined a scouting party and scouted for General Custer for a while and finally resigned. He later said if he had known General Custer was going to fight his last stand he would have been right beside him.

After resigning as a scout for General Custer he returned to Chicago where he met his bride, Louise Studtz (Studtz later changed to Stuart), a young girl who had come from Germany with her parents to America.

Charles took his young bride and started working west again by being a company tailor for the army and making uniforms and buffalo overcoats for the officers at the various forts where they lived.

They lived at Fort Pierre where Pierre, South Dakota is now. From there they moved to Fort Robinson near Crawford, Nebraska for a short while and then on north to Fort Assinbone near Havre, Montana where Lawrence Diamond Wallis was born December 3, 1894. There were five children born to this union: Richard, Lawrence, Nellie, Louis and Evalena. The one surviving sister, Evalena E. Wallis Loyd, lives in Kansas City, Missouri.

Lawrence's brothers and younger sisters were born at Havre and the young Indian squaws would ask to take his baby sisters, as papooses on their back, for the day. Mother Louise would let them and tell the young Indian squaws to have her girls home by sundown, which they did.

When Richard, Lawrence, and Louis were young boys they learned to trade or barter with the Indian squaws, and they would trade their little white dog off to an Indian squaw for a pair of beaded moccasins, as the Indians really liked fat dogs to eat. The little dog, Queeny, would make its get-away and come running home, and the boys would hide her real quick and say they hadn't seen her. But in a couple of weeks they would trade her off to another Indian squaw for another pair of beaded moccasins and the little dog always managed to escape the Indians and come running home again and again.

From Fort Assinbone in Montana they moved to Fort Yellowstone at Mammoth Hot Springs in Yellowstone Park. Lawrence and his brothers would sneak or snitch a ride in the cooster at the rear of the stagecoach while it was being pulled by a four horse team around Yellowstone Park for transportation.

In 1908 Charles and Louise set up a tailor shop in Douglas in the building on Center Street which is now occupied by the Oasis Liquor Lounge.

In 1912 Charles passed away from pneumonia. Dr. J. R. Hylton, who was a very young doctor at the time, was doctoring him.

Lawrence wanted to help his mother with all of her obligations so he obtained a job as office boy for Dr. Hylton, cleaning up the office and examination room and putting instruments into the sterilization chamber.

Lawrence advanced to the fifth grade in the Douglas school system and had a teacher by the name of Miss Leah Scheib. While attending the fifth grade Lawrence had a little tiff with Miss Scheib and she sent him straight home from class. He left but returned and snapped his finger at Miss Scheib and she asked, "What do you want young man?"

He said, "I can't go straight home."

She said, "Why not?"

He said, "I have to turn the corner down at the end of the hall."

Miss Scheib said, "Young man, you had better straighten those corners out," which he did in short order.

Miss Scheib had a liking for Lawrence because of his ability in art, so after he quit school and went to work for Fred Lewis she sent him a set of water colors, two picture postcards and two nickel tablet backs for him to paint and reproduce those pictures in water colors for her. One was a black and white snow scene and the other the Mountain of the Holy Cross in Colorado. He painted those pictures and returned them to Miss Scheib.

While Lawrence was herding a band of sheep for Fred Lewis in Fletcher Park near Laramie Peak a terrible snow storm with howling blizzard conditions set in one night. Lawrence dressed completely before leaving his wagon in the dark to try and keep the sheep on the bedground. He put a mirror behind the lamp to reflect the beam of light out of the wagon onto the snow. A gust of wind blew the lamp out and he became lost and wandered for three nights and three days during this intense blizzard of the plains. Lawrence lay down on his back and rested for a few minutes and kept saying, "Don't go to sleep, get up, and go on, as 'God helps those who help themselves.' and I am sure going to help myself." He got up and went on trying to follow the telegraph poles but couldn't see them often enough to follow them. Finally he stumbled onto a railroad track and was following it when he turned to catch his breath from the wind and driving snow and as he looked up he could see the huge bright light of the monstrous locomotive bearing down on him. He left the tracks just in time and began to wave his arms and holler in an attempt to attract attention of the members of the train crew, but his attempts were all in vain. Very disappointed and in despair, he trudged on. Finally he stumbled into or along the Platte River and followed it down stream to Hartville Junction as the storm broke up the third evening. He stumbled into a cafe and asked for something to eat and the waiter asked what he wanted. He replied, "Anything that is good as I haven't had anything to eat in three full days, as I have been lost in a blizzard and wandered here from Fletcher Park." So he served him ham and beans and two pieces of cherry pie and coffee. Lawrence figured he had traveled 65 miles in his ordeal. He was 17 years old when he had this harrowing experience. Fred Lewis came from Guernsey with a team and wagon and picked Lawrence up and the next day they worked their way back up to Fletcher Park and found the sheep, which had survived the storm, but had drifted some distance from where they really belonged.

After working for Fred Lewis, Lawrence worked for John Morton as a cook's helper in a lambing camp and later herded a band of sheep for him. After this he worked for William E. Taylor in Campbell and Johnson Counties.

While working for Taylor, Lawrence met his bride, Alma Mae Dale who was born October 15, 1899 and educated in Cadiz Township, Green County, Wisconsin. Alma finished her schooling and took normal training in Browntown, Wisconsin to get her certificate to teach school. William E. Taylor was a second cousin to Alma and had sent for her to teach his two young sons, Don and Norris, for two years. Alma Dale and Lawrence Wallis were married and to this marriage two sons were born, Robert Louis (1920) and Dale Chester (1921).

After Robert was born, Lawrence and Alma sold their homesteads to William E. Taylor and moved to Independence, Missouri where Dale was born. Later, Lawrence moved his family back to the Salt Creek Oil Field and worked as a rig builder for a short time and then as a pumper gauger for Standard Oil Company. In 1928 he moved his family back to Douglas to again take up ranching.

First the family lived east of Douglas on the George Bentley place, and Alma taught school at the X H Crossing School, near the Wintermote Ranch on Shawnee Creek, for one year. She had 22 pupils in all grades, first through eighth and they came from the Kaiser, Jones, Metcalf, Lane, Wintermote, Harnish, and Wallis families. She had several school plays and the entire community would come and enjoy the school activities and then they would have a dance, as someone would always bring some kind of an instrument for music. Dale and I, Robert, went to school for two years at the X H Crossing School.

In 1935 we moved from the Bentley place to the Al Hinkle place, five miles north of Douglas on Highway 59.

While my brother and I were growing up on these ranches, our parents purchased a pair of Shetland ponies for us and we began raising ponies along with the sheep and cattle our parents had. We finally built up quite a herd of ponies which we had for many years.

Upon entering the Douglas school system at the North Grade School I was in the fifth grade and met Miss Scheib who asked, "Are you Lawrence Wallis' son?" and I said, "Yes, and I have a brother, Dale."

She said, "I will bring something in the morning for you boys that I have cherished for many years." It was the two post card pictures she had asked Lawrence to paint for her on the little tablet backs.

Lawrence and his sons, Robert and Dale, all attended school in the North Grade School and Miss Scheib taught them all in a 25 or 27 year period of time.

After receiving encouragement from Miss Scheib that our dad could paint, Mother, Dale and I bought Dad a small set of oil paints for a Christmas present one year. This started Dad on his hobby of painting with oils when the mood struck him to paint a picture. He painted several pictures which Dale and I still have as well as some of the grandchildren.

After raising her boys, Alma went back to teaching school and attended the University of Wyoming. She went to summer school and took correspondence courses for some 20 years to obtain her teaching certificate and B.S. degree from the College of Education. She graduated in the summer of 1958. She taught rural schools at the Lundberg School north of Douglas for several years and also the Lost Springs School. Then she obtained a teaching contract in the Glenrock school system where she taught until she retired in 1962.

On October 18, 1963 Lawrence and Alma Wallis were killed in a tragic accident, a train-automobile collision on the railroad crossing on Center Street in Douglas.

Lawrence Wallis was a second cousin to Clint, Lewis, Orville, and Bess Wallis and Cecila Nottage of Bosler and Laramie, Wyoming.

Robert L. Wallis met Irene Phoebe Barnes and courted her for five years. They were married September 3, 1944 while Bob was still in the U.S. Air Force and Signal Corp. To this marriage four children were born: Richard Ellis Wallis, January 16, 1948, who is on the Walker Creek Ranch; Bonnie Irene Wallis Millikin, June 24, 1949, of Glendo, Wyoming; Robert Allen Wallis, October 21, 1953, who lives on the home ranch near Douglas; and Matilda Louise Wallis Young of Anchorage, Alaska.

Dale Chester Wallis married Pearl Bevins on January 1, 1942. To this marriage four children were born: Frances Eileen Wallis Estep of Henderson, Nevada; Barbara Adale Wallis Newell of San Marcos, California; Addie Mae Wallis Christman of Casper, Wyoming; and Dennis Rhea Wallis of San Diego, California.

Robert and Irene Wallis purchased the ranch on Walker Creek from her parents, Ross and Phoebe Barnes and raised their family there for several years. After purchasing the ranch and working it for nine years, Robert returned to the University of Wyoming and finished his education in the College of Agriculture and the College of Education. After obtaining a B.S. degree from the College of Agriculture and a teaching certificate from the College of Education to teach elementary education, he taught his children for four years at the Wallis School in Niobrara County at the ranch on Walker Creek, while Irene took care of the cattle. He also taught one year in Lusk, teaching sixth grade in 1963-1964.

After losing his parents in the tragic accident in 1963 and Irene's father at the Walker Creek Ranch from a heart attack in 1964, Robert and his family returned to the ranch.

Later, Robert and Irene purchased all of the estate land of his parents.

Robert and Irene now reside in Mesa, Arizona during the winter months.

Walton, Rose Schick Family

Rosina "Rose" Federer married Joseph Schick

1884 - 1971

? - 1927

Born: Springfield, Ill.

Born: Sopron, Hungary

Anna Louise, Chicago, Ill., married Melvin A. Ballard

Elisabeth Rose, E. Wisc., married Emmet Ballard

Helen Marie, Chicago, Ill., married Jack C. Hanlin

Rose Schick married Guy Alonzo Walton

Grace Lucille, Douglas, Wyo., married Jerome Kendal (deceased)

Paul Louis, Douglas, Wyo., (deceased)

Eldon Guy, Douglas, Wyo., (deceased)

Ted Daniel, Douglas, Wyo., married Del Carlos, Rhode Island

Rose arrived in Cheyenne, Wyoming, July 4, 1917

L. to r. Elisabeth, Rose, Anna and Helen Schick

from Chicago, Illinois. She came with her three little girls. Her four brothers, John, Louis, Theodore and Charles William Federer sent for her because she had been ill for more than a year and could not work to support us. Each of her brothers gave her a two-year-old Hereford heifer. Louis, who was a bachelor, provided a home for us for a year. In the spring of 1918, a severe snowstorm caused Mr. and Mrs. Harry Russell to seek shelter at my uncle's ranch. Mr. Russell extolled the greatness of the homestead lands available north of Douglas. When my uncles homesteaded north of Cheyenne, in about 1912, they could only file on a half section of land. Therefore, my Uncle Louis was entitled to file on another half section in this area. He planned to marry Lydia Jergens. A single woman could file on a section and retain it if she married after filing. My uncle and future aunt and mother then filed about seven miles north of the present Bill Post Office. We were one-half mile from our uncle's place.

While my uncle and mother built our house, we stayed at Harry Russell's ranch. It was a rainy fall. Mother had her household belongings stored in a small shed. She had some lovely embroidery work which my Hungarian grandmother and aunts had sent her for wedding gifts. We were so dismayed to have them water soaked and faded.

Our house was about 14x16 feet. Mother insisted that the house be shingled and have a gable roof. Later we hauled rock and built a rock chicken house and cow shed. Gumbo mud, which we mixed in a tub with a garden hoe, was the mortar to hold the rock. We girls thought it was hard work to gather rocks that suited Mother's request for good flat rocks. It seems we grumbled through every step of building the shed. We were equally proud of our achievement when the building was completed.

One year later, we had a very dry summer. The government granted a leave of absence from living on the homestead for five months. That winter we went to Cheyenne. Mother worked as a practical nurse caring for mothers with their first-born babies.

After she "proved" up the homestead in 1922, we moved to Casper where she again started working. She married Lon Walton that winter and moved to Douglas. In the spring, we moved to Lon's homestead which was on Sage Creek near the Frank Amspoker and Bill Smith Ranches. I believe Pacific Power owns this land now or leases it for coal.

In September 1923, during one of the heaviest rains ever experienced in the previous 65 years, our sister, Grace Lucille Walton was born. This was the week of the tragic Cole Creek wreck — one of the worst in railroad history. She really lit up our lives and continues to do so.

Paul Louis was born the following year. We were delighted to have a brother. About 1926, my grandfather, Louis Federer died in Illinois. Mother inherited a little money. They sold Lon's homestead, bought a car, some cattle and we moved back to the Bill Community on Mother's homestead and leased Alva Miler's place.

Eldon was born there. He died in infancy in 1928. In 1929, Ted Daniel was born. He and his family now live in Cheyenne.

Lon had a son, Willis, when he married Mother. Willis lived to be about twenty when he drowned while he was working on the Harry Gillespie Ranch.

The folks lived there until about 1940, when they sold the place to Ernest Steinle and moved to Douglas.

SCHOOLS:

We started school at the Bill Dorr Ranch in the fall when we were staying at Russells'. Mrs. Russell's sister was living with them. She drove a car to the Dorr Ranch. We attended about three weeks until our "little brown house" was finished. Then it was too far to go. One of mother's greatest desires was for us to have a good education. She came to town and pleaded with the school board to establish a school for us. Their response was, "you must have four school age children to establish a school". She always insisted that Wyoming School law mandated that all Wyoming children were to be provided an education. She made twelve trips to Douglas in a lumber wagon to beg for a school for us. The trip took three days. The first night she would stay at Schlinskens' about eighteen miles north of Douglas. The next day she would come in and meet with the School Board and return to Schlinskens'. The following day she would return home. We girls stayed at Uncle Louie's while she made the trip. In spite of her efforts, we were without a school for one year after we moved to our new house.

Mother read to us everything she could get. I don't know how many times we heard Gene Stratton Porter's "Girl of the Limber Lost" and the Bible story of Joseph and his coat of many colors. Dorothy Dickson (Mrs. Frank Scott) lived about eight miles away. She came to spend the night with us. She came horseback with a sack of books which we read and re-read until we almost had them memorized. She must have been about ten years old then. When we went to bed she told us the story of Black Beauty. She was the best story teller I ever heard. She still delights her great-grandchildren with her stories. Needless to say, this was one of the best experiences of our homestead days.

The summer after our school-less year, there was summer school at the Fairview School. This school was located a mile north of the present Bill Post Office and one mile east. It was across the corner from the Featherstone place which Web Stoddard now owns. At that time, four families lived there. George Peak, Leta and Bob Edie, his parents and Chris Neilson, a bachelor. The Dudleys lived a half mile east, across from them were the two Brockmeyer families. These families provided enough children for a large lively school. Emma Bushy Elder, who now lives in Guernsey, was the teacher. What a pleasant, lovely teacher she was.

This school was seven miles across the prairie from our home. We had some harrowing experiences going to and from school. Elisabeth and I rode a 22-year-old horse named "Chub" to school. Early in the morning Mother bundled us up and we took off across the range to school. (Quite a trip for two little girls from Chicago.) One day as we were riding down the last lap to school, a girl came galloping down the lane behind us. We urged Chub into a gallop and Nonie raced up. Chub, who was wearing a blind bridle shied or bucked (we thought he bucked). Elisabeth and I landed on the barb wire fence. Elisabeth had her front teeth loosened, from hitting a fence post. Our clothes were torn and we had numerous cuts and scratches. Needless to say Mother couldn't get us to ride Chub again. She then took us in a buggy. She and Helen sat in the north side of the school house where she mended and read to Helen until school was out.

On one occasion when we were going home a heavy rain and hail storm came up. Mother unhitched the young, jittery team. We sat under the buggy while it stormed, Mother holding the reins of the horses who wanted to drift with the storm. When the storm subsided we took off for home. There was a large draw we had to cross to get home. Water was running muddy and deep. Mother forced the horses into the water which was so deep the horses had to swim. The buggy began to float and Elisabeth and Helen who were sitting on wooden dried apple crates began to float as the water came into the buggy. Mother held the box down with her feet. Soon the horse's feet were on terra firma and we arrived home safe and drenched.

That fall the School Board "allowed" a school. Helen was four years old and Mrs. Russell's sister, Nonie, came by horseback to school so there were four pupils.

Orville Pellatz who lived two or three miles away was our first teacher. Esther Casey taught us the following year. We had school those two years in our little house. Mother hung sheets around the four desks and the teacher's desk. The "school" had the corner of the house that had the two windows. Mother took down a three-quarter bed and put the mattress and springs under her bed. Every night we pulled these out and Elisabeth and I slept on the floor.

The next year was when Mother proved up on her homestead and we went to school in Casper where she found work. She married in December and we moved to Douglas. In the Spring of 1923 we moved to Lon Walton's homestead which was four miles from the Frank Amspoker ranch on Sage Creek. When we lived at Sage Creek we attended the Amspoker School until we were ready for high school. The school district did not pay isolation or furnish school buses. Most rural young folks who wanted a high school education came into Douglas and found jobs. The girls lived with families and "worked for their board and room". Some families treated us like members of their family and in others we were treated like we were slave labor. I "worked for my room and board" for seven exceptionally fine families while attending high school and college. This proved to be as valuable a learning experience for me as my college training.

SUNDAY SCHOOL:

In 1918 there were no Sunday Schools in the rural areas (as far as I know). Mother had some Bible stories, a large illustrated Bible, a catechism and some Sunday School cards. Every Sunday she had a lesson for us. We learned the catechism, read and re-read about Joseph and looked at pictures in the Bible. I can still see Solomon in all his wisdom with a drawn sword ready to divide the baby between the two women who claimed him!!!

Later some neighbors got together and held Sunday School in various homes. Along about 1926 or 1927, the American Bible Sunday School Union established Sunday Schools throughout the country. They had a Sunday School Superintendent who visited occasionally and preached. In the summer he conducted Bible Schools. For perfect attendance for thirteen Sundays each child was presented with a Bible. Elisabeth, Helen and I each received a Bible. It was six and one-half miles to the Sunday School. Several Sundays we walked to and from Sunday School.

RECREATION:

Visiting with neighbors was the first recreation after families began settling this community. Later we had carry-in dinners on various occasions. On the Fourth of July there were picnics at Conley Grove, Dull Center and Dry Creek. The nine to thirteen-year-old girls usually vied to get the neighbors' babies to play with. Often there were five or six of us with one of the neighbor's youngsters in our arms. We also played hide-and-go-seek, pom pom pull away, steal sticks, last couple out, red light, blind-man's bluff, fox and geese, New Orleans, and drop the handkerchief.

Charivaris were held when there was a newly wed couple in the community. The neighbors got together and planned to surprise the couple after bedtime. They descended around their cabin making horrendous noises, by blowing whistles, beating on pans and whistling. The young couple were supposed to get up and furnish treats. Sometimes they hadn't been able to get into town to buy candy bars and cigars. Usually the women involved in the "goings on" brought refreshments.

Dances were held quite frequently. Everyone danced, fathers taught their daughters to dance. Mothers and older sisters taught the boys. Then when partners were changed in a Circle Two Step and the younger ones were paired off they were not embarrassed by not knowing how to dance. There were few wall-flowers with this method. After the Dry Creek Hall was completed in 1926 or 1927, it was the center for a great annual fair, a literary, frequent dances, weekly Sunday School, 4-H and Homemaker's Club meetings and baseball games. Dry Creek had a champion baseball team.

Many other experiences we had were common to the ones others have written about in this book. I'm quite sure most of us homesteaders carried water, grubbed sagebrush, killed rattlesnakes, ate sage chickens, milked cows and built fences.

Wanek, Joseph and Mary Family

Joseph Matthew Wanek was born in 1862 in Cijevice Kralovice, Bohemia, the only son of Wensel Wanek. In 1863 Wensel and his family immigrated to the United States and settled first in Wisconsin. Wensel had been persecuted for patriotic expressions while in Bohemia. In 1870 he took a homestead claim near Madison, Nebraska. It was there that Joseph Matthew received his common school education.

Mary Planansky and Joseph Matthew were married in November of 1885 and in 1886 moved to Box Butte County near Lawn Church. Mary received her common education in eastern Nebraska. She, too, is full-blooded Bohemian. It is of interest that the Province of Bohemia was absorbed into the Republic of Czechoslovakia after the first World War and no longer exists as a separate entity.

Joseph and Mary were the parents of seven children, five boys and two girls; except for Minnie, the eldest, the children were born in Box Butte County, Nebraska. Three sons, William, Joseph M. Jr., and Louis, and one daughter, Minnie, came to Wyoming.

In addition to working on his homestead, Joseph was postmaster for twelve years at the Lawn Post Office. He also taught school for a time. He served as a member of the county board, helping to build the first bridge across the Niobrara River. The bridge was located on the route from Sidney to the Black Hills via Fort Robinson and was a freight and stage route. The bridge had a span of 60', being constructed entirely of wood and fastened together with wooden pegs. The total cost of the project was $42.00. Since the working site was eight miles from the Wanek homestead, Joe was obliged to walk 16 miles per day to and from work. He must have enjoyed walking, however, for at one time he walked from Alliance, Nebraska to Sterling, Colorado and on to Silverton, Colorado to work in a mine located there, a distance of almost 500 miles.

William M. Wanek, also known as Willie or Bill, was born in 1887 in Box Butte County. He received what little education he had in Nebraska. He came to Wyoming in 1896 at the age of nine years. He was able to find work in the Lost Springs area, being employed by several of the townspeople to day herd their milk cows since, at that time, there were no fences. He worked later on as a horse wrangler for H. B. Card in the vicinity of Manville. Bill also learned to shear sheep, a trade which he worked at for a number of years in addition to proving up on his homestead. William filed for his claim about 1911. The land was located about five miles northeast of Lost Springs.

It appears that Willie made periodic visits to his home in Nebraska to visit his family and friends, and to court Elnora Eva Shimek, his sweetheart. It was his intention to marry Elnora, but his plans were to be thwarted. It seems that Joe, William's younger brother, was also courting Elnora during his brother's absences, and when William returned to Nebraska in 1911 to claim his sweetheart and make her his bride, he found that Joe had married Elnora a short time before. So William returned to his homestead in Wyoming alone to lead the solitary life of a bachelor.

In the early 1920s, Willie sold his original homestead and bought the claim of another man. This claim was located on Twenty Mile Creek about 18 miles north of Lost Springs. He was engaged in the cattle business. William died in 1948 and is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

Joseph Wanek Jr. was born in Box Butte County in 1891. He attended school there. He was married to Elnora Eva Shimek in 1911. Elnora's parents, Mathew and Eva Hovorka Shimek were born and raised in New Prague,

Eva Shimek

L. to r. Joe Wanek and Bill Wanek

Minnesota. They had four children while living in Minnesota, but the five younger children were born in Box Butte County. Elnora "Nora" was born in 1896 in Box Butte. Mathew and Eva Shimek are buried in the Bohemian cemetery located four miles west and nine miles south of Lawn Corner in the County of Box Butte.

Mathew Shimek brought his family to a sod house on his Nebraska claim. The furniture was homemade and quite crude. Mathew was engaged in farming. The water for household use was hauled by wagon from the Niobrara River some six miles distant.

To supplement his meager income from his farm, Mathew worked on the railroad building grades for the tracks for a wage of 50¢ per day. Leaving Eva at home with the children, Mathew walked to Deadwood to work for the railroad, a distance of 188 miles.

Nora, the sixth of a family of nine children, attended rural school in Box Butte, until, at the age of 15, she was married to Joseph Wanek. Since they were natives of the same area in Nebraska, it is safe to assume that they were married there. They were the parents of two daughters, born in Nebraska: both babies were stillborn. In 1916 Joe took a homestead claim northeast of Lost Springs and he moved his wife to Wyoming. Joe farmed his claim, besides raising milk cows and hogs. In 1918 their first daughter, Evelyn Eva, was born. The second daughter, Mildred was born in 1921. Both were born on the homestead in Niobrara County, Wyoming.

Two others of the Wanek family came to Wyoming. Minnie Wanek, the oldest of the family, married Joseph Paul Bartos and came with her husband to homestead. Louis, the second son, homesteaded, proved up, and sold his interest. He returned to Nebraska.

Though the homesteaders worked long hours proving up on their claims, they found time to gather together for "parties" of one sort or another. They enjoyed the company of one another and a chance to relax and visit. One of these gatherings was to be held at the homestead of Noah Henderson, some ten miles from the Wanek home. There was to be a "carry-in" dinner with games to follow. When the Waneks arrived at the Hendersons they found that

Noah, his wife and another man were lying dead inside the building. Rumor has it that Noah, working on a round-up to the north of his claim, had returned home to find his wife and the other man in a somewhat compromising situation. There followed a violent argument, during which Mrs. Henderson attacked her husband with a butcher knife. The end came when Noah shot his wife, the other man, and turned the weapon upon himself. For years afterward, the house stood closed, its walls, floor and curtains blotched and stained with human blood, a mute reminder of the intensity of human passions.

The Cody Shippen family had a homestead about one half mile south of the Wanek claim. Cody and Joe, both fond of "corn squeezin's," were good friends. Joe had constructed a still, and when it came time for the liquor to be jugged, Cody would come to help with the work. For obvious reasons, this task was attended to at night. The men would sample the whiskey as they worked and in the process would become slightly drunk. When the last bit was jugged, Joe would surmise that Cody was in no shape to walk the distance home alone. He would take a jug and the two men would walk to the Shippen place. Once there, Cody would reckon that Joe was too drunk to go back alone, so Cody would accompany Joe. This process was repeated until neither could navigate very well. Then they would spend the night, or what was left of it, where ever they happened to be at the time. The moonshine business ceased abruptly, though, when the Waneks moved to Twenty Mile in 1923, for Nora took the still and dumped it over the bank of the creek.

Leonard Gilbert, who had homesteaded on Cottonwood Creek, a tributary of Twenty Mile, traded his claim to Joe Wanek for Joe's claim near Lost Springs. Since Willie was already living at the site of the present buildings, Joe and his family moved into a house near the log bunkhouse where Willie lived. The brothers owned their livestock separately, but used the land together and helped each other. To supplement their income, the brothers, along with Cody Shippen and some others, formed a shearing crew. Their equipment and camping gear they loaded on pack horses and traveled around the country from one sheep outfit to another. Nora and her girls remained at home on the ranch.

A black man by the name of Jim Edwards, living on Harney Creek, and east of Twenty Mile, pastured his cattle and horses on the open range. Commonly they would drift to the northwest and become mixed with the

Nora Wanek

Wanek livestock. One very hot day in July, Jim was riding near the Wanek ranch. He came upon a nice fat three-year-old heifer belonging to Joe Wanek. Believing himself to be quite alone, Jim decided that he would drive the heifer home and butcher her. Joe Wanek witnessed the theft, but he allowed Jim to take the heifer. Later, Joe rode to the Edward's place and accused him of the act. Of course, Jim denied everything until Joe unearthed the fresh hide of the animal which wore the U lazy Y brand. Joe told Jim to keep the beef but that on his way home he was going to find a nice fat three-year-old heifer wearing a 16 Bar 1 (Edward's brand) and take her along. He did just that. Joe got his beef back, but the Waneks had to work all night canning the meat to keep it from spoiling. Old timers say, jokingly of course, that a man was stupid to butcher his own beef in those days.

The incident did not seem to cause any lasting hard feelings, though, for both of the Wanek girls took music lessons from Jim Edward's wife, Lethel. She was an accomplished musician, having a beautiful voice and being an excellent pianist. She had brought her baby grand piano from New York with her when she came to live on Harney Creek. Musical selections for several funerals in the Keeline-Lost Springs area were provided by Mrs. Edwards.

Joe was a happy-go-lucky person. He was very athletic, being nicknamed "Smokey Joe" for his prowess as a ball player, both in Nebraska, and later in Wyoming. He never owned a car, but traveled by horseback or with his team and buggy. His brother, Bill, finally bought a car, but drove it just about the speed that a good horse could trot. Nora was a hard working wife and mother. She was an excellent cook, and could make a feast from the most simple fare. The Waneks are remembered in this community as good neighbors. Visitors were always welcome at their home and they were always ready to lend a hand in an emergency.

Joe Wanek died in 1940 at the age of 49. Nora died in 1963. Together with Joe's brother, William, they are buried in the Douglas cemetery.

Evelyn Eva, the eldest daughter, married William Netz. They have an adopted son, Joseph Lloyd. Later the Netzs were divorced, and after the death of her mother, Evelyn moved with her son to operate the home ranch on Twenty Mile. Evelyn passed away in 1984. Her son, Joe, operates the ranch.

Mildred, the second daughter, married Robert Hudson. Their children are three daughters, all grown and married. The Hudsons make their home in Salt Lake City.

The U lazy Y has operated continuously for 61 years. It was the wish of Evelyn that her son, Joe, would continue to raise cattle and to make the Wanek ranch his home, as did the generations of Waneks before him.

Ward, Jack and Anna Family

John "Jack" S. Ward, son of Charles and Caroline Kinsella Ward, was born in Black Hawk, South Dakota in 1884. He married Anna Mae Snyder, (b. 1888 in Falls City, Nebraska), in Alliance, Nebraska on June 28, 1910. One daughter, Margaret Carolyn, was born to them on July 29, 1912 in Alliance.

As a young man he was employed by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad and later served as freight train conductor for many years.

Purchasing an interest in the Princess Theater from A. A. Clough in 1923, Jack came to Douglas in the spring of 1923. His wife and daughter followed him to town in June 1923.

Anna and Jack opened the Ben Franklin store on North Third Street in 1936 with Anna operating the store. The theater was sold in 1936 and the Ben Franklin store in 1943.

Jack was instrumental in organizing the Douglas Chamber of Commerce in 1949 and worked tirelessly in promoting the interests of Douglas. It was at his suggestion the annual Stag Dinner was instituted for visiting notables and Chamber members during the Wyoming State Fair.

His weekly columns in the newspapers known as "Short Reel Stuff," "Short Reels," "Chamber Chatter" and "Chatter" were read and enjoyed by people throughout the state.

Jack died on April 27, 1965 and Anna on January 12, 1969.

Margaret married Ben F. Burnett, (b. October 18, 1910 in Fort Collins, Colorado), on June 28, 1940. Ben, a pharmacist, purchased the old Steffen Drug Store. One daughter, Carolyn, was born. She was killed in a tragic accident on August 5, 1955. A truck collided with the bicycle on which she was riding at the corner of North Third and Walnut Streets.

Weaklin, John H. and Amy Family

My mother, Amy Relinda Churchill, was born in Chicago on July 8, 1873 and moved to Wyoming in 1886. They settled in Platte County on Horseshoe Creek on the Henry Hughes Ranch. Later they moved to Orin in Converse County.

My father, John H. Weaklin, born in 1859, came to Orin from Lead, South Dakota where he was a cook at the gold mine. He ran a saloon and boarded at the hotel which my grandparents owned. He met my mother while living at the hotel. They were married in Orin on November 5, 1902.

I, Bea Weaklin, was born at Orin, October 15, 1903.

It must have been about four years from that time that I ran away from home and went to visit my dad at the saloon. I walked in and saw two large bottles about five feet high with big flowers on them. They were the color of the dark bottles now being sold. Well, they were so tall that they scared me to death and I started to cry. My dad came running to see what was the matter. I guess I was a little skittish in those days.

L. to r. Everett Weaklin, George Pollock, Amy Weaklin and Harvey Churchill, in front of hotel at Orin.

Dad sold the saloon and we moved to Lusk in 1907. He went into the mercantile business. While we were waiting for a house, we stayed at the hotel. I was so bored that I put a bean up my nose. I guess there was a lot of excitement about that time.

Time marches on and my brother, John E., was born December 5, 1908 in Lusk. The doctor's wife was taking care of my mother and also the baby brother. I was watching the procedure as she bathed the baby. I said "Mrs. Mathews, how can you tell if it is a boy or a girl??"

When I was seven years old my folks took me to a road show at the theater. A man played a big harp and played "Casey Jones." I was really interested and when we got home, I sat down at the piano and played Casey Jones with one finger. Dad said he thought I should take piano lessons, which I did for two years.

Dad, (John Weaklin) died in 1913; Mother (Amy)

J. H. Weaklin Store Orin, Wyoming died in 1946.

We moved to Douglas in 1915 and in my sophomore year I played at the Princess Theater (before sound). In my junior year I played for the prom and didn't get to dance. In 1922 I began to play for the Kiwanis Club and I have been playing for them ever since, which is over 60 years of music and still going strong.

John E. died on January 28, 1947.

I graduated from high school in 1924 and was hired at the telephone company and worked for 39 years when I retired and moved to Casper.

Webel, Charles and Louise

Philip Webel, born in Germany, first came to America during the war with Mexico. He served under General Zachary Taylor in that conflict. After the war ended, he returned to Germany where he was married to Katharine Beerhauers. In 1849 the Webels returned to the New World, making their home at first in the city of Philadelphia, and later moving to Pittsburgh where Philip established a large brewery.

C. C. P. Webel was born in Pittsburgh on November 29, 1852, the second in a family of five children. Charles received his education in the Chicago school systems, which were deemed superior to those in Pittsburgh, and upon the completion of his studies, he departed for Wyoming, arriving at Cheyenne on May 2, 1878. He found employment as a range-rider there, being engaged by the Seawright Brothers in 1879. At that time, the Seawright Brothers were driving cattle from the Oregon and Washington territories into the Wyoming territory.

In 1882 Charles went to Poughkeepsie, New York, where he enrolled in Eastman Commercial College and studied business law and commerce. After graduation he returned to Wyoming and was again employed by the Seawright Brothers whose base of operations was located on a ranch on the Platte River, 13 miles northwest of Casper, Wyoming. His employment was short-lived, however, since he refused to do some irregular branding.

Leaving the ranch, he decided to return to Cheyenne, and en route he stopped for a time at Fort Fetterman. There he purchased the mercantile house of E. Tillotson and Company. He took as his partner H. Altman, forming the firm of Altman and Webel, and engaged in trade at Fetterman. The business prospered, but in 1884, Mr. Webel sold his interest to Altman and went to work in the Laramie Peak lumber mills on Mill Creek furnishing lumber under contract for the United States Government.

Later, Charles located on a ranch of his own on Big Muddy Creek where he raised purebred Hereford cattle.

Mr. Webel was united in marriage to Miss Louise Bayer of Wittenberg, Germany on January 14, 1868, and to this union, a daughter, Susie, and a son, Charles C. P. Webel, Jr. were born.

In 1898 Mr. Webel, in association with his brother-in-law, G. W. Metcalf, formed the Webel Mercantile Company in Casper. Charles continued in his livestock business, however, organizing the Saw Creek Land and Livestock Company which raised both sheep and cattle.

Werner, Edmund and Margaret

My father, Edmund Werner, married my mother, Margaret Werner, daughter of William and Nora Sullivan, on January 17, 1912 at the Sullivan home on LaPrele Creek. She was born on February 27, 1890 near Boxelder, Wyoming.

They had seven children: Mary, Margaret, William, John, Justin (myself), Edna and Jimmy.

In 1927 my father sold most of the holdings on the river and moved the ranch to Lightning Creek, northeast of Douglas. At the same time he bought a home on North Third Street so that my two oldest sisters could go to high school. The house was to be our home until mother died in December of 1965.

My father was elected as a County Commissioner for Converse County in 1936 and served for eight years at various times until his death on December 28, 1951.

Mary married "Bud" Ferguson, son of O.D. Ferguson. They lived on his father's ranch on Little Boxelder Creek until her death in 1952.

Margaret married Bill Runnion and they live in Casper, Wyoming where he owned and operated a truck in the oil fields until his recent retirement. They had four children: Fred, Butch, Mary Margaret and Dorothy Ann.

William was killed by lightning at seven years of age. The tragic incident happened while he was in an automobile in a lightning storm. Their dog was under the car with William sitting immediately over the dog. The dog drew the lightning charge, killing the dog and William.

Edna married Bill Barber. They live on and operate the ranch that Edna's sister, Mary, and her husband owned on Little Boxelder Creek. They have two children: Scott and Mary.

Jimmy died at an early age of diabetes.

I went through school in Douglas, graduating from the Converse County High School. In 1943 I enlisted in the Army Air Corp. serving in the Fifth Air Force Bomber Command, flying B-24s.

After my discharge in 1946, I returned to the ranch and entered into a partnership with my brother, John, and my father. Upon my father's death in 1951 we purchased the ranch from my mother. In 1953 we split up the land and livestock even though we continued to help each other. We purchased the Bob Sturgeon ranch near Laramie Peak in 1958. We felt that the type of range and good water was worth the 75 mile trail twice a year from the north ranch.

On October 20, 1954 I married Marilyn Park Carothers, daughter of Margaret Barry Park. Marilyn's mother and my mother had grown up together in the Upper LaPrele community.

We have three children: Debbie, born in 1955, married to Kent Simon, has one boy, Lee; Ed, born in 1958, is a mining engineer; and Jeff, born on February 29, 1960 is on the ranch.

I also served on the County Board of Commissioners for eight years.

My brother, John, joined the Marine Corp. at the same time I joined the Air Corp. He thought the Marines were for him since he didn't like water. As it ended up, he spent more time on water than a lot of sailors. He served at Camp Pendleton, California and served in the Pacific at Okinawa and Guam.

Margaret and Ed Werner

By 1951 John had married Barbara Ann Leman, daughter of Jim and Lois Leman and moved to the Goochy place on Lightning Creek. They had three children: James E., married Dawna Peterson and have three children, John, Erica and Jessica; Mike, who lives on the old Jack Douglas Willan place south of Douglas on the Platte River; and Elaine, married to Frank Moore.

John's wife, Barbara relates their experiences trailing the livestock from the north ranch to the mountains in the south:

"In 1958 John and Justin bought some summer range in the mountains, at Laramie Peak (the Bob Sturgeon place). This put us 75 miles from the main ranch north of Douglas. It has become an annual trek going to and from summer pasture. In years past we would trail the sheep first, come home and start up with the cattle. It took about eight days each. The coyotes and Wyoming blizzards finally got the best of us and we sold our remaining sheep and built up the cow herd.

"Our trail crew usually consisted of our own children and often times a couple of Taylor children or Runnion boys, nieces and nephews. For several years, Jeff and Randy George helped. Jim, our oldest, was seven years old the first year we started trailing, so it was a pretty young bunch of cowboys and girls. After the first couple of years we purchased a small trailer house to pull each day for camp. We could make just about ten miles a day. We had to make our stops each day in accordance to the water holes. The weather played an important part as to the ease or difficult times of trailing. A nice cool, overcast day was best. One year we had a heat wave in June with the temperature over 90° most days. The flies ran the cattle, then they required more water, and it made for a bunch of sunburned kids. On the other hand, some years it would rain so hard we would be bogged down. The little cowboys usually slept outside in their bedrolls and sometimes they would pitch a tent. When it rained too hard, the tent would leak. Our little trailer got pretty full with six or seven pair of overalls, coats, overshoes, etc., which were all wet and soggy. We tried to dry everything out, and to find a corner to sit or lie down.

"The most worrisome day was the day we went through the town of Douglas. It was always a relief when we were south of Douglas and our eyes would all focus on the mountains. It meant we were getting closer, with only four days left. We certainly were glad when that last long hill was finally climbed. By this time all the cows and calves were tired and sore footed and so were we. I can only imagine how it was with our forefathers coming west. They would have to have been a hardy bunch. I could jump in the car and go for water and groceries and oh!, that delicious ice. When Douglas started the "big boom" it got difficult trailing through town and we started trucking when the calves are babies and trailing home after the calves had been weaned."

Due to John's poor health and the necessity of making room for their eldest son, Jim, John and Barbara moved to town in 1975 where they built a house on North Eighth Street.

John died on May 6, 1983 of complications from cancer.

Werner, Herman and Grace

Herman Werner, son of William and Mary Werner, was on his own from the age of eleven. He drove string teams, broke horses and lived the rugged cowboy's life of roping, riding and herding sheep. He would tell stories of breaking broncs for the British Army early in World War I and chuckle about how they would run some of the meanest mustangs in on the supposed knowledgeable British Cavalry officers.

On January 29, 1923 he married Grace Smith, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Smith, in Lander, Wyoming. Grace was a widow with three children: Jack, Bob and Mary Jane. One daughter was born to the Werners, Herma Werner Irvine.

In 1924 Herman purchased Major Ormsby's "Spearhead Ranch." This was the beginning of Herman's empire. Before his death he was to be one of the largest land owners in the state of Wyoming and at one time sheared more sheep than anyone in the state.

Herman died on August 6, 1973 from injuries incurred in a car accident in Rawlins, Wyoming.

Jack married Lois Lundberg. They had three children: Jon, Randy and Jackie.

Bob married Helen Metz. They had one son, Bob. Bob Sr. was killed in action in World War II.

Mary Jane is married to Howard Strand and has five children.

Herma married Van Irvine and had three children.

Werner, William and Mary Family

William Werner Sr. was born on May 11, 1854 in Achern, Baden, Germany. Not too much is known about him prior to his coming to what is now Converse County in 1885. I, Justin Werner, remember bits and pieces that were told to me by my father, Edmund Werner, and my uncle, Herman Werner.

It is known that William, my grandfather, came to the United States as a young boy from Germany. He joined the U.S. Cavalry and served under General Crook during the Indian Wars. Soon after the Custer disaster it is thought that he returned to Germany to serve out his required time in Bismark's army. Coming back to the United States in 1880, he rejoined the U. S. Cavalry again and served in various forts in Montana and Wyoming. His discharge papers issued at Fort Reno on the 26th day of July, 1885 stated that "Saddler Werner was by occupation a shoemaker when he enlisted" and "that his character was excellent, industrious and sober in habit." Soon after his discharge he took up residence at Fort Fetterman where he was a bootmaker, postmaster, constable and ran a hotel.

Grandfather married my grandmother, Mary Anna Pfeifer, at this time. He must have been very good at letters because he convinced her to come to Wyoming. She was born in Achern, Baden, Germany on October 20, 1859. She came over with her brothers who settled close to the fort.

They had nine children:

William Jr., born September 17, 1886, died in 1950.

Edmund, born October 31, 1887, died December 28, 1951.

William Werner

Mary Pfeifer Werner

Benjamin, born November 22, 1889, died December 20, 1919.

Herman, born November 10, 1892, died September 6, 1973.

Karl E., born March 2, 1894, died November 2, 1948.
August, born August 22, 1897, died 1899.

Franz, J., born October 31, 1899, died March 30, 1973.

Carla M., born January 8, 1902.

Lucy, born August 26, 1904, died 1983.

From old records that he kept at the time, it seems that sheep and horses were his main interest though politics of the time also entered into his life. Old newspaper accounts of the era referred to him as the "Duke of Fetterman." From old letters and records that I have read, he had an excellent command of the English language, both written and spoken. From all accounts he was the community leader in the German settlement that had grown up between Fetterman and Glenrock.

When the railroad came in and stopped at what is the present site of Douglas and the town started growing, it shattered his dreams of Fetterman being the center of commerce and as the place was abandoned he went into the ranching business. His original holdings were on the south side of the Platte River but later he was to acquire land on the north side located where "Corky" Lisco now lives.

He died on July 16, 1908 from cholera and is buried on the old ranch at a spot overlooking the Platte River and the old fort downstream. His grave marker has been destroyed but I have hopes of someday being able to locate it.

After his death the family fell on some very hard times. The oldest son, William, went to Texas and it was left up to my father, Edmund, the second son, to try to keep things going.

My grandmother, Mary, died on August 30, 1930.

William went to Texas to work in the oil fields, Ed married Margaret Sullivan and remained in the area. Herman became one of the largest livestock and land owners in the State of Wyoming, Benjamin entered the military service during World War I and was shell shocked in France, later dying at his Aunt Anna's home in Douglas. Karl lived in Cutbank, Montana and worked with Frank Werner in the oil field welding business. August died as an infant and was buried in Fort Fetterman, Carla married Tony Wroblewski, a Casper policeman, and Lucy married Harold Apel and lived in Casper.

West, Forrest and Fay Family

William Forrest West was born on March 23, 1900 in Page, Nebraska. He grew to manhood there, coming to Douglas as a young adult. He worked at various jobs after his arrival. On May 28, 1923 he was united in marriage to Wilma Fay Brose. To this union two sons were born, William Forrest II and Donald Lee.

Forrest was employed as a mail carrier, later a postal clerk, and then acted as assistant postmaster in the Douglas Post Office.

The Wests bought a place west of Douglas where they ran a dairy, raised turkeys, a large garden, and kept bees. Forrest kept his position with the postal department, however.

The West children were educated in the Douglas school system. After his graduation from high school, Bill served in World War II, after which he entered college. After completion of his college studies, he was married to Esther Richards, and they returned to Douglas. He taught in several country schools. Two children, Terri Lynn and William Forrest III were born to this union.

Donald also completed his college education and worked as a commercial artist for several years, after which he was a free lance artist. He has had several art shows where displays were made of his wood sculptures. He is married to Harriet Pickel of Nebraska, and they make their home in Casper, Wyoming.

After his retirement from the Postal Service, Forrest worked as night clerk for the LaBonte Hotel for several years. He died in February of 1981.

Weston, Abner and Myrtle

Abner Weston was born in Tennessee, February 12, 1887. Myrtle Wagley Weston was born in Texas in 1890.

They came to Douglas, Converse County, Wyoming in 1917 from west Texas. They filed on a homestead about 27 miles northwest of Douglas.

Mr. Weston's brother, John Weston, also came along and took a homestead joining Abner's, where he built a small rock house to live in. They both proved up and Abner bought John's place and John returned to Texas.

From the very start, Mr. Weston began to build one of the better houses and continued to add to it until he acquired one of the nicer houses in the area before he moved to town in the early 50s.

Mr. Weston was a barber by trade and cut hair for many in the community. Mrs. Weston was a seamstress and did all her own dressmaking and sewing for others. They worked very hard raising cattle and sheep alone, as they didn't have a family to help them. He was quite successful with farming using only two horses for field work and hauling coal and produce to town.

Coming from the city, the Westons pulled the shades tightly; never could a peep of light be seen at night, a thing so welcome when traveling on the isolated road far from home. However, there was always a welcome should you knock on the door.

Mrs. Weston grew weary of isolation and moved to town in 1948. He soon followed, leased the ranch and began to build a home there in Douglas.

Abner passed away after a long illness on November 30, 1964. Myrtle died November 25, 1973.

Westwick, James and Eliza Family

James Balance Westwick (1815-1899) of Stockley, England and Eliza Atwell (1828-1896) of Killarney City, Ireland met on board ship and were married in November of 1850, before they reached America.

James' brother, John, and his wife, Mary, accompanied them to Galena, Illinois where the brothers operated a machine shop and foundry for 30 years.

All nine of James' children were born in Galena, Illinois:

Annie (1852-1928)	Harriet (1860-1939)
Jane (1855-1928)	George (1862-1948)
Robert (1856-1916)	John (1864-1898)
Eleanor (1856-1941)	Martha Matilda (1866-1952)
Willie (1858-1887)

)twins

In 1877 John W. Marsden (Jane Westwick's husband) came to Wyoming as a surveyor for the Creosus Gold and Silver Mining Company. After five years he filed on a homestead on Wagonhound Creek, on what is now the upper part of the George Wills' ranch.

In 1884 the Westwick brothers' machine shop was partially destroyed by fire. As a result of this misfortune, John purchased the remainder of the shop and foundry from James. After many plans were made, James and Eliza and six of their children left for Wyoming. Those leaving were: George Westwick and wife, Nell; John Westwick and wife, Emma; Eleanor Westwick (later Mrs. Matt Kewan of Wheatland, Wyoming); Harriet Westwick (later Mrs. Tom A. Shaw of Wheatland, Wyoming); Jane Westwick (Mrs. John Marsden); and Martha Matilda "Tillie" Westwick (later Mrs. William J. Carothers of Douglas, Wyoming).

They traveled by railroad to Rock Creek. There they made arrangements for wagons to bring them the remainder of the way. James and his family homesteaded on the lower end of Wagonhound Creek. It is now known as the Daly ranch. George homesteaded on the ranch later known as the George Wills ranch. John homesteaded on the ranch later to be known as the Milt Hammond ranch. John Marsden homesteaded on what is now known as the Redenbaugh ranch. These homesteads were all south of the present town of Douglas. The Westwicks received some of the earliest land grants issued in the area.

The nearest settlements were Fort Fetterman to the north and Rock Creek (now Rock River) on the Union Pacific Railroad to the south. Once or twice a year they went to Rock Creek for mail and provisions by team and wagon.

James had a white frame two story house built for his family. All of the lumber was rough and had to be hand planed. This was at a time when most homes were log houses.

The Indians were supposed to be on reservations by 1884, but there were still some around. The story was told about Tillie (Martha M. Carothers) who was alone at the ranch house one day when she heard the chickens making an awful racket. Tillie grabbed the broom and ran out of the house just in time to see a very drunk Indian with a squawking chicken. It made her so angry she started hitting him with her broom. He dropped the chicken and ran. Tillie was just four feet eleven inches tall. That must have been a sight to behold!!!

James Balance Westwick was known to his friends and neighbors as the "Old Granger." He was a formidable character with his mutton chop whiskers, his English accent and his stern attitude. Eliza was a dumpling of a person but she did have a temper. At times the "Old Granger" had to watch his step around his "Irish Lass." (This didn't happen often.)

We believe the Westwicks came to Wyoming because of the glowing reports John Marsden sent home. He covered a lot of the state in the five years working for the mining company, Laramie, Casper, and the area south of the present town of Douglas, Wyoming.

Robert Westwick (James and Eliza's oldest son) and his wife, Rose Ann, were the last Westwicks to come to Wyoming. Rose didn't like living the rugged pioneer life so they moved back to Peoria, Illinois where Robert was head machinist for the Northwestern Railroad.

The wedding of Martha Westwick, youngest daughter of James and Eliza, to William (Billy) J. Carothers, on March 7, 1888, was quite an event. Two of the guests were Tom Shaw and Matt Kewan, Billy's fellow riders for the Douglas Willan Horse Outfit. Matt Carothers, Billy's brother, was its manager. The horses were shipped from England by way of the Horn (pre-Panama Canal) to Oregon. The wranglers then hazed the horses overland to the ranch above the present town of Orin. (Others working there were Eli Peterson, George and John Westwick, and John Housiaux.) It is said between them, George and John built over 100 miles of fence for the outfit. At the wedding the two wranglers, Tom and Matt, met the bride's two sisters for the first time. Later Harriet married Tom Shaw and Eleanor married Matt Kewan. Both couples made their homes near Laramie Peak.

The William J. Carothers homesteaded on Wagonhound Creek. Their home was a three room log house. The roof was of sod. A clear running spring behind the house was their source of water. About 200 feet beyond the spring ran Wagonhound Creek. There were raccoon and beaver on the creek, wild turkeys on the meadows, and many deer in the foot hills near the ranch. Breaking horses took up a great deal of Billy Carothers' time. Martha had a garden and some chickens. On February 15, 1892 their only child, Samuel Westwick Carothers, was born. Sam was only eight years old when his father died from injuries received while breaking a bronc.

Soon the "Old Granger's" family was really scattered. One son and one daughter stayed in Illinois. Two of his sons, George and John, with their families moved to California. Three daughters remained in Wyoming. In 1896 his beloved Eliza passed away. Three years later James Balance Westwick joined his Irish Lass and both were buried on the William J. Carothers ranch. After 1901 their remains were moved to the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Robert Westwick (eldest son of James and Eliza) and his wife, Rose Ann, had twelve children. After Rose's death, Robert's three sisters in Wyoming each took one of his younger children to rear as their own. Jane and John Marsden took Jennie E. Westwick (b. 1905). Jennie now lives in California. Harriet and Tom took Robert B. Westwick (1891-1971). After serving in WWII Robert came home to Wheatland, Wyoming where he and his wife, Tillie Patrick, reared their family.

Eleanor and Matt Kewan took William Westwick (b. 1900) for two years. However, due to a lack of school facilities near the Kewan ranch, in 1912 William "Bill" went to live with Martha "Tillie" Carothers.

Bill attended Wagonhound School. Some of his classmates were Rose and Gordon Fitzhugh, Cecil and Ed Hammond, Mary, Jim and Nellie Marsden, Francis and Ruth Pollard, and Bill's sister, Jennie Westwick. One of his teachers was Irene Shaw (later Mrs. Harry Isaac). The children walked or rode horseback to school. If they rode to school, the horses were left at the Jim Marsden ranch. There was no place to care for the horses at the school.

Bill rode once a week to pick up the mail at the LaBonte Post Office on Wagonhound at the Pollard ranch (later the Fitzhugh ranch.) The LaBonte Post Office was first located at the Pollard ranch on LaBonte. At an earlier time this ranch had the Road House facility for the travelers on the Oregon Trail. Later the post office was moved to the Pollard ranch on Wagonhound Creek.

Branding time was a working and social time. The ranch carried three brands: RT (Martha M's); ZY (Sam's); and Lazy YN (Bill's-later transferred to Harold Carothers).

In 1919 Bill and his cousin, Jim Shaw, were hunting deer on the back side of Laramie Peak. They came across three bears and got two of them. This "news" made the Douglas paper.

The big social events of the year were the community dances in various homes with rooms large enough to accommodate all the neighbors and friends. The Matt Carothers' home on Wagonhound was one of the most popular of these. Families arrived on horseback, in wagons, cars, trucks and by shank's mare. Many of the young ladies who came on horseback brought their dancing slippers and party dress along with their cake tied behind the saddle. During intermission at the dance, cake and coffee were served while some gentleman passed the hat for change to pay the musicians, a dollar was most generous. Square dances and waltz quadrilles were quite popular at these functions especially if a good "caller" happened to be present. Bill Westwick certainly enjoyed being a caller and had more fun than most because there were usually two or three in each set who were trying to square dance for the first time.

In the spring of 1924, the four local teachers who were all from Nebraska, sponsored a box supper at the Scott ranch on Wagonhound. The teachers were Ruth Furman (now Mrs. Walter Whitaker of Douglas) of the Matt Carothers School, Vallie Wiggains of the George Brow School, Zelda Stewart of the Frank Rogers School and Ethyle Wiggains of the Zaichkin School. Bill Westwick picked up his date, Ethyle Wiggains, on horseback. Ethyle had her beautifully decorated lunch box and a change of clothes in a sack on the saddle. The men weren't supposed to know whose box belonged to whom. Later these colorful, frilled and ribboned boxes were displayed for the gentlemen to bid on. Jim Willox was the very capable auctioneer who did a little under-handed work, when possible, to aide the gentlemen to bid on his date's box, so he could share the delicious supper she had brought. The five Curry brothers of Douglas were the musicians for the many hours of fun and dancing which lasted until sun up and was declared by many to have been their first box supper and bushels of fun.

On December 10, 1924 Bill Westwick and Ethyle E. Wiggains were married. Their first home was in the log house where Martha and Billy J. Carothers had started housekeeping on his homestead almost four decades earlier. I, Ramona Martha Westwick, Bill and Ethyle's only child, was born at the Douglas hospital on September 9, 1925. The following March 17, 1925, Samuel Westwick Carothers was married to Ferne Sadler. Their only child, Harold Samuel Carothers, was born on October 8, 1927. "Had" (Harold) and I had many good times on the ranch. I have many fond memories of growing up on the Carothers' ranch.

Wheelock, Ben and Margaret

Margaret, the daughter of Frederick AuFrance and Elizabeth Rohne AuFrance, was born in Paulding, Ohio on March 2, 1878. She was raised in Ohio, receiving her education there. Margaret was a very lovely young girl, about five feet four inches tall and had an abundance of beautiful dark hair.

Maggie and Ben Wheelock 1913

When Margaret was a teenager, she met a handsome, dapper man with whom she became infatuated. He courted Margaret, finally convincing her that if she would leave her family and accompany him to Wyoming, he would make her his wife, and that there they would begin a wonderful life together. Margaret accepted the man's invitation and left Ohio to come to Wyoming, not realizing that he was actually a procurer of women for houses of prostitution. He traveled about seeking naive young ladies to set up as "Madames" in various locations, taking his "cut" from the businesses for a time and then moving on.

Margaret and her paramour arrived in Douglas in the late 1890s and there the procurer obtained a house in which he set Maggie up in business. Just how long he stayed in Douglas is not known, nor is the reason for his leaving. It is reasonable to assume that he was there for some time, taking his share of the profits, and overseeing the business until Maggie became proficient at it. Then he disappeared, leaving Maggie to manage on her own.

Since she felt that she could not return to her family and since she had no other means of making a living, she continued to operate the business. After her marriage to Ben Wheelock in 1913 she did return to Ohio to visit her people. Fred AuFrance, Maggie's nephew, came from Ohio when he was a teenager to make his home with the Wheelocks who reared him as if he were their son.

One building which Maggie occupied was a two-storied structure, once a part of the old Valley House which was originally located south of the Burlington grade crossing at First and Center Streets. It was moved in 1914 to make more room for the railroad tracks. This hotel, constructed in 1886, was "T" shaped. The cross of the T was three storied, the tail was only two storied. The three-storied part was cut into two pieces, one part being moved to North Third Street where it was made into the Ranger Hotel; the other part was moved to a lot south of the post office, where it purportedly now houses the Home Bakery. The tail of the T was moved to North Second Street, and it was there that Maggie located, living there until the building burned to the ground after a short time.

Of interest is the fact that warranty deeds indicate that Ben Wheelock purchased Lot 1, Block 3 of the Town of Douglas in May of 1913 for the sum of $400. In November 1916, a deed was issued to Mrs. Ben Wheelock for Outlot C., which was located between the tracks north of the Grain and Storage, and which was sold to W. R. Eastman in March of 1924. In 1920 an additional deed was issued for Lots 16 and 17 in Block 15, which lots are located on South Second Street, just south of the old LeBar Ford Garage building.

The establishment north of the Grain and Storage was known as the Riverside House. The one which was later occupied by Maggie and her "girls" located south of the Ford Garage was known as the "Green House." This was probably the fanciest of all the establishments, having a large mirrored wall opposite the front door, furnished with the comfortable settees and chairs of the period, and having a piano and victrola to furnish music for the patrons. Canadian liquor, imported, was dispensed over a bar situated in the front room. This liquor was shipped in and stored in a cellar located behind the house.

The respectable citizens of Douglas took the attitude that there was no prostitution in their town, though all were aware of the truth. They just chose to pretend that such a business did not exist.

Margaret was an excellent businesswoman; her establishment prospered. While she fiercely protected her girls, she was a rigid disciplinarian. She kept the girls off the streets whenever possible; but each month, all of them must pay a visit to the local physician for examination, to protect the clientele from diseases. The merchants of Douglas, in order not to offend their customers, set down a rule that no more than two of Maggie's girls could come into their businesses at one time.

Most of the time there were ten girls working at the house. Maggie took a sixty per cent cut of their earnings, allowing the girls to keep forty per cent. In return for her cut, Maggie furnished everything the ladies needed, such as the care and upkeep of their clothing, their rooms and their meals.

Before automobiles became the common means of transportation, Maggie owned a buggy with a fringed top. It was drawn by a single white horse. This conveyance could be seen at the depot on the occasions when Maggie expected a "new girl" to come in on the train. She imported her girls from other localities. Coincidentally, on these days, a large number of townspeople just happened to be at the depot. The respectable young ladies who worked at the switchboard in the local telephone office "overheard" conversations which dealt with the arrival of the latest addition to Maggie's house, and somehow the word spread all over town.

Vince Merritt, whose father ran a general store on the southeast corner of Second and Center Streets, and Eddie Russell, who was apprenticed to Jack Kirwin, local saddle and harnessmaker, were frequent visitors at Maggie's place. Vince was sent there by his father to take ready-to-wear clothing when new shipments arrived to the "house" so that the girls could choose whatever apparel they wished. Eddie, on the other hand, was sent with beautiful, colorful Navajo Indian rugs and blankets of which the girls were inordinately fond. All transactions took place in the parlor; the young boys were not allowed in any other part of the house.

An office receptionist for Dr. Storey remembers the beautiful clothing which the girls wore, picture hats with ostrich plumes, long flowing gowns, fur neckpieces, rather ornate jewelry, and above all, their perfume. All of them wore a fragrance called "White Rose." For several days after the girls had made their monthly visits, the aroma lingered in the office. For the most part, the girls were quite pretty, well-behaved and quiet when they appeared in public. They used make-up, to be sure, but usually they applied it sparingly.

The Green House was surrounded by a six-foot-high board fence, which lent an air of mystery and intrigue to the place. Back to back, across the alley was the City Hall of Douglas. The upper floor of that building provided a place for tittering young ladies of the day to peer down into the back yard, hoping to catch a glimpse of the girls with their customers, but unhappily, they saw very little. In winter, other young folks, on their way to a pond south of the Green House to skate, peered through the cracks in the board fence. This, too was unproductive.

In addition to her female employees, Maggie hired a solicitor by the name of Harry Larson for quite a number of years. She also had a Negress named Maude who acted as housekeeper. There were other Negresses later on, as well as other solicitors. Maggie also had a house in Casper at one time which was located on South Wolcott Street, a block from Klines at Second and Wolcott.

The ladies of the churches of Douglas, in the company of a southern gentleman appeared at Maggie's door one day. The ladies objected to the "girls", but the Southernor objected to the Negress. Together they decided to call on Maggie and tell her that she must close her business and send her housekeeper back to the South. They were admitted to the parlor by the Negress who seated them and summoned Maggie. The Negress then departed to prepare tea and cookies for the guests. After some small talk, Maggie decided that she would get to the heart of the matter and inquired of the ladies just what their business was. They explained their visit, saying that it would be much better for the town if the house were closed. In reply to this, Maggie calmly said, "If you ladies would keep your husbands home at night, then I would have no business, and I would be forced to close." The embarrassed, red-faced ladies left, with the gentleman bringing up the rear.

On another occasion, George W. Pike "borrowed" a beautiful sorrel saddle horse from a man living in Sheridan County. He brought the horse to Tate's Livery Stable, located where the LaBonte Hotel now stands, leaving the animal to be cared for while he paid a visit to Maggie's "Green House." Word got around that a law enforcement official from Sheridan was very close to Douglas and when he arrived he intended to arrest Pike for horse-stealing. Vince Merritt was sent to Tate's to tell him of the impending arrest. Tate told Vince to take the horse to John Hartman's place outside of town, that Hartman would dispose of the animal. When the officer arrived he found neither George nor the horse so he returned to Sheridan empty-handed.

At Christmas time, it was Maggie's custom to enlist the help of two or three of the girls to go out to the Wheelock ranch where they spent several days butchering geese, chickens and turkeys. These fowl were then taken to the Bolln Grocery, where Maggie purchased the other food necessary for a festive holiday dinner. Bolln would then have his delivery boy load the boxes of food in his pickup and distribute them to the poor families in Douglas. The folks who received these gift boxes never knew that they were donated by Maggie, but believed instead that Bollns gave them.

Another story told is of the prominent Douglas businessman whose wife grew prize winning roses. One morning it was found that all the roses had been cut during the night. The wife was very angry and the husband, to calm her, said that he would offer a reward for the capture of the rose thieving culprit. Notice of the reward was posted. Later it was learned that the rose thief was the husband and the recipient of the roses was Maggie Wheelock.

With the plans to begin a state fair in the town of Douglas, came the need for donations of money, anything from 50 cents to $10.00 to start the project. Mrs. Pauline Peyton was in charge of soliciting donations from the various business houses and from private citizens. She kept a record of all the donations, as well as the amount donated. She collected $2.00 each from Ben and Maggie Wheelock. Her work completed, she turned the monies over to the State Fair Board, only to have them refuse to accept the donations from Ben and Maggie, evidently considering it to be "tainted money." Mrs. Peyton was furious, arguing vehemently with the board, but to no avail. She returned the money, but never forgave the board for its narrow-mindedness.

Conversely, if the town assessed businesses for such things as sidewalks or streets, the assessment which Maggie had to pay was always about double that paid by the other businesses. If the city could not meet its monthly payroll, then the law enforcement officials would "raid" Maggie's place, collecting a fine which they used to make up the deficit in the city's funds.

Maggie did favors for many people, cashing sheepherder's checks, lending money to persons whom she felt deserving or who were down on their luck. She almost always collected her loans, though sometimes it took a long time.

During the prohibition era, Maggie was arrested for selling liquor. Since it was a federal law, the officers of the government raided places which sold liquor illegally every once in a while. Maggie was put in the County Jail at the time Al Peyton was serving as sheriff. Mrs. Peyton cared for the women and juvenile offenders. She respected Maggie, knowing of her generous and unselfish acts of kindness. It is uncertain whether Maggie received further sentence at a federal prison or whether she was simply fined and released.

The Episcopal Church in Douglas gathered donations in the form of vegetables to be sent to the Cathedral Home for Children which was located in Laramie. Miss Pauline Peyton, Al Peyton's daughter, helped to gather the contributions. One year, great quantities of produce were donated and after two trucks were loaded and sent to Laramie, there were lots of vegetables left over. Young Pauline decided that she would take the produce around the town, selling it to persons who had no gardens, thus raising additional money for the church. She was about seven years old at the time. She enlisted the aid of one of her friends and together they drove about with a team and wagon, selling their vegetables. It was inevitable that she would eventually try the folks at the Riverside House where there was no garden. Pauline had no idea what sort of business was done there, but she thought the place looked prosperous. The door was opened to her knock by the tall, big boned Negress, Maude, who was astonished to find this young, white girl there. Pointing her finger at Pauline, Maude cried out, "You! You, child! What are you doing here? Now go on, git! Git out of here!" Pauline, who was a very determined child, waited until the Negress stopped shouting at her and then explained her mission. She left with much more money and many less vegetables.

The Peytons lived in an apartment above the old Gas Company which was located across the street from the College Inn. During one state fair, when Pauline was still quite young, her parents went to a party at the LaBonte Hotel, leaving Pauline in the care of a sitter. Pauline had been put to bed, the sitter was in another room, and the hour was late. Suddenly, there was a commotion outside on the street which awakened Pauline. She slipped from her bed and ran to her window which overlooked Second Street. There, in the street below, were several inebriated cowboys on their hands and knees each with one of Maggie's girls astride his back. The girls, always modestly dressed when they were observed downtown, had donned short can-can skirts in brilliant colors, exposing their legs, arms, and a lot of bosom. The riders and "horses" made a ridiculous sight as they "raced" up the street to the finish line.

In her later years Maggie lived in the "house" on South Second Street which is now the George Jewell house. The second floor and part of the first floor were moved from the site. She had become somewhat crippled as a result of an automobile accident in which she injured a hip. Evidently she had retired from taking an active part in her business, but she had not lost interest in her fellow man. She was known to take in elderly women who had no means of support, to care for them. One such lady was Mrs. Abe Daniels, a widow, penniless, who lived in the small house behind Maggie's home until her death, with Maggie taking care of her.

On May 2, 1940, Margaret AuFrance Wheelock died. She was buried beside her husband in the Douglas Park Cemetery. She had been confined to her bed for three or four months preceding her death.

Maggie Wheelock was engaged in business just as others were. She offered a marketable service as others did and made her living from the sale of it. Eddie Russell said that because of the generosity of Sarah Morton and Maggie Wheelock there was no need for a Welfare Department in the city. Al Peyton said of her, "Maggie was a good woman. I should know, having had both good and bad in my jail. Bad women are much harder to handle than good ones and Maggie was a good one."

Maggie was kind, generous, honest, and most important to this history, one of the most colorful and interesting characters in Douglas and Converse County.

BENJAMIN ELLSWORTH WHELOCK was born in Vermont or Massachusetts on August 9, 1858, the son of B.C. Wheelock. The elder Wheelock was born in 1826, coming to Wyoming with his sons, Frank, Joe and Ben in 1871. The family first stopped at Fort Laramie, but a short time later continued on to Douglas. B.C. Wheelock took a homestead on lower LaPrele which was eventually sold to Jim Crowe.

Young Ben Wheelock was sent into Montana to fulfill a haying contract when he was only 17. While he was there, he assisted in the burial of the remains of the soldiers who had been slain in the Custer Massacre which had occurred a year earlier. The bones of the massacre victims were gathered in sacks and buried in a common grave.

Ben became well versed in the Indian languages of the regions, serving many times as interpreter for the army and for other governmental agencies. In recognition of his services in this capacity, he was presented with a gold-headed cane, a gift which he treasured, and which he hung on the wall of his home.

In the early 80s, after the government had abandoned Fort Fetterman as an army post, Mr. Wheelock established residence there, engaging in the saloon business. In 1905 he took a homestead on Alkali Creek west of Douglas where he raised cattle. Ben, in addition to his homestead venture, was a good carpenter. He helped to build cabins for other homesteaders who came into the area, as well as those who took claims in the mountains to the south. He was adept at hewing and fitting the logs which were used in the construction of the mountain cabins.

Ben was a nice looking man, about 5'10" with dark hair, greying at the temples. He was remembered as being dignified, polite and friendly.

Ben died March 12, 1940, after having been confined to his bed as the result of a stroke. He was buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery beside the grave of his father, B.C. Wheelock, who had died in 1909.

Whitaker, Walter W. and Ruth

Walter W. Whitaker was born on October 19, 1895, in Parker, Kansas. His father, Joseph W. Whitaker was born in Tennessee and his mother, Minerva Cease Whitaker was born in Indiana. The family moved to Colorado where his father was Tunnel Inspector for the narrow gauge C & S Railroad, built through the mountains to Kenosha Pass. Later they moved to Colorado Springs, Colorado, where he worked in the assayer's office. When Walter was six, his father died.

Walter attended school in Colorado Springs. In 1908, at the age of 13, he came to Wyoming where his older sister lived in the Goshen Hole area. Another sister lived in western Nebraska. During the next several years in Wyoming, Walter worked at a variety of jobs; on farms, hauling beets in the beet fields, on ranches or breaking horses. He loved the outdoor life and by now he had acquired a team of horses and several saddle horses. In a buggy, he and a friend from his school days traveled across northern Converse County, camping along the way. They arrived in Buffalo and soon were at work helping to build a branch of the railroad into Buffalo. He used his horses to move dirt in this construction and his younger brother, Joe, later joined him there. Wyoming was in his blood and he decided to make this his home. He found the land he wanted to file on south of Douglas on King Creek in the Wagonhound area.

In 1916 he acquired his Lazy MY brand. The requirements for proving up on a homestead were a large undertaking for someone alone. To keep going, he helped ranchers in the hay fields, ran a threshing machine, freighted posts and poles out of the mountains and many other jobs. These events in his life were interrupted with a call to serve his country. During World War I, he was with the 91st Rainbow Division and served eighteen months overseas. When the Armistice was signed, he returned to the homestead only to find it had been contested. The problem was soon cleared up and he completed the requirements, proving up on his homestead.

Any young man with a homestead needs a help-mate, and fate was working at solving this problem. In Marsland, Nebraska, on June 11, 1903, twin girls, Ruth and Rachel were born to proud parents. Their mother, Nellie Benton Walker, was originally from Tennessee but following the Civil War, the family left the South and moved on to settle in Sidney, Nebraska. Their father, Howard Gustin Furman, was born in 1847 in Columbia Crossroads, Pennsylvania. Howard left home at an early age, first going to St. Louis, Mo. where he worked as a telegrapher. The untamed West was where he wanted to be so the next few years were spent trapping, hunting and fishing and generally exploring Wyoming, Utah and Montana. On May 21, 1872, he enlisted in the army and in 1876, from his personal notes: "We left Camp Douglas, Utah to take a hand in the troubles that General Custer was having with the Indians in the Big Horn Country. We left the train at Medicine Bow. I was sent on ahead with material to cross the Platte at Ft. Fetterman. We got across the Platte alright and were well on our way when we met a courier with news of the Massacre." Howard was discharged from the army at Camp Robinson, Nebraska in 1877.

On March 22, 1878, he married Nellie B. Walker at Sidney, Nebraska. The next four years were spent building railroads from Nebraska to Utah and later freighting supplies between Deadwood, South Dakota and Sidney, Nebraska. He found the land he wanted on the Niobrara River near Marsland, Nebraska and in 1883 he filed on his homestead. From this start, he and Nellie built one of the finest ranches in western Nebraska.

Ruth and Rachel were graduated from Crawford

High School in 1922 and later attended Chadron Teachers College where they received their teachers certificates. With pioneer spirit, they chose to go west to Wyoming and Douglas was decided upon since an old family friend, Nellie DeCastro, lived there. Rachel was assigned a school north of Douglas while Ruth was assigned a school in the Wagonhound area and stayed at the Matt Carothers home. She and the three children drove to the log school house in a one horse buggy with young George at the reins. With much help and good pitch wood, a fire was built that soon warmed the one room building. This year will be remembered by the tragedy of the Cole Creek flood. Once a week, mail was delivered by way of a horseback mail route between the LaBonte and Hammond post offices, now disbanded. Walter Whitaker was the carrier and was a frequent visitor at the hospitable Carothers home. The teacher and the mail carrier soon became friends and by Christmas, Ruth proudly wore a diamond engagement ring. On May 8, 1924, they were married.

Their first home was a log cabin on a place Walter had leased to be near a ranch where he was putting up hay on shares. The lease being up, the next move was back to the homestead on King Creek which had only a small shack as a dwelling. Near Poison Lake a small settlement had been built for the manufacture of Epsom Salts. Later being abandoned and buildings for sale, a three-room frame building was bought and moved by horses to the King Creek homestead. There was a nice spring where Walter fixed a "spring box" to keep milk, cream and butter cool. One afternoon dark clouds rolled up, a flood came down the creek and took the "refrigerator" down to the Platte.

A Sunday School had been established and prayer meetings were held at the schoolhouse. Rev. John Falconer held services not more than once a month. The ranchers with adequate room held neighborhood dances and often winter evenings were spent playing cards. Neighbors visited each other always sharing a meal. Rachel had married Lee Fowler and lived miles north of Douglas but several times a year the twins managed to meet in town. One of the more special occasions of every year then and now, was the state fair when everyone from the area participated in the many activities, renewing friendships and making new memories.

July 22, 1925, Walter, Jr. was born. Ruth recalls that when Walt, Jr. was four months old, they had an invitation for Thanksgiving dinner with a neighbor. They saddled their horses, wrapped Walter, Jr. in some warm blankets and put him in the saddle mail bag and rode cross country to their hosts as the snow was too deep for the Model T.

In 1926, Ruth's mother died. Her father lived at the home ranch in Nebraska where married sons ran the operation. His health was not good and he wished a daughter would come and stay with him. Ruth and Walter assumed this responsibility which would last for over four years. Meanwhile, Walter commuted back and forth from the small holdings in Wyoming. During this period, the Whitakers acquired two neighboring homesteads.

December 12, 1929, a daughter, Janice was born, On April 2, 1931, Joan was born, (deceased April 19, 1940). With a growing family, it was time to return to Wyoming.

The great depression had now hit and great plans for raising wheat and certified potatoes were not paying off. Wheat delivered brought 20¢ a bushel. Labor and material were bartered between neighbors, eggs were taken to the grocery store in exchange for groceries. The original house was moved again although this time with tractors, after which more rooms were added. From a piece of hardwood, Walter carved out a propeller which was mounted so the wind would generate electricity, providing some electric lighting. Long winter evenings were enjoyed with "Little Orphan Annie", "Amos and Andy" and music of the mid-thirties on the battery powered radio. Life was made easier with the lights and a Coleman iron. Trucking coke, a by-product of the oil industry, to western Nebraska where it was used in furnaces for fuel, supplemented the meager income. The truck was always loaded with produce from the gardens of that area for the return trip. What wasn't sold would be shared with neighbors. During these years of drought, economic depression and hordes of grasshoppers, neighbors shared in many ways. One year when there were more grasshoppers in the combine than kernels of wheat, Walter invited his near neighbor to turn his large flock of turkeys into the ruined wheat fields.

Another daughter, Eleanor Dee was born July 6, 1934 at Rose Hillman's maternity home in Douglas. With a growing family to educate, a move had to be made. At this time, the government took action to keep down surplus by cutting the wheat acreage allotment. A ranch to run livestock and irrigated land to raise feed seemed more profitable. This was in the late 30's and there were several ranches for sale. The large meadows of the Freeman place caught Walter's eye and with past experience on irrigated ranches, he knew this was the place he wanted. If a sale of $5.00 an acre could be arranged for the farm on Wagonhound, the debts could be paid with enough left for the down payment on the ranch. This transaction took place in 1939 and the family moved to their new home in May 1940. This ranch was one of the oldest on LaBonte Creek with the original log house consisting of three rooms and the remainder of the home built in frame. A coal burning furnace installed for hot water bears the date of 1904. With 2½ baths and carbide lighting which was soon replaced with 32 volt electricity, this house had many comforts unusual for a country home in that day. Over the years the house has undergone much remodeling but the brick fireplace in the log room still is used as is the old dinner bell that hangs on the gate post.

The first few years the meadows produced more hay than there were cattle to eat it. Some hay was baled and sold; additional cattle were taken in for winter feeding. Part of the Eggleston place to the south was being leased and when the Federal Land Bank informed Walter in the early 40's that it was to be sold, Walter decided to purchase it. Water was important to pasture land and a spring on the Black Ridge was filed on by the Willox family in the early days. An agreement was made whereby the Whitaker ranch could use the spring for livestock, a neighborly act that was greatly appreciated. There was run-off water in the spring when the meadows were irrigated. To capture this water, Walter gave Charles Saul permission to build a reservoir on the lower end of the ranch which has become a landmark. Always mindful of conservation and efficient use of water, many small dikes were built throughout the pastures.

The early 40's with World War II taking Walt Jr. and help difficult to find, the summer brought young boys to the ranch to put up the hay. One summer German prisoners were recruited from the camp at Esterbrook.

On August 26, 1942, a son Gerald was born (deceased Nov. 8, 1969). The following years were spent improving the pastures and the irrigation system. In the late 40's, a small portion of land was given to be used to build the LaBonte-Wagonhound Community Hall. Walter Jr. was associated with the ranch operation. In 1961 Walter Jr. married Delores Perry and they made their home on the ranch with their three children until the fall of 1969. The girls were married in the early fifties and grandchildren were frequent visitors to the ranch. Janice and her husband, R. E. Hudson, have spent most of their married years in Casper with their four children. Eleanor and Jess Rodgers have also lived in Casper many years with their five children. Gerald was married to Marsha Rushing in 1968.

In 1960, more land was purchased which balanced the feed available with the number of livestock. The new property ran up into the mountains where the family enjoyed taking visitors to see the falls on Deer Creek. They would be amused when told about "Bunchum Creek". It was said the sheepherder would bed the sheep down along the creek bottom; it was the time to bunch 'em in the evening. Visitors could also see an old buffalo wallow enroute to the mountain pastures.

On May 8, 1974, Walter and Ruth celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary at a reception at the LaBonte Hotel hosted by their family. Retirement gave time for traveling and spending some of the cold days of winter down on the Gulf. They visited many states including Hawaii and Alaska. Walter also had time to work with and gentle some of the saddle horses he raised.

Walter Whitaker was known for many good things; among them his faith in other people, his ability to do almost anything with animals plus his own brand of wit and the ability to enjoy a joke, even on himself.

A salesman came out to the ranch one day selling "break-proof" drinking glasses. He demonstrated his product by dropping one glass on the floor plus hurling it against the wall. He let Walter try to break the glass and promptly sold a full set. A short time later, Janice, very recently married, arrived to visit along with her husband. Walter proudly demonstrated his purchase to his new son-in-law. As he dropped the first glass, it promptly broke in many pieces. Puzzled but still having faith in the salesman, Walter threw two more glasses only to see them shatter also.

Another time, upon arriving home one evening from town, Walter pushed the button to open the garage door to put the car away. As the door opened and the garage light came on, a family of skunks darted in through the open door. Walter got a broom and tried to "sweep" out the intruders. Although the skunks didn't seem to mind the treatment, they were not about to leave. Now this called for "drastic" action. Walter closed the door and started the car engine, then went into the house to let the deadly exhaust gas do its work. After a time Walter returned to the garage and picked up the lifeless skunks, placing them in a large pail to transport outside. When asked later how many skunks there were, Walter replied, "five gallons!"

Walter died April 18, 1976.

Ruth remains busy with her flowers, civic and church activities. The ranch house remains "home" to family and great grandchildren these days. On June 11, 1983, Ruth celebrated her 80th birthday on a cruise down the Mississippi on the paddle wheeler, The Mississippi Queen.

White, Henry and Lena Family

Henry N. White was born in Sevier County, Tennessee on July 1, 1874. His parents, Tyler Clay White and Mary Ellen Frazier, as well as his maternal grandparents, were also born in Tennessee. About the turn of the century, Henry moved to Missouri and on May 9, 1900 in Carthage, Missouri he married Lena May York, daughter of Jonathan Albert and Bell Petty York, all born in Jackson or Cass County, Missouri.

In March 1912 Henry moved to Shawnee, Wyoming with his wife and three children: Eula, Guy and Emmitt. Lena's doctor had advised her to move to a dry climate to improve her health. Since she had several brothers living in Wyoming, they chose to go there to homestead so they could have a place of their own.

They lived with Lena's oldest brother, Thomas York, while they cut logs to build a two-room log house with a sod roof and mud chinking. When the house was finished, Tom helped them move their few possessions. Before he left he warned them it looked like bad weather was coming and if it did storm they should not leave the house for anything. His forecast was accurate, a blizzard hit that night and lasted for three days. They had a sheepherder's stove and one bed for the five of them, but they made it! They spent a lot of hours with everyone in the bed trying to keep warm and also sweeping out the snow that blew in between the cracks. When someone went to the outhouse they tied a rope around his waist and someone in the house held onto the end of the rope until the person had made a safe return. There were many happy gatherings in that little house: Ladies' Aid Society, neighborhood parties and holiday dinners for as many as 17 guests.

The three children went to the Shawnee School, which was north of their house. The first two years they went to school during the summer because of winter blizzards. Their schoolmates included three Harkins children, a Swickhamer and a Moore boy. The teacher was Eve Thresher from Lost Springs. Part of the time she boarded with Tom and Myrtle Elgin York.

Around the beginning of World War I many settlers came to Shawnee. As new houses went up all over the place, the sheepherders and cowboys started to go over the hill leaving the sodbusters to take their place. Now a larger school was needed so a two-room school was built. Henry bought the old school house and Tom York helped him move it to his land. When they unhooked the horses and looked inside the old school house, they were surprised to discover they had forgotten to take down one of the kerosene wall lamps and the building had been moved two miles without the chimney falling off. They remodeled the old school house and added two rooms. Now they had a four-room house! The old log house was moved a short distance and made into a barn.

Henry thought the virgin Wyoming soil would make a good garden so he planted one of the first gardens in the area. When winter came their root cellar was filled with carrots, turnips, rutabagas and potatoes. One year he grew so many potatoes he rented a railroad car and took them to Nebraska where he sold them, bringing back apples for his family and to sell in the neighborhood. How good they tasted! He also grew flax which looked like a sea of blue with the blossoms waving in the breeze. They raised turkeys but it was too hard to protect them from the coyotes. Henry sent away for Indian corn seed which made an excellent crop. He fed it to the hogs which he butchered for meat for the table and to sell as far away as Douglas. His cattle brand was HN, a combination of his first and middle initials.

There was no church service in Shawnee until Rev. Fisher came from Lost Springs on the Saturday afternoon train and spent the night at Henry and Lena's house. The next day he attended Sunday school and preached a sermon to the local congregation, returning to Lost Springs on the Sunday afternoon train.

One summer my family took Henry's father and other relatives from the midwest, to the Laramie mountains to camp out for a week. Sometimes they went to the activities in the Seymour District, traveling by horsedrawn wagons or sleds, depending on the weather. There were taffy pulls, good programs and a potluck dinner on Childrens' Day. The children picked dock stems to decorate the school house. The grown-ups pitched horseshoes and the children played games.

Sadness touched their lives in Wyoming. A son, Alvin, was born in 1914 but did not survive. Lena's mother died in 1917, and her brother, Carl York, died during the flu epidemic in 1918. Both of them are buried in the Prairie View Cemetery.

A daughter, Geneva, was born at Shawnee in 1917. I, Virginia, was born in 1922 after my family returned to Missouri, but their conversations about the happy times they spent with their friends and relatives there always made me wish I had shared their Wyoming adventure.

White, Captain W. H. and Elizabeth

A seaman by trade before coming to Wyoming in 1893 with his wife, Elizabeth and baby daughter, Mollie Frances, (born May 7, 1892), Captain Willard Heber White settled on Virden Creek in southwest Converse County, on the old GR Ranch.

Captain White was born in Sussex County, Delaware, May 1, 1861, the son of Henry H. and Mary Ann White. After spending the first sixteen years of his life on the farm, he went to sea and for thirteen years sailed the briney deep as a seaman. He was a master of his vessel for four years.

On November 7, 1889 he married Elizabeth Virden of Captain W. H. and Elizabeth White.

Winter time at W. H. White cabin on Boxelder Creek.

Lewes, Delaware. She was born January 29, 1862, in Milton, Delaware, the daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth Virden.

Captain and Mrs. White became interested in Wyoming through her brother, Frank Virden, who had migrated to Wyoming in the middle 1880's with the Joseph Carey family, also from Delaware.

A niece of Mrs. White, Lida Veasey, whose mother had died when Lida was a baby, accompanied the Whites to the West. Lida later married O. D. Ferguson of Douglas. While living on the GR Ranch, daughters Cornelia "Jimmy" was born in 1894 and Elizabeth "Betty" on October 4, 1896.

The Whites moved to the Charles Smith Ranch on Boxelder Creek, which they purchased in the late 1890's.

All the girls graduated from Douglas High School with Jimmie going one year at Boulder University. Jimmie taught school around the country. Among the schools was the Beaver School on LaPrele Creek.

Jimmie's untimely death occurred in 1918, during the influenza epidemic. Frances (Mrs Howard Esmay) died May 2, 1954.

In 1928, the ranch was sold to Lloyd Huxtable and the Whites moved to Douglas, living on the corner of Fifth and Ash. Captain White died February 7, 1929, and Mrs. White died March 15, 1952 in Douglas.

Betty married Thomas Urie Slonaker in 1921 and passed away August 1, 1982.

Whiting, Marion and Emma Family

Marion Fay Whiting was born January 11, 1883 at Ithaca, New York. When a young man he moved to Pennsylvania. In 1901, at the age of 19, he came to Converse County and worked in the oil fields with his uncle. Later he went to work for Roy Moore who owned a ranch about 40 miles northeast of Douglas.

Emma Jean Hartman was born at Norfolk, Nebraska the daughter of Ernest and Anna Hartman. She spent her girlhood in Nebraska and South Dakota. At the age of 17 she started working in the Norfolk hospital and within a few weeks was traveling with the doctor to farm houses on maternity cases. All of these were two week jobs, the length of a new mother's confinement in those days. She looked after the mother and new baby, took care of the other children, cooked, washed and did everything pertaining to general house work. Her pay was $15 for the two weeks.

Emma's coming to Wyoming started with a telegram she received in Norfolk which read "Call at Western Union for train ticket to Douglas." When she arrived in Douglas there on the platform stood her uncle, John Emil Hartman. There had been a new baby in the family and they needed her help.

Following that case Dr. Bodine, an early day Douglas physician, engaged Emma to care for the wife and infant son of a prominent ranch family, the Roy Moores. The usual two weeks work stretched into months and months into years...without her ever getting back to Douglas. At this ranch she met Marion Whiting.

On May 12, 1913 Marion filed for a homestead 21 miles northeast of Douglas in the Walker Creek Community. On the next day, May 13, 1913, he and Emma were married.

Their first project on their homestead was to build a house, a two room log structure for which they fell and dried their own timber. Winter weather had set in before they got the logs chinked with cement so they decided to use gumbo. They had no water well, so they melted snow in a tub over a sagebrush fire then mixed in the gumbo. They were progressing fairly well until one day the mud would no longer spread. It seemed pretty cold outside to work so they decided to quit chinking for that day and go to Douglas after food supplies. How surprised they were when they got to town to find out it had been 45 degrees below zero. They gave up chinking until warmer weather came in the spring, then they finished the house and made a start laying the logs for a barn.

The water situation for family use was a big problem. They had been hauling water from a nearby spring but this proved unsatisfactory when one morning Emma was going to make coffee for breakfast and found the water bucket swimming with polliwogs. A well had to be drilled. Marion found a job and worked long enough to have money to pay for drilling a well. Emma stayed at the homestead and took care of things there. Later in the summer they did get a good well drilled but it was located at the bottom of the hill from the house making it necessary to haul the water up the hill. Down by the well Emma always raised a big garden, which provided a large part of their food supply. She spent many hours in the fall canning, storing away food for the long winter months.

During the next five years their three sons were born. Marion Fay Jr. on August 24, 1914, Adolph "Bubs" on June 8, 1916 and Ed Irvine on May 5, 1919.

The next five years also brought many more homesteaders to the community. This made a growing need for a school. During the summer of 1917 the parents got together and presented their need to the school board in Douglas. The board agreed to furnish the material and the parents agreed to do the work. Work was started right away but the building was not completed when school started in September. School was held at the home of Mrs. Nicholls for about two months until the school building was finished. Miss Maude Goldsby was the first teacher. She boarded at the Whiting home. At the peak of homestead days the school house had to be enlarged to accommodate 32 scholars. This old building is still standing on the Walker Creek School grounds. It has not been used for school since the spring of 1981. The building was condemned for not meeting standards for fire protection and a new building was moved in for use the fall of 1981. The old building was bought by the community and is being used to hold Sunday school.

In the early '30s the residents of the community banded together again and built the Walker Creek Community Hall. All time and labor was donated. To pay for the cost of material they had pie suppers, box socials, dances and other kinds of entertainment.

In the fall of 1934 Marion was ailing from poor health. On January 12, 1935 he was taken to Denver for examination and treatment. He died in Denver on January 12, 1935.

After their father's death the two older boys, Junior and Bubs, left home and found work. Ed stayed home with his mother to help take care of the place. Early in 1937 Junior married Sylvia Young Reed. They had one child Thomas Alvin, born September 22, 1937. One month later on October 22, Junior died. Not long afterward Sylvia became ill and was bedfast for several years before she died in 1941. Tommy was cared for by his grandparents, Andrew and Hattie Young, until after his grandmother's death in 1946. Tommy was then cared for by his half sister, Ruth Faye Reed, who had married and was living in California.

On November 13, 1937 Bubs and Ruth Numrich were married. Ruth had come to the community to teach the Walker Creek School. They had two sons, Jimmie Dale, born December 14, 1938 and Larry Joe, born December 14, 1940.

Ed was married on April 20, 1941 to Rua Good. Soon after their marriage, Emma moved to Douglas to make her home.

Early in the fall of 1943 Ed left for the service. While he was gone their daughter, Constance Edine was born on June 28, 1944. He was discharged in January 1945. On December 20, 1946 their daughter, Judy Lynn, was born.

In March of 1944 Bubs was drafted in the marine corps. He was discharged in January 1946. In December of that year he bought a place six miles west of Orpha where they made their home.

After Ed returned from service he made his home in Douglas and went to work as a carpenter. Emma then sold the homestead and bought an apartment house at 402 North Second. Ed completely remodeled it making three rental units and one Emma used for her home. This provided an income and work she really enjoyed.

On June 1, 1952 tragedy struck again when Ed died suddenly at the age of 33.

Emma continued to make her home at the apartment house until her death on November 5, 1973.

The homestead is now owned by Earl and Thelma Dunham who have made the old log house into a modern comfortable home.

Wiker, Miller and Nina Family

Miller Kendig Wiker was born November 17, 1857 in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania to John Wiker and Ann Elizabeth Hildebrand Wiker. When Miller was but six months old his parents moved from Pennsylvania to Muscatine County, Iowa, where he grew to manhood. On October 6, 1880 he married Nina I. Sargent. They lived in Iowa for two years where a son, Leslie C. Wiker was born and died in infancy. In 1884 they started west driving a mule team hitched to a wagon with all of their possessions.

Their first home was at Long Pine, Nebraska. They had run out of money and couldn't go on. Miller ran a livery stable for two years. During this time Wesley "Wes" K. Wiker was born January 4, 1886. Two years later, on November 16, 1888, Verda L. was born in a small town known as Non Pariel, Nebraska, which is no longer in existence.

Wesley K. and Agnes Hutchison Wiker 1950

Miller first came to Silver Cliff, Wyoming, near where Lusk is now located and then went to prospecting in the Big Horn Mountains hoping to find the Lost Cabin Mine. Having no success with prospecting for gold he returned to Nebraska and prepared his family for a move to Wyoming. He had decided to settle in Newcastle and in 1890 the family moved to Newcastle on the C.B. & Q. Railroad.

Miller served on the city council and as a county commissioner of Weston County and took part in several sheriff posses while in that city. His children began their schooling in Newcastle.

In 1900 Miller, with the help of his family, moved to

Wesley K. Wiker at Circle Ranch in Dubois. 1920

Converse County and settled down on Lightning Creek for a short time. That fall Wes entered the eighth grade in Douglas. It was to be his last year of education as his father wanted him to help on the ranch. Wes couldn't go on to school, but he never quit studying, and many people asked what college he attended.

Miller kept on trying to ranch, leaving Lightning Creek he settled for a time on LaBonte Creek, Little Box Elder and the Cheyenne River. He finally gave up ranching and he along with his son, Wes, sold the ranch and stock and bought the Jim Albaugh Saloon, naming it The Wyoming Bar. Wes soon learned he didn't want to be in a saloon and sold out his interest in favor of running sheep. Miller then sold his interest in the bar and became part owner of the Douglas Garage Company for several years.

Miller was a County Commissioner of Converse County. After the death of his wife he disposed of all his interests and moved to Wenatchee, Washington to be near his daughter, Verda Thompson, and adopted daughter, Marie Wiker Lyon. He died February 19, 1932 and is buried in Douglas Park Cemetery along side his wife, Nina, who died January 19, 1922.

On June 3, 1925, Wesley K. Wiker married Agnes M. Hutchison. Agnes was born Thanksgiving evening, November 26, 1903, the daughter of Thomas Payne Hutchison and Maud Powell.

We, Wes and Agnes, took our honeymoon trip to the west coast, going to Portland, Oregon and to Wenatchee, Washington. We were accompanied on our trip by Mr. and Mrs. Ral Collins in one car and Miller Wiker and daughter, Marie, in the other. We all carried our own camping equipment and tents. The first night we had to stop off the road between Casper and Rawlins because of heavy rains and mud. We laugh many times about our honeymoon trip because it was unusual. People did not start off on those trips alone because there were no motels, just campsites with cold water faucets and maybe some wood for a fire. By traveling with others there was always one car available in case of car trouble. The crossings on the Columbia River were ferry boats or rafts. The Snake River crossings were not on bridges either. After a month of traveling we returned home by way of Montana where they were just starting to build the road that would later become a well traveled road to the northwest.

Over the years, Wes owned the Circle Ranch 12 miles north of Dubois on the north fork of Wind River, the HK Ranch out of Moorcroft, the Burbank Ranch on Walker Creek, and later a 25,000 acre ranch north of Lance Creek which he operated with Bill Rankin.

For many years Wes was Superintendent of Livestock at the state fair. In the 1920s and 30s Wes maintained a real estate office in Douglas. He served as a State Senator from Converse County, was a City Councilman, a representative of the State Land Board serving all of Wyoming, a representative of the Denver Joint Stock Land Bank, Chairman of the O.P.A. during World War II (for Converse County), President of the High School Board and District No. 17 School Board, Vice-President of the Douglas National Bank, Highway Commissioner for six years, and an appraiser for the Bureau of Reclamation on the Glendo Project.

Wes belongs to Ashlar Lodge No. 10 A.F.A.M., Knight Templars, Korein Temple, is a Past Patron of Woodbine Chapter No. 18 O.E.S., is a life member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association, and a member of the Congregational Church of Douglas. Wes has come from the covered wagon days to the beginning of the space age. He is now over 100 years of age.

August 3, 1926, our first daughter, Nina Maud, was born here in Douglas and I started housekeeping in earnest. We purchased the house we live in now in November 1926 and moved in about December 15 of that year. We have owned this house since that time. Our second daughter, Sara Elizabeth, was born June 28, 1932.

Both our daughters completed their schooling here in Douglas and went on to college. Nina graduated from the University of Wyoming in 1948 and Sara went to the university for two years. Sara Wiker Baker lives in Portland, Oregon. I have four grandchildren: Dr. Wesley Gradin of Douglas, Susan Elizabeth Hickie of Denver, Sherrie L. Gradin and Cindy A. Gradin of Portland, Oregon.

Wes and I celebrated our 60th wedding anniversary in June 1985.

Williams, Charlie

Charles Williams, also known as "Nigger Charlie" by early time residents of Converse County, was born in Missouri in 1851. At the close of the Civil War, when slaves were freed, Captain John D. O'Brien took Charlie and brought him to Wyoming. He lived with the Captain and his family, doing farm work, playing for dances, and helping around the house with the children. Emma O'Brien Adair called him "a faithful old 'Nigger'" and stated "He was often called Charles Williams O'Brien."

Pauline Smith Peyton had the following to say of Charlie, "On about the summer of 1885, I first saw Charlie Williams at my father's ranch on Lower LaPrele Creek. Charlie was hand cleaning the old and narrow Mormon ditch on our ranch for my father. He received $35 a month.

"Charlie reached the conclusion that the captain's boys could do the necessary work and went to live at a place close to the Fryer Ranch. My father, Edwin Smith, loaned a milk cow to him.

"He always played the violin for the dances given at the captain's home. Later I remember Charlie helping to provide music for public dances in Douglas. Ed Schloss was floor manager."

The violin he played was given to the Wyoming Pioneer Association to be put in the museum. It was brought from Scotland about 1874 by Arthur Brownlee and sold to Williams in 1894. Supposedly it was made by Jacobs Steiner, which would have made the violin very valuable. Appraisers later proved that it was not a Steiner, nevertheless it must have given Williams and dancers much pleasure over the years.

Ferne Carothers Payne had this to say of him, "Williams had a dugout in a bank on Wagonhound Creek located on the Sam Carothers Ranch from around 1918 to 1921. He lived there while prospecting for copper and gold in the surrounding hills."

According to Gene L. Payne, Sr., "Charlie Williams lived in a small cabin just south of the feed store for ten years or more prior to his death on May 14, 1937 in Douglas."

Williams, Fred and Pearl

At age 19 and married, Fred Williams came to Wyoming in 1904. The town was Moorcroft, he arrived via emigrant car. His first job was to exercise a team of horses for a rancher who had been in town several days. He was to pick this man up, so he drove in front of the bar several times, then he'd run the horses some more. Finally the man came out with two three-gallon jugs of whiskey, handing them to Fred after he had taken over the reins, he said "boy don't lose that whiskey." Fred sat in the seat and held on to the jugs while the other man grabbed the whip and made it pop and they left then on a dead run and kept it up for several miles. Fred said it was an awful road but they got to his ranch and he told Fred to just pull the harness off and turn the horses loose. Fred said he thought he'd never see them again, but next morning the rancher called them and fed them grain. Fred worked for him quite a while and on one occasion he saw a string team the other side of a deep draw. He watched the team come down the steep canyon. The driver had two wagons and 16 horses. He eased the horses and wagon into the bottom, then got out and petted his lead team and got back in the wagon, took out his whip and cursed them, driving up the other side. Fred had never seen anything like it before or after. Fred later learned that it was the spring roundup wagon.

Fred worked for ranchers in the Carlile, Wyoming area helping Mr. Zimmerschied build a house that is being lived in today by his daughter, Edna Graves, and her daughter, Mary Johannesen. He homesteaded in the area of Carlile after his wife, Mary, came out.

He came to Douglas and bought the Skeleton Springs ranch, about the year 1915 and lived there until 1934 when Mary passed away. Then he bought the Alex Ferguson ranch on Dry Creek from Margaret and Mrs. Ferguson in the later '30s. He ran cattle on the Pine Ridge Reservation for three or four years then came home. There was a drought again, this time he went to the Laramie Plains and wintered out of Rock River on the Bosler ranch, moving in the spring to the Padlock ranch 35 miles north of Gillette. He had a livestock sale and the cattle sold well but the sheep didn't, so he trailed them back to his ranch out of Douglas.

In 1945 I, Pearl Smith Runnion, married Fred. I came to Douglas by train in 1919. In 1920 I homesteaded 15 miles north of Douglas and took the full five years to prove up on it.

My brother, Harlow Smith, who worked at the light plant on North Second Street in Douglas, had a stripped down Ford. He let me use it whenever I needed transportation to get to the homestead. It wasn't very comfortable as I remember. You sat on a cushion on the floor. To start it I had to jack up the hind wheels then use a hand crank. I fixed many a flat tire by taking off the tire and putting a patch on the tube then pumping air into the tire.

I worked in the Douglas area for several years doing odd jobs. Some of them were helping sick people while they were confined, helping Mrs. Bert Emery at the LaBonte Hotel and helping Mrs. Willox.

My mother came to Wyoming in 1922 so I stayed with her for a while.

Robert Runnion and I were married in 1925 while I was working for the telephone company. We had a son, Robert.

In 1947 Fred and I sold our ranch north of Douglas to Hap Kattleson and moved to Medora, North Dakota. We became acquainted with Verna and Evelyn Anderson who bought us out. We then ran sheep on contract in North Dakota until the fall of 1951 when we sold the sheep and went to Kearney, Nebraska with Fred's brother, Ed. Ed had been associated with Fred on the Skeleton Springs ranch earlier after his retirement as a Green Stamp Company employee.

After Ed's death we moved to South Dakota where we ranched on the Cheyenne River 35 miles southeast of Dupree. We sold out in 1958 and moved to Rapid City, South Dakota where we lived until Fred died in 1972.

Williams, John T. and Elizabeth

"Johnny, you've been gone a year out there in the West, and we're worried," went the letter from Wisconsin in 1879. "Sally is still waiting here and wouldn't it be better if you came back?" Johnny never did. He went on being range foreman for the big CY Ranch in central Wyoming. He had spent two seasons cowboying with the CY from the bend of the Platte toward Pumpkin Buttes. It was a time the grass came stirrup high on Hazenville Pass and the cattle came northward up the Texas Trail. He established his own livestock outfit on the range of Sage Creek, north of the Platte River in 1885, and was with George Metcalf in a partnership in a general merchandise store at Fort Fetterman.

He induced his brothers, Abner, Jasper and Jim, to try their fortune raising livestock on Wyoming rangeland. Ab and Jap, in later years, engaged in sheep ranching in Tierra delFuego of southern Argentina.

Standing: Mr. and Mrs. James Abney; J. T. Williams seated in car; the three women are unidentified.

John T. and Elizabeth Williams

John traded for mules in Georgia, sheep and cattle in the Idaho northwest and struck a partnership with William C. Irvine at the Ogalalla Land and Cattle Co. He acquired more than a few stock brands coming up out of the Texas trail, namely the notable Chandelier brand of the Ogalalla outfit.

John married Elizabeth Priscilla Ragsdale in Cheyenne on October 7, 1887. She was born March 11, 1860 at Vincennes, Indiana, the daughter of Thomas and Sarah Ragsdale. In 1883, she came to Cheyenne from Broken Bow, Nebraska; and in December 1885, she came to Fort Fetterman. Their children were Carl Torrance, 1889; John Walter "Mike", 1895; and Elizabeth J., 1900.

In the fall of 1888, John Williams became the first elected sheriff of Converse County beating Malcolm Campbell by 39 votes. "I remember Johnny Williams running for sheriff at the dances at LaPrele," said Nora Sullivan. "He had little bottles of whiskey in his batwing chaps for the other men. Never drank himself. I never liked his wife," she added. Campbell beat Williams in the 1890 election.

John was Sheriff Joe Hazen's deputy sometime before that unfortunate officer was gunned down by the Hole-in-the-Wall Gang in June 1899.

He built the sheep pens on Sage Creek. His career grew quickly with the abandonment of Fort Fetterman, the settlement of Douglas, and the founding of the First National Bank of Douglas. He took an active part in the political life of the community being elected twice a senator in the state legislature (1903). He helped to establish the first Wyoming State Fair. "Johnny Williams got really obstreperous at times...considered himself gubernatorial timber . . .," Charles Guernsey remarked in his book on early days in Wyoming. He was instrumental in the development of the Fetterman Irrigation Ditch project and the Douglas municipal light and power plant. To the time of his death in 1914 he was active with W. C. Irvine in the Ogalalla Livestock Co. He built the Unity Temple Building and organized the Douglas Mercantile Co. His wife, Elizabeth, died in 1936.

Carl T. was a commissioned officer of the Wyoming National Guard (1909) He married Nell Rowley without issue of children. He died in 1969. Elizabeth married Henry J. Bolln with issue of John Bolln and Priscilla Bolln. Mike operated ranches on Duck Creek, Walker Creek and Orpha. He was a loan inspector for the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation and was Executive Director of the Wyoming Unemployment Compensation Commission (1939). He served in World Wars I and II and retired as Lt. Commander USNR (1946). He was one of the early licensed airplane pilots in the state (1929). He married Eleanor Powers of Pennsylvania in 1917 and four sons were born: John Jr., James P., Franklin T., and Carl Michael, with a number of grandchildren in widespread parts of the nation. John T.'s grandson, Carl Michael, has pursued an influential career as lawyer and corporate executive in the TV industry. He was a state senator and state chairman of the Republican party in Colorado.

Williams, Paul and Emma

John Paul Williams, "Paul", was a lad of 16 when he arrived in Wyoming in 1930. Leaving his family, father, mother, four brothers, two sisters, school and a small farm in southern Illinois, to come west. He was seeking adventure because he felt things were moving too slow in Illinois. He had been a voracious reader of the stories of the west.

Always wanting to be a cowboy, he chose Wyoming for his home. He drifted between Converse and Niobrara Counties, between the towns of Douglas and Lusk, which included Lost Springs, Shawnee and Keeline. Working around sheep, and then not caring for sheep, he chose to be a cowhand. He mended fences, helped in the hayfields, rounded up and helped with the branding. Doing other various jobs that are done on a ranch, not an easy life but a wonderful one.

After several years he met Al Hoge who more or less adopted Paul, as his three step-children had forsaken him. Al taught Paul a great deal about cattle and the country. He helped him buy the Harry Parker homestead that joined Al's place.

Eleven years passed and everything was great for Paul. Then the war broke out in December 1941. Paul volunteered in the U.S. Navy and was in the submarines. All that time he saved his money; sending it home to Al, as they were now partners, to buy land. After the war, Paul went back to the life he loved, being a cowboy and a rancher. He is kind and considerate and has a special know-how to communicate with animals. He rides like he was glued in the saddle, with no spaces. He can even witch a well. He can spot a deer, which you'd swear was not there. He is Jack-of-all-trades, which is a must on a ranch. He is a man's man. He commands the respect of his friends and family. He doesn't like fancy foods, he is strickly a "meat and potato" man and he will push a napkin to the side.

To be a rancher was his big dream and desire, and this he has successfully fulfilled, with owning his own ranch. He has worked hard at something he knows well and has enjoyed. His time is his own, no time clock to punch, and he is his own boss. Here is one man who is truly content with life. One, I believe who has found the true meaning of life.

If I were to describe Paul to you, I would say he resembles "Hoss" on "Bonanza", but Paul doesn't wear the big hat, nice shirt, vest or guns. Paul is a big husky man with thinning hair, he wears a blue faded denim shirt and levis, no gun and always has a smile on his face. His two faithful dogs are always at his heels or within calling range. His partner, Al, died years ago. Paul married Emma Pfeifer Olson and was proud to take his wife to his ranch. Paul's world consists of his wife, his dogs and the ranch. Life there is quiet and peaceful.

The setting of the ranch is a sight to behold. You drive seven miles north of Douglas, then take a right turn and for 19 miles you are driving on a dirt road. Then you come to the mail box and over a little hill you can see the ranch, which is about a mile further down the road. The ranch house, barn and corral all fit in a rolling valley. The timberline, which is rows of pine trees, can be seen to the right. When I arrive at this spot, I know I'm home. I'll soon be greeted first by the barking dogs, then my mother and then the one Wyoming Cowboy, Paul whom I'm proud to call my stepdad.

Wilcox, James and Nellie Family

For three-quarters of a century, there has been a Wilcox on the present "96" Ranch on the West Fork LaBonte Creek. James A. Wilcox, the present owner, is the third generation to run the operation and his son, James H. (Jimbo), is the fourth Jim Wilcox to live on the ranch.

The first James Wilcox was born in Scotland on August 15, 1852 and immigrated to the United States in 1871 when, at the age of 19, he stowed-away on a freighter bound for America. The pioneer spirit that drove young James to the United States led him to an adventurous, sometimes daring, and always enduring life as a cattle rancher and prominent force in the early development of Wyoming. He loved his new country deeply for the freedom it offered and became a naturalized citizen on April 2, 1878 in Waukegan, Lake County, Illinois. On March 12, 1928, he returned to Scotland, legally, to visit his native homeland.

On arrival in America, Willox headed first to Lake Forest, Illinois. He later moved to Leadville, Colorado, then to Exira, Iowa. It was in Exira that Willox met and married Nellie Cooper, daughter of Andrew and Esther Cooper. Jim and Nellie had four daughters born to them while they lived in Iowa: Edna (Mrs. Hub Southwick) Burns, deceased, Bess (Mrs. Otto) Bolln, deceased, Margaret (Mrs. Luther) Freeman, deceased and Elsie (Mrs. Edward) Bancker, deceased.

In 1889, a chance visit to his brother-in-law, Lyman Cooper, who had settled in the Esterbrook area of Wyoming during the late 1870s, convinced Willox that this was the area to establish the family's roots.

Willox first settled on Owl Creek, the site of the present Larry Philbrick ranch, on land that was purchased from Virgil North in 1891. He bought additional land from Charlie Deere in 1892 and in 1893 he homesteaded higher mountain land called Willox Park which is now the location of the George Falkenburg Cow Camp.

In 1896, the patriarch James Willox's son, James Cooper, father of the present owner, was born at the site of what is now the Larry Philbrick ranch. That same year, the Cooper-Willox Livestock Company was formed. Partners Lyman Cooper and James Willox imported Galloway cattle from Scotland for their herds, a breed that proved to be too wild and very unsuited to the rugged Wyoming lands and harsh winters.

In 1897, Willox sold his interest in the ranch to Cooper and headed to the land of perennial sunshine, California, where he invested in citrus groves. Within a few short years, a freeze devastated his orange crop and wiped him out financially.

Returning to Douglas, Wyoming, the family pulled all their forces together to reach their goal of someday returning to their former position of ranch owners. Nellie Willox and her daughters operated a restaurant in town, while James hired on as the foreman of the Gibson ranch, the site of the present day Frank Pexton ranch.

In 1905 Willox moved up West Fork Creek to what is now known as the Willox "96" Ranch.

Willox purchased the land from Tony Loubre, a Frenchman, who returned to France a very wealthy man. Loubre had patented his land in 1894, the land where the present Willox ranch home stands. Early records give 1880 as the first recording of a brand to Loubre.

Willox purchased additional land from Frank Werner, Millard Dean, Glen Steeves and the Cooper Livestock Company. In order to have a large block of land under one ownership, several family members homesteaded land adjoining the properties purchased by Willox.

Nellie Willox died on July 20, 1925.

Since the very beginning, Hereford cattle have been run on the Willox ranch on the West Fork LaBonte Creek. The ranch brand, "96", has been in continuous use for 75 years. It symbolizes the year that Willox's only son, James Cooper Willox, was born. The numerals 96 have always appeared on ranch vehicle license plates and today they are also an integral part of the ranch phone number.

James Willox died on November 15, 1932.

James Cooper Willox took over the ranch from his father in 1931 and with his wife, Evaleen Blomquist Willox, ran the ranch until his death in 1956. He believed strongly in the need for a self-contained water system on the ranch and developed an extensive irrigation system to serve that purpose. In 1940, Jim and Evaleen held a large celebration, complete with live band and dance pavillion, at the ranch, to mark the opening of the big ditch.

In 1951, Jim traded 3,000 acres of land with Fred L. Manning. Parcels of land on French Joe Creek, South Park and Saddleback were traded for a large tract of land on Gooseberry and West Fork Creeks to block up the Willox's mountain land. This changed the fence boundary lines from 26 miles to five miles.

Jim and Evaleen had two children, Ann, now Mrs. William Gray, of Orin, Wyoming and James Andrew who now operates the ranch.

Shortly after James Cooper Willox's death on May 24, 1956, Ann and her husband, Bill Gray took over the ranch operation while James Andrew Willox fulfilled his military obligation. This energetic and dynamic young couple managed to also maintain Bill's family ranch at Orin. They ran both ranches from 1957 to 1959.

James Andrew officially took over the ranch operation in 1960. Together with his mother, Evaleen, he enlarged the ranch through land purchased from Fred Manning. Included in this purchase was Cummings Park where such early homesteaders as Thornton Brow, Orin Marshall, Elmer Holm, Charles Suthard, Louis Steffen and Elizabeth Gibson lived. Some of this land had, at one time, been a part of the LaBonte Livestock holdings. LaBonte Livestock was a corporation formed by Lyman Cooper, James Charles Saul and Henry C. Saul.

Evaleen died on June 15, 1965.

James Andrew married his wife, Susan in 1966. Today, Jim and Sue and their two children, James H. (Jimbo) and Amy live in the original ranch house that Tony Loubre built from logs in about 1894. The log home has been added onto by each successive generation. One of the first additions was the addition which was made for Andrew and Esther Cooper when they moved from Wagonhound Creek (Raeber Ranch) to live with their daughter and son-in-law, Nellie and Jim Willox.

The Willox family members have always attended rural schools, including the White School, a one-room school house that serves kindergarten through eighth grade. Jim never failed to make his way to the school house, regardless of the weather conditions, even braving fierce blizzards in order to meet his academic obligations. He was even honored with a perfect attendance award for never missing a day of school in the first four grades, netting him a place in Ripley's "Believe it or Not".

The first James Willox served in the State Legislature for one term in 1910. His brother-in-law, Lyman Cooper, served in the State Legislature as speaker of the house. James Willox's grandson, James Andrew Willox, the present ranch owner, served three terms in the State Legislature between the years 1967 and 1971.

The Willox "96" Ranch of 1980 contains some mountain section land that has been traded out and repurchased or traded by the family at least twice.

Like his father before him, Jim Willox believes in the need for water on his ranch. Jim has made some significant changes in the irrigation system of the ranch and has included an irrigation circle. The family's love of their ranch and their rich heritage is shared with friends and relatives on the last Sunday in May each year, when the traditional brandings are held, a tradition that has endured for over 75 years.

J. M. Wilson, M.D., 1886.

Wilson, Dr. James and Laura

James M. Wilson was born in Newluce, Wigtonshire, Scotland on February 25, 1854. He came to America when he was just a boy. He received his common school education at Albany, New York, and at Woodshire, Ohio. In 1878 he entered Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia. He began his professional career in Harrisville, Ohio.

He was married to Laura J. Moore on December 3, 1880 in Harrisville. Their elder son, James Byron was born there on August 7, 1883. In 1886 Dr. Wilson, his wife and son moved to Douglas, Wyoming, which at that time was only a tent town. He practiced as a physician and surgeon for ten years in Douglas. His second son, Charles M., was born there on February 19, 1888.

Dr. Wilson retired from the medical profession in 1896 to take over the management of the Platte Valley Sheep Company, a position he held until his death in 1925. The Platte Valley Company was incorporated in 1893. They ran many bands of sheep on the open range. Later when increasing numbers of homesteaders filed on the open land, the company was obliged to rent grassland as far away as Casper, Wyoming.

Dr. Wilson was active in every movement beneficial to the sheep industry in Wyoming. He was the vice president of the National Wool Growers Association for years. He also served as chairman of the State Board of Sheep Commissioners from its inception by legislative enactment. He organized the first Wyoming State Fair, and acted as the president of the Fair Board.

The Douglas Budget, on March 21, 1918, mentioned, "Dr. J. M. Wilson was seriously hurt in Pueblo, Colorado, when a switch engine hit the taxi cab he was riding in. He is partially paralyzed from the hips down."

Dr. Wilson died Sept. 13, 1925 and his wife, Laura, on Oct. 17, 1930.

Byron, the elder son of James and Laura, attended the state university for one term after completing his common schooling. Later he attended the Peeksville Military Academy, Peeksville, New York. He graduated in 1901, and went to Oberlin, Ohio to attend college for three years. He returned to Douglas then, and read law in the office of Judge Maurer for a year.

Bess Lewin, who was to become Byron's wife, was also employed by Judge Maurer. Bess was born in Longwood, Nebraska in 1885. She came to Wyoming in 1905. Bess and Byron were married in Comstock, Nebraska in 1914. They moved to the Muddy Ranch which Bess and her brother managed. Byron had taken a position with the Wyoming Wool Growers Association and was away from home most of the time. Byron became secretary of the Association in 1917, and Bess acted as his secretary for many years.

Bess and Byron eventually moved from the Muddy Ranch to the Platte Valley Sheep Ranch headquarters at McKinley and assumed the management of that ranch. Bess died in 1966, and Byron in 1965.

It is of interest to note that the Muddy Ranch, located southeast of the headquarters at McKinley, was mostly bottom land irrigated from the waters of the Platte River. The first pumps were powered by steam engines; later on, water wheels were installed, and much later the pumps used were electric. Today the Muddy Ranch is covered by Glendo Lake.

Of interest, too, is the fact that the bridge across the Platte was not constructed until 1914. Provisions for the various sheep camps had to be "forded" across the river.

Charles M. Wilson, Byron's brother, attended school in Douglas. He went to Prep School at Peeksville, New York, and later attended Kentucky Military Institute at Lyndon, Kentucky. He graduated with honors in 1907. Following his graduation, he was engaged in the livestock business with his father. Still later he went into the ranching business for himself. He was married to Julia Elizabeth Gilbert, a nurse, on September 29, 1931 in Sterling, Colorado. Charles died on December 25, 1951.

Winder, John E. and Leah

John E. Winder and Leah M. Lindley were married in Bedford, Iowa, on Christmas Day 1918. John wanted a farm, but land was too expensive in Iowa. So they were greatly impressed when Leah's brother, Clifford, who had homesteaded near Fischer, Wyoming, wrote of the great land for growing potatoes to be found there. To a land-hungry young couple, the availability of a homestead in Wyoming acted like a magnet.

Consequently, it took them only until March 1919 to move to Converse County, Wyoming in an emigrant railway boxcar with all their belongings, which included three horses, a dozen hens, and one rooster. They left the train at Fischer and before long John filed for a homestead, one section of land two and one half miles north of Orin Junction, at the land office in Douglas.

They spent the first winter (1919-1920) living in a boxcar parked on a railroad siding near Fischer. Leah taught school there under Margaret Barry, the County School Superintendent.

This young couple was not overly discouraged by the culture shock of suddenly finding themselves living under primitive conditions in an arid, thinly populated area. It helped that they found all its inhabitants, both tame and wild, of great interest.

In the spring of 1920, neighbors from Shawnee Creek helped the Winders build a concrete-block house on their homestead land. A dugout barn covered with railroad ties and dirt was also built. During the house construction, a bunny rabbit would hop into the cooking shed and play with Leah's shoestrings while she worked. A bullsnake, which had gotten into the concrete blocks during construction, did a good job of keeping the mouse population down. But it became unwelcome after Leah's sister, who taught at the Platte Valley School, saw it one night by moonlight shining through a window. A great hunt developed and several days later the snake was evicted from the house.

During the homestead era, a collie dog followed John home from Orin Junction. Shep soon became Leah's dog and helped her catch rabbits, knowing he would get to eat the head. With dry beans being a way of life, the rabbits were welcome table fare. Shep was good at identifying ripe melons with his nose. But so were the coyotes, who would soon find the ripe ones and carry them away for a feast. Shep had a run-in with a porcupine and Leah spent hours pulling the quills from his mouth.

It seems the "great" farm land didn't produce well. Notwithstanding, John purchased another section of land to add to their holdings. But enough income still couldn't be obtained from farming to support a family. So John also worked as a railroad section hand.

In 1923 Leah began teaching at the Platte Valley School. She boarded at the J.C. Shaw ranch during the week. John would pick her up Friday evenings with the horse and buggy. The horse was a shiny black Morgan named Barney, who didn't have much use for cars. When seeing one, he would stop and paw the air with his front legs until the car disappeared. The highway at this time wasn't much more than ruts going over the hills.

After living on the homestead for seven years, John and Leah moved into Orin Junction, where they rented a house from Henry Hern across the street from the school. Leah taught there with Emma Powell. In 1927 the Winders bought a home in Orin from the Randolphs. During this time, 1927-1934, Orin had a baseball team which was quite good. Father Bruno from Douglas played on the team. It seems his bishop from Cheyenne wasn't too pleased and managed to obtain and burn the Father's uniform. Father Bruno very carefully safeguarded his next baseball uniform!

Work was very hard to find during the great depression. But Leah obtained a job as a case worker for the welfare office in Douglas, and John worked on the railroad. They rented an apartment in Douglas, where Christmas Day 1934 became a day to celebrate when a son, John Henry, was born to the surprise of a great many people who considered the Winders a little too old to start having children.

In 1938 John was still working on the railroad, but the family now rented a house from Mrs. Chamberlin in Douglas. It was here, on February 18th, that a daughter, Laura Jo, made her appearance.

John soon began working at Orin Junction and he moved his family into their house there. He continued to work on the railroad until his death on December 23, 1946. After John's death, Leah, with her two children, moved to Lusk, where she taught school (second grade) for 17 years until her retirement. She was an active part of the Lusk community until 1979 when she moved to Rapid City to live with her daughter and her family.

Wintermote, Martin and Semira

The first Wintermotes coming to the New World settled in New Jersey. The name was then Windemoed, later it was found as Wintermoot, Wintermood, and Wintermute. There are many descendants who still use the Wintermute spelling. They worked their way westward to Iowa where Martin Leonard was born in 1858. He and his wife, Semira (b. 1879), moved to Holt County, Nebraska in the early 1880s. Two children were born in Iowa: Chlonella (b. 1880) and LeRoy (b. 1881). Their third child, Arminta, was born in 1883 in Holt County, Nebraska. She died at the age of four years.

LeRoy was the first of the Wintermotes to come to Converse County to homestead. He came from Butler County, Kansas along with his wife, Grace, and children, Wilda, Roy, Dora, Vernon and Gladys. The year was 1914. They found suitable land one mile south of Shawnee.

The next summer brought Martin, his wife, Semira and son, Joyce (b. 1902). Their homestead was seven miles west of Shawnee on the "Shawnee Cut Off" road. They spent the summer of 1915 returning to their home in Holt County, Nebraska for the winter. Martin was quoted as saying "Wyoming has a great future, you are bound to have enough room to turn around without crowding your neighbors." They came to stay in February 1916. Two of the sons, Everett (b. 1897) and Audra (b. 1895) stayed in Nebraska to feed some cattle, and came later in the spring.

Elsworth Vernon (b. 1888) filed for his homestead in 1916 accompanied by her husband's parents, Martin and children, Leona and Lester came by train February 22, 1916 accompanied with her husbands parents, Martin and Semira and their youngest son, Joyce Elsworth came two days later with a car load of their belongings. While the house was being built, they stayed with Elsworth's brother LeRoy, near Shawnee.

The first years of homesteading were lean years for everyone. Elsworth, often worked away from home leaving Rachel to "keep the home fires burning." It seems it never failed that range cattle would tear down fences and get into the precious field crops, or even into the garden. Open range was plentiful and stock could go in any direction for miles. Often the milk cows would wander away and not be found for two or three days.

The year of 1917 two more children were added to the Wintermote name. Clifford was born to Lee and Grace, Zella to Elsworth and Rachel. That same year Everett met and married Cleona Rhoda Harkins on November 19.

He homesteaded north and east of Orin Junction. Once more the family assembled to build a house and barn for the newlyweds.

World War I was taking many local sons, and Audra joined the army and marched off to Germany.

Florence (b. 1893), daughter of Martin and Semira, and husband, Glen Keeper, lived about two miles northwest of Shawnee. The year of 1920 she had gone to Mayo Clinic for surgery. The surgery was unsuccessful. She was buried in Douglas Park Cemetery.

Along about 1922 Lee sold his homestead and returned to Butler County, Kansas. Their son, Clifford, died that year in Kansas. They had one more son born in Kansas, William Leonard in 1923. Lee and Grace spent the rest of their lives there. There are many of their children and grandchildren still living there.

The XH School was a one room log structure built at the east side of Elsworth's land. All eight grades were taught there for all neighboring families. Teachers were sometimes wives of local homesteaders, other times they came from out of state. So it was that Eugenia May Wall came to teach.

Wedding bells rang once more in 1923 when Audra married Eugenia Wall. They lived on rented places for a while before Audra homesteaded west of Casper.

In 1924 Joyce married a neighbor girl, Grace Metcalf. He helped his parents on the home place for a time. Later he too went west of Casper where Audra had settled.

Martin and Elsworth bought a threshing machine and tractor to harvest not only for the family but for neighbors as well. Threshing time took them away from home, it was hard work, but they enjoyed the fellowship gained through helping friends and neighbors. Whole families took part in the harvest. Men came early with teams and hay racks, the ladies came later with extra plates, kettles or what ever might be needed to prepare meals. The children romped through the straw and the grain bins.

Martin's health began to fail so in 1928 they held a public sale and moved to Douglas.

It was during the harvest season of 1930 when the "threshing crew" was at Everett's home that Cleona and Everett received a message from Cheyenne that there was a baby boy ready for adoption. Needless to say they were overjoyed and made a rush trip to bring back a healthy, brown eyed Lloyd.

February 12, 1932 Martin suffered a fatal illness. Semira stayed at the home in Douglas for a few years. Her last years were spent with sons, Audra and Joyce, who then lived west of Riverton.

In 1932 Elsworth and Rachel's oldest daughter, Leona, married Robert Roy Tiedt and went to live on her homestead west of Casper.

Everett and Cleona had a public auction in 1937 and returned to Holt County, Nebraska. They were blessed with two more sons, Leonard and Arthur. Everett owned and operated a welding shop in Chambers. He lived there until death claimed him in 1968. Cleona died five years later in a nursing home.

That left only Elsworth and Rachel of the Wintermote family in Converse County. Zella married Newton Melbern Crane in 1936. Lester remained at home helping on the ranch. He married Grace Bell York on July 17, 1938. Elsworth and Rachel bought a small trailer house and lived down along Shawnee Creek. They were still very active in running the ranch.

Death struck once more in 1941 taking Leona. She left a husband and three small children: Betty (Alberts), Vivian (Robison), and Donald.

In the fall of 1942 Elsworth and Rachel turned the ranch over to Lester and moved in to Douglas to make a home for Leona's husband and children.

Elsworth worked at various places. He was employed at the state fairgrounds trimming trees in 1947 when a tree limb swung around and struck the ladder he was standing on resulting in a serious back injury.

In 1944 the original homestead barn and part of the house, was moved one mile east near XH Crossing on Shawnee Creek. All that remains at the original site of the homestead is the wind mill and corrals.

After retirement Elsworth and Rachel enjoyed traveling, camping and fishing. They were in a boat with friends on Glendo Lake on a Sunday afternoon June 26, 1960 when Elsworth suffered a fatal heart attack. Rachel stayed at the home in Douglas for a few years. She bought a small trailer house and lived in Lester's yard. In December of 1976 she went to Lander, Wyoming with her daughter, Zella. She spent the remaining three months of her life there until death claimed her March 15, 1977.

Lester lived on the ranch until his death on September 25, 1981. His wife still lives there. The ranch is now leased and operated by Lester's oldest son, Allen Wintermote.

Witt, O. P.

Born on February 26, 1854 in Georgia, O. P. Witt came to Fetterman, Wyoming Territory in 1885. In 1892 Witt, who operated a livery stable in Douglas, founded the Douglas Grain and Storage. In April and May of 1892 Witt was an integral part in the abduction of the two eye-witnesses, Ben Jones and William Walker, to the murders of Nate Champion and Nick Ray. He was hired by the "White Caps," the cattlemen's regulatory mob, to aid in kidnapping the two to prevent their testifying.

The two trappers, friends of Champion and Ray, after witnessing their deaths traveled to Casper, Wyoming. Upon their arrival in Casper they were immediately taken into custody by Ol Rice, the Sheriff of Natrona County, questioned about the murders and released, being cautioned by the sheriff not to leave town, to stay in the open, avoid strangers and not to stay out after dark. These precautions were felt to be necessary since the sheriff was convinced that the cattlemen would surely try to murder the witnesses.

Shortly it became evident that the lives of the two men were in constant danger as long as they remained in Casper, so Rice contacted Sheriff Red Angus of Johnson County and Under Sheriff Kimball of Converse County to decide where the two men would be the safest. It was decided that the Converse County Jail would be the best place so Kimball went to Casper to escort the witnesses to Douglas. The trip was made by railroad with the trio riding in a baggage car which Kimball felt would be safer than riding in a regular coach. An attempt to take the witnesses was made by the cattlemen at Glenrock but it was a failure.

For several days after their arrival in Douglas, Jones and Walker lived in the county jail, watched over by Kimball. Then Kimball was called to Glenrock to serve a warrant. He was certain that the summons to serve the warrant was a trick by the cattlemen, but was obliged to perform his duty. Before leaving the jail Kimball gave each of the men a revolver and ammunition cautioning them not to take chances and to kill anyone who bothered them.

Kimball had been gone only a short while when a man came to the jail to speak to Jones and Walker. This man was O. P. Witt. He told the witnesses that their lives were in danger no matter where they lived until all of the cattlemen were cleared of the charges against them. Witt said that the cattlemen would pay them money to leave the state or pay them with lead if they stayed. "The decision," he said, "was up to them." The conditions were that Ben and William were to leave the state that night and stay away until after the cattlemen had been tried thus there would be no witnesses. If the two refused then the cattlemen would be forced to kill them for they could not afford to have any witnesses alive. Witt assured the men that they would be well paid for their time and trouble.

Witt was to receive a settlement of $1,100 in cash in addition to any expenses he would incur for the trip to Nebraska, such as horses, supplies and so forth. Each of the two witnesses were to receive $200 when they had entered Nebraska and at that time they were to be freed.

Neither Jones nor Walker was pleased with the proposition but they had little choice so they finally agreed to go with Witt. They were told to have their packs ready so that they could leave at dusk. Witt left to arrange to buy saddle horses and the necessary supplies and clothing for the trip. He returned to the jail shortly before midnight. In the meantime Ben and William secreted the pistols which Kimball had given them among their belongings and the three men left the jail at midnight before Kimball's return.

They avoided roads and the railroad so they would be less likely to encounter anyone, finally returning to the railroad tracks near Lost Springs. There Witt stopped to cut the telegraph lines as he had been ordered so that messages could not be sent from Douglas informing other law offices of the kidnapping. Witt cut the line in two places, removing about 50 feet of wire which he then took some distance from the line and hid in the sagebrush. If someone did happen along, the line could not be spliced when cut in this manner.

Witt and his two companions traveled 115 miles in 13 hours to cross the Nebraska line. They unsaddled their horses near a bridge at the edge of a town and waited there for the arrival of the Chicago and Northwestern train. Witt said that a man carrying the money due to Ben and William would be arriving on the train. This statement caused the two witnesses to become even more suspicious and uneasy since Witt had told them in Douglas that he, Witt, was carrying the money.

When the train arrived the only passenger to get off was F. H. Harvey, a Douglas lawyer. He gave the witnesses their money but would not free them. He said that other things had occurred which made it necessary for Ben and William to go further into Nebraska. However, Harvey assured them that when things "cooled down" each would receive another check in the amount of $2500. Kimball, who had returned to Douglas, tried to find ways to arrest the witnesses and return them to Douglas. He issued a warrant for them for the theft of the pistols taken from the Converse County Jail. Other law enforcement officials made similar attempts but all failed. The progress of Harvey, Witt, Walker and Jones could not be stopped. On May 10, after having been in Omaha for some days, Jones and Walker were smuggled out of Omaha and sent on eastward. Witt then returned to Douglas.

Since the president, the governor, two United States Senators, the national guard, war department and several judges all sided with the cattlemen, the killers were never brought to trial. They were finally released by Judge Scott. The reason being that Johnson County had to pay for the care for the 44 killers during their confinement. Laramie County finally refused to accept warrants from Johnson County and also refused to care for the prisoners any longer. The judge said that he was forced to allow the prisoners bail, the regulators refused to furnish bail and the judge was obliged to release the killers on their own individual recognizance. Right away, the killers signed bail bonds for $20,000 each and were ordered to appear for the next term of court in January 1893. The gunmen left for Omaha where the president of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association, John Clay, saw that all got their pay. At the rate of five dollars a day for five months each plus 50 dollars bounty for each scalp it amounted to a tidy sum.

Court convened in January but the gunmen were absent as were the two witnesses which O. P. Witt had helped to kidnap. The witnesses were still hid away in Rhode Island, held prisoners by a member of the famous Dixon family. The gunmen had returned to Texas and only a few cattlemen went to court that day. So the murder case was dropped and no one was ever punished.

O. P. Witt, in addition to his grain and storage business, was a partner with George Cross, Sr. and George Goodwin in the Mountain Valley Sheep Company serving in the capacity of manager. In 1906 the company sold its holdings to the Sims brothers. Witt was the uncle of Leonard Shaw who later owned and operated the grain and storage business.

Witt was married to Mrs. E. R. Wright of San Antonio, Texas in 1922, at the age of 68. He died the following year on September 8, 1923.

Wohlford, John and Rubie

John and Rubie Wohlford were pioneers who played an important part in the growth and advancement of the sheep and cattle industry of Converse County, Wyoming. John ran 1000 to 1200 Rambouillet sheep and a herd of Hereford cattle on 5,000 acres of range, having added to his acreage through the years.

John was born on October 1, 1889, near Barnard,

L. to r. Dr. Lynch, Mrs. Lynch, Colista Combs, Gene Combs, Rubie Wohlford, John Wohlford, and unknown. In front of Wohlford home north of Douglas.

Missouri. He was the son of George Caleb and Nancy (Thompson) Wohlford. He grew up on a farm near Barnard, one of a family of ten children.

Rubie was born near Arkoe, Missouri on February 20, 1893, daughter of Z. T. and Elizabeth (Breckenridge) Clements of Arkoe, Missouri where she grew up to womanhood. Rubie was the youngest of ten children. She was preceded in death by all her brothers and sisters.

John and Rubie were married on December 1, 1915 at Marysville, Missouri. They made their home on a farm near Barnard, Missouri until 1917, when they came to Wyoming and homesteaded 45 miles north of Douglas and one mile south of the present Cheyenne River Bridge.

John was one of the men who worked worthily and well for the good of the community. He served for many years as a member of the Dry Creek Hall Board, and at the time of his death he was representative of this section for the Wyoming Cooperative Wool Marketing Association.

Rubie was a member of the First Baptist Church and a charter member of the Dry Creek Homemakers Club. She was willing to help with other social activities and events.

John and Rubie carried on their ranching operation for thirty years. In the spring of 1947 they sold their place to Wilbur Stoddard and moved to Douglas, to make their home.

John died suddenly of an apparent heart attack on February 10, 1955. Rubie continued making her home in Douglas until she passed away on July 9, 1974 at Converse County Hospital. They both rest in the family plot in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Wolcott, Frank and Adelaide

Francis "Frank" Wolcott, founder of the beautiful VR Ranch south of Glenrock, was enticed to the Territorial Wyoming by President Ulysses S. Grant who appointed him (1869) as "Receiver of Public Monies, U.S. Land Office." His political duties required his assistance in processing "entries" of prospective homesteaders and once their "claims" were "proven up", to assist in issuing patents to their land. Strangely enough, this complex man 23 years later, master-minded an invasion plot designed to "exterminate" no less than 70 citizens of Converse, Natrona and Johnson Counties, some the very folks he had been appointed to help.

A variety of personality-types, even his close acquaintances were hard pressed to describe Wolcott; John Clay, who loaned him sizeable sums of money on his VR holdings, characterized him as "...a fire-eater, honest, clean, a rabid Republican with a complete absence of tact, very well educated and when you knew him a most delightful companion. Most people hated him, many feared him, a few loved him." Malcolm Campbell, Converse County's first sheriff, spoke of Wolcott as "...a polished gentleman..cocky..a bantam rooster...a Kentuckian who served in the Civil War on the union side. His smile was cool and cynical...had fearless eyes...a brown mustache, and a strong jaw that closed with a snap after every sentence he uttered." A hired hand, Dunham, distrusted him, saying, "I found the Major was a hard-headed rascal who would cheat his men out of their wages." On the other hand, an employee named Hemingway praised Wolcott for his "honesty" and declared, "If I am respected today...it is because I was taught by Major Wolcott." M. McGrath of Glenrock fumed, "I never knew a man more universally detested." Malcolm Campbell explained, "Wolcott was a man of very positive convictions and his experiences with small ranchmen around his VR Ranch had often been of a violent nature."

Many felt Wolcott's government service was doomed. Even his activities as U.S. Marshal and warden at the new 42 cell federal prison at Laramie City (now Laramie, Wyoming) came under fire. Repeated accusations of political graft were raised, primarily due to a widely circulated pamphlet which claimed he had taken under-the-table payoffs and even pocketed money belonging to his deputy marshals.

Evidence indicates that it was during this period that Wolcott received his twisted neck -- acquired in a tussle with a Laramie cowboy -- that left his head permanently cocked to one side. Despite this, he still maintained his military bearing and wore his puttees.

Then, without warning, came the resignation of Territorial Governor John A. Campbell who accepted the office as U.S. Third Assistant Secretary of State. Suddenly Wolcott's political days appeared doomed. Campbell's replacement, John M. Thayer, wasted no time in removing Wolcott, reporting to Washington that he was "offensive to almost the whole people." But the Major still had luck on his side.

Wolcott's replacement proved so inept and overtly dishonest that he was removed; and once again, despite howls of protest from his political foes, President Grant re-appointed Wolcott U.S. Marshal. He continued in that office until 1876.

Wolcott, unlike most of the open range stockmen, had little financial backing and didn't seem to have well-heeled kinfolks' back east or in the "old country" to bankroll him. As a result, the Major realized if he were ever to make it BIG, he must get in good with the well-heeled "Cattle Barons." Towards that end, Wolcott had consistently urged the ranchmen to get organized. As a result, a meeting was held in Cheyenne on April 15, 1871, and the Wyoming Stock Graziers Association was organized and named John A. Campbell its president. True to form, with hardly a cow brute to his name, Major Wolcott got himself voted in as the association's secretary.

On March 28, 1879, the association changed its name to Wyoming Stock Growers Association. It was at this meeting that Major Frank Wolcott presented the most important resolution ever to be considered by the association. "That an executive committee is hereby established to consist of three members, residents of Cheyenne, who shall be elected by the Association at its present meeting and shall with their successors hold office for one year..." Thus did the system of management come into being over a hundred years ago which, perfected down through the years, prevails today.

Harry Boyer, a hired hand fresh from the east, wrote his family, June 19, 1878; "Wolcott's Ranch is on Deer Creek about four miles from its mouth on the Platte, two tents and three dugouts complete the establishment." This would place it in the heart of the Fort Fetterman Hay Reservation which had been set aside by Military General Order No. 34 - 1867, for use exclusively as a hay reserve for the government and exempted from homestead entry by the public. The reserve took in most of the Deer Creek Valley, from the Laramie Mountain Range to the south, to its mouth where it enters the North Platte River to the north.

The cleverness of Wolcott's decision to locate there comes to light as the result of a law suit filed in District Court against William Briney and Joseph Long. His attorney, Charles N. Potter, petitioned that Wolcott was "...the owner of lands adjoining said reservation and had resided there ever since prior to the 30th day of July, A.D. 1877." He further claimed to have obtained an "Order" dated September 14, 1877 from the "Adjutant General of the Department of the Platte of the United States Army" which allowed him to fence the "Hay Reservation" and was granted "occupancy" in consideration for "protecting the same for the use of the government of the United States."

The Petition asked the court that Briney and Long be "...restrained...from constructing said ditch...", that the ditch was of such dimensions "...that cattle cannot cross from one side to the other." Col. Emerson Kimball, editor of the "Glenrock Graphic" newspaper, scoffed at "Lord Wolcott's" dilemma (the title Kimball derisively called him) for having cattle incapable of crossing a ditch which was actually only "three feet wide and one foot deep." ("Glenrock Graphic" July 18, 1890). In the same issue editor Kimball wrote about the federal troops being called in to tear down the fence the Major had erected around the "Hay Reservation," making suspect his claims previously made to the court.

Owen Wister, made famous later as author of "The Virginian," ventured west for the first time in 1885. His destination was the VR Ranch where he spent two glorious months hunting, fishing, riding "broncs" and generally sampling the ranch-life of the frontier west. On July 16 Wister wrote; "Today we've had the border element." Then he recited how settlers, Brannan and Beach, had "squatted on some land that had already been taken up and improved by Wolcott." Then he went on, "Today they started to dig a ditch." Wolcott tried to stop them without success, causing Wister to note; "Today the Major returned for his gun." The battle was heating up.

Now the Major changed his tactics. Wister overheard him say, "I'm Justice of the Peace and I'm thinking I'll have a little court on the premises." He was indeed the presiding J.P. and indeed he did hold court. Territorial records for 1884-86 and 1886-88 show Frank Wolcott as Justice of the Peace for "Deer Creek, Albany County, Wyoming."

Without Wister realizing it, much water had already gone over the proverbial dam. An anonymous writer told in detail of the incident; Wolcott first tried to run off Brannan and Beach, who were trying to homestead "...about four and a half miles from Wolcott's," which was far too close to suit the Major. For starters Wolcott claimed "...he owned the land." Unmoved, they ignored him and "...went to building their cabins." Wolcott sent a man named King to convince them to give up. They wouldn't. Since they had to hire out part time to ranchmen around the country to buy groceries and prove up on their homestead, Wolcott sought to dry up their income by having them "...blackballed by the Stock Association." If successful, no rancher would have been allowed to hire them (according to Wyoming Stock Growers by-laws). Next, "...he ordered them not to come down the Government Hay Road" (located on the hay reserve). Neither could they "...come over the Deer Creek bridges" (indicating that bridges had already been built to span the stream). As Postmaster of the Deer Creek Post Office, he steadfastly refused to give them their mail. Still determined, the homesteaders refused to leave. Exasperated beyond reason, Wolcott threatened Brannan in front of witnesses: "I'll kill you if you don't leave this place."

Wolcott filed suit in court "for damages" amounting to $500 each against both Beach and Brannan, despite what he had done to them. But try as he might, Wolcott couldn't run them off. Then fate played into Wolcott's hands.

Beach, in an unrelated incident, shot and killed a man named Locker. Contending he shot in self-defense, he rode directly for Fort Fetterman and turned himself in to the sheriff. Here was Wolcott's chance. He demanded that Beach be returned to him for trial as "...he wanted a whack at him." It was done. Now Judge Wolcott and a six man jury "...composed of three of Wolcott's men and three outsiders" would decide if the prisoner should be bound over for District Court. Hardly a comforting thought for Beach, considering the hearing was taking place in the front room of Wolcott's own home.

As the story goes, Wolcott felt the jury was deliberating Beach's fate longer than was necessary. He grew impatient, rushed up to the door (the jury was meeting in his bedroom) and demanded, "I'll give you five minutes to come to a decision, or get off from my ranch!" The vote came quickly; four to two that Beach be bound over for trial for manslaughter at Rawlins. Wolcott was furious. He felt Beach should have been tried for first degree murder. Bail was set at $1,500. Beach, of course, couldn't post bond and Wolcott had one more nuisance out of his hair.

A month before, John Clay, representing Scottish financial circles, negotiated the first of several loans with Major Wolcott. "It was in June 1885," he wrote, "...Wolcott showed me the spot where...he shot 20 bull elk, enough for his winter meat. We arranged a loan of $50,000 secured by the real estate and cattle."

Contrary to commonly held beliefs, this writer finds no evidence to support the belief that Frank Wolcott was manager" of the VR Ranch for British or Scottish interests until after he defaulted on his loans. On August 12, 1885 $50,000 was borrowed from a Scottish financier named Thomas Nelson. The mortgagor was listed as Frank Wolcott and Company. A second loan for $30,000 made the following year to build "a big ditch and purchase more land" was incorporated into the unpaid first loan, totaling $80,000.

Legal documents show the firm was "...composed of Frank Wolcott of Deer Creek, Albany County, Wyoming Territory and Robert W. Irvine, Tokyo, Japan." Mortgaged were "all the cattle branded VR, VR and VRV, on the left side, shoulder or hip." Irvine was again party to the $80,000 mortgage, dated May 1, 1886. On a bill-of-sale dated February 15, 1888 for "five hundred head of neat cattle" the firm of Frank Wolcott and Company again lists Robert Irvine as the second member of a "co-partnership."

Unfortunately, as John Clay recalled, "Then came the winter of 1886-87 and Wolcott practically went to the wall. His herd was cut in three. He had no earning power and at last he had to turn over his property to the Nelson Estate." Staggering losses or not, the Major never gave up. On August 6, 1887 he received a homestead patent for the NW $\frac{1}{4}$  of Section 5 of Township 33 N, Range 75 W, which he deeded in part to the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company "a strip of land...for a right-of-way." This is now part of the town of Glenrock. On February 21, 1889, Wolcott incorporated "The Tolland Company" with himself, his wife, Adelaide, and Stanley Harrington being issued one share of stock each. This corporation was doubtless set up to act as a shelter against the unpaid loans mentioned above.

The first three Converse County Commissioners were appointed by Territorial Governor Thomas Moonlight to serve from April 12 to May 18, 1888. An election was held; the first three elected commissioners of Converse County included George H. Cross, E. T. David, and Frank Wolcott who served from May 18, 1888 to January 7, 1889. Wolcott was defeated in his bid for reelection.

On July 1, 1891 Wolcott again mortgaged everything; cattle, horses, mules, real estate, personal property -everything. The Promissory Note, in favor of Thomas Nelson, had accumulated to a whopping sum of $131,427.14. He was unable to pay and with the death of Mr. Nelson in 1892 lawyers for his estate were inclined to commence legal action, but John Clay offered a suggestion. He felt it would be impossible to collect the money and eventually "...the properties were turned over" to the Nelson estate in lieu of foreclosure.

Like all the others, Wolcott was desperate. Such desperation became a contributing factor in triggering the Johnson County War. The Major was unusually vocal. He ranted and raved and eventually persuaded a substantial number of the largest ranchers in Wyoming to join him in a plot to wipe out suspected "rustlers" which had been placed on a "hit list" and were marked for "extermination."

Suffice to say, Major Wolcott received ample notoriety for his exploits. After the stockmen were placed under arrest by the military, telegrams flew hot and heavy between Buffalo and Cheyenne and Washington, D.C. as to what had happened and what to do to correct the situation. The official word was that Wyoming was in a state of "insurrection" and that "marshal law" should be declared. Military troops escorted the invaders by marching them to Douglas where they were placed on a train and returned to Cheyenne. During all of this, practically every telegram spoke of the "Wolcott party."

The whole affair turned out to be a disaster. But under the most humbling of circumstances, even while under arrest at Cheyenne, Wolcott continued to boast what the stockmen would do, even yet, once they had a chance. To one and all he became an embarrassment.

Federal troops were brought in and set up what became known as "Camp Suggs," located east of Buffalo. Gradually things simmered down. A law suit brought against the stockmen by Johnson County was dropped because the county ran out of funds. Wolcott, finding no more armies to lead, returned to Glenrock. But life for him would never be the same.

Of Wolcott's family, little evidence is found. John Clay in 1885 spoke of the family "Mrs. Wolcott (Adelaide) was a delightful woman, and they had a very interesting little daughter." Lucia G. Putnam wrote of how the VR was in 1889: "The day we arrived at Deer Creek where the big Wolcott Ranch lay was quite an event. We were invited in to the big low adobe house and served tea with little jelly tarts...The servants on that ranch were all Chinese. The Wolcotts had one little daughter. She and her mother and the child's governess were at the ranch that summer." Mrs. Wolcott played the organ and the Major was the first Sunday School Superintendent at the Christ Episcopal Church in Glenrock, which was built through the efforts of Major Wolcott in 1887. He and his ranch hands cut and hauled the lumber and built the church.

But those were the old days. Again, Malcolm Campbell tells of Wolcott leaving his buggy at the Glenrock Post Office while he went in to get his mail. "He came out and drove away. Unknown to Wolcott, while inside, someone removed the nuts from the axles. The Major went but a short distance when all the wheels fell off and the body of the buggy collapsed on the street."

The mighty Major had fallen. Scottish interest now owned his beautiful showplace. His dreams were shattered. And one of the most controversial, yet colorful characters to grace the pages of Wyoming's history, hardly mentioned in today's history books, slipped away into oblivion.

Wollen, Byron and Flora

Byron E. Wollen was born April 7, 1898 at Ceresco, Nebraska. Flora L. Boydston was born December 10, 1897 at Ceresco, Nebraska. They were married July 9, 1919 at their hometown of Ceresco.

Byron left Nebraska at the age of 20 and came to Wyoming to work for his cousin, Will Slater, in the freighting business at Slater, Wyoming. He was drafted into the army in November 1918, but was discharged immediately upon the signing of the Armistice on November 11.

He then returned to Wyoming with his future brother-in-law, Henry Boydston. They filed on adjoining claims to homestead 50 miles north of Douglas near the old Bill Post Office. Returning to Nebraska soon after, he married Flora Boydston, daughter of Charles and Flora Nash Boydston.

Their children were: Phyllis (Exley), Fay (Kolodziejczyk), Dorothy (Quillen) and Byron Eugene.

Byron worked for several of the ranchers in the area to make ends meet while the homestead was being proved up on. Flora taught school in the north country and in the county until her retirement at the age of 70.

When Flora's brother, Henry, decided to go back to Nebraska he sold his place to Byron and Flora. The property was to stay in the family's hands until 1982.

Byron remained a cowboy the rest of his life. He understood cattle and ranching and worked for several ranches. He participated in the last long cattle drive for

Fred Williams when they brought cattle from the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota to the Williams ranch near Douglas. He loved horses and swapped many a tale (and horse) with Dr. J. R. Hylton, who was his friend as well as our family physician for many years.

He was "caretaker" of the Thunder Basin Grazing Association Community Pasture, north of the Cheyenne River, for several years. He enjoyed working with livestock and his horses were a special pride. He always had good cow horses with lots of savvy. His son carries on this tradition.

Byron always loved Wyoming and never regretted his decision to live there. Flora was a bit apprehensive at the outset but by the time she got there she began to like it. Since she was an adventurous and dedicated teacher, she liked her pupils very much, and became a true pioneer. She wrote letters to her family in Nebraska telling them "hair-raising" tales of her adventures with rattlesnakes, cow midwifery, coyotes, gardening, teaching and raising the family on a homestead 50 miles from the nearest town. She nursed one child through a bout with polio and all four with various illnesses at times. Most of the time a doctor was not available and she coped with these things with the help of neighbors and her "doctor book."

In later years she moved into town so the older children could go to high school. She became involved in many things with teaching in country schools and her beloved First Baptist Church where she was organist and choir singer for more than 30 years.

Byron passed away July 17, 1965 and Flora lived to the age of 78 and passed away July 15, 1975.

Wright, Franklin Earl and Dortha

Dortha Burson and Franklin Earl Wright were married in Douglas, Wyoming by the Methodist Minister in 1912. Earl, as he was known, came to Douglas in 1911 with his brother to shear sheep. They sheared for Zimmerman, Moores, Smiths, and many more in the Douglas community. I remember him telling that one day he walked from the Bedtick place to the Zimmerman place, sheared 201 yearlings with hand blades, walked on into Douglas and bought groceries, and walked back out to his home on Bedtick.

Earl also played at the dances around the LaPrele community. Dortha accompanied him on the piano. He also barbered in Douglas with Fatty Hardenbrook.

Guy L. — born at Douglas, Wyoming 1913

Hazel — born in Casper, Wyoming 1915

Wright, George and Margaret

George Watts Wright was born on October 15, 1883 at Independence, Virginia to John A. and Laura Watts Venable Wright. His mother died when he was 25 days old. His father later remarried and the family lived at Battle Creek, Nebraska.

Margaret Ann Anders was born on March 4, 1885 at Creighton, Nebraska to Wm. T. and Katherine Smmeckpeper Anders. She grew to womanhood in this community and it was there she met George Wright who was known as Watt. He was assistant agent and telegrapher at Creighton for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company at this time. When they were married at Creighton on May 23, 1906, he was agent and telegrapher at Meadow Grove, Nebraska where Watt and Margaret established their first home.

In April of 1907 Watt came to Lost Springs, Wyoming as station agent and telegrapher, having accepted the job here since it payed $10 more per month on this division of the railroad than it did east of Chadron, Nebraska.

Margaret came out to Lost Springs in May of 1907 and they boarded with the Smith family until the railroad brought out a furniture car that was placed by the boxcar depot and this was their home for the next few years.

Margaret recalled that the train men would bring them fresh fruit and vegetables from Chadon as there wasn't a store or anything at Lost Springs as yet. Also, they would have to go to Douglas or Lusk by train to do their shopping and to get supplies.

Watt dug a small cave near the depot for storing their supply of potatoes and other food stuff and Margaret said one hot day in the summer she had gone to the cave carrying her parasol and gotten whatever she had gone for and on coming out of the cave was opening her parasol and it spooked some of the cowboys' horses. Being shy, she quickly retreated back into the cave until the cowboys and horses were out of sight.

When expecting their first child, Margaret's father wouldn't hear of his daughter giving birth so far from a doctor so consequently Margaret returned to Creighton, Nebraska for the birth of their son, Wilbur Frederick, on April 26, 1908. He was born in the same house where Margaret had been born. They returned to Lost Springs when Wilbur was about two months old.

In the fall of 1908 they decided to file on a homestead close enough to Lost Springs so Watt could walk back and forth to his job at the depot. In 1908 they could only file on 160 acres but shortly after they were allowed to take another 160 acres when the 320 acre homestead law went into effect and by isolating another 40 acres they could purchase it from the government for $3 per acre, which they did. Their homestead house, 12' by 24' two room frame building was built in the spring of 1909 and they and their infant son, Wilbur, moved onto the homestead. Water for drinking and cooking was carried home from the depot each evening as Watt walked home from work. Their home was about a mile from the depot. Water for washing, chickens and a milk cow was hauled from the creek.

The Wrights had intended to file and prove up on the land and then sell it but since they both liked it here they decided to keep the homestead and Watt eventually quit his job at the depot and did some farming and worked for ranchers in the area to supplement their living. A well was drilled near the house in about 1912.

When Lost Springs was incorporated in the fall of 1911 and the need for a Justice of the Peace came up, several of the town officials went to a judge at Douglas asking for one to be appointed saying, "We want Watt Wright" and the judge replied, "You'll get what's right." Everyone had a good laugh over that. Wilbur does not recall if his father did serve as Justice of the Peace.

A daughter, Dorothy Ruth, joined the family on December 17, 1912 but the family was saddened by her death on February 7, 1913. Her remains were taken to Creighton, Nebraska for burial in the Anders family plot. Another daughter, Margaret Dorothy, joined the family on May 5, 1914. Both daughters were born on the homestead.

By this time two more rooms had been added to the homestead house, but in 1916 the Wrights had a sale and returned to Creighton, Nebraska where Watt followed the carpenter trade for a time before returning to work as telegrapher and agent in Colorado for the Union Pacific Railroad. It was there that Margaret and Watt separated and Margaret, with her two children, returned to the homestead in late fall of 1919 to once again make their home. Along with taking in washing, raising chickens to sell and milking a few cows and raising orphaned calves, the little family made its living.

November 11, 1918 saw World War I come to a close and Margaret's youngest brother, August Anders, who had been wounded in France and after spending some time in army hospitals, came to Wyoming in about 1922 or 1923 to make his home with his sister and family. He was employed as a section hand for the Chicago and North-western Railroad and also took a homestead relinquishment of 40 acres about two miles west of Lost Springs so as to be able to walk back and forth to his job. He took his additional homestead of 320 acres some 20 miles north of Lost Springs. After proving up on his land he again made his home with his sister and family, still worked for the railroad and leased out his land.

Wilbur and Margaret Dorothy, known as Dorothy, rode a pony to school and it was kept in the Charles Hitshew barn during the day and later in a barn that had been built at the school. When children had completed the eighth grade those who could afford to go to high school had to board in Douglas to finish their education but in the fall of 1923 ninth grade was taught at Lost Spring and the tenth, eleventh and twelfth were added as the children progressed to them. Wilbur graduated with the first graduating class from Lost Springs High School on May 25, 1927. Classmates were Mildred Howell, Frances Hoge, Wayne McGrew and Herbert Rogers. There was one more graduating class from Lost Springs High School in 1928 and members of that class were Evelyn Gibbons, Anna Rueber and Harry Turner. (As of November 1983 we do not know what became of Evelyn Gibbons but do know that only Frances Hoge and Anna Reuber are deceased.)

During the summers Wilbur would work away from home so as to have money for clothing etc. for school and during the summer of 1925 he worked for neighbors to the east, the Wallace Ball family, and considered Mr. Ball his friend. In early 1926 Wallace lost his wife, Effie Sharp Ball, to cancer and sometime later, being lonely, Wallace and his daughter, Margaret Noreen would call on the Wright family to visit and later that year Wallace was courting Mrs. Wright. In June 1927 Wallace and Margaret Wright were married at Hot Springs, South Dakota and the family went to live on the Ball homestead some three miles east of the Wright place. During the summer of 1928, along with farming and ranching, Wallace and Wilbur dug out a basement under the Wright homestead house using a horse and slip and loading the dirt onto the slip and pulling it out with the horse. They also hauled sand from a draw west of town for making cement blocks which they laid up for basement walls and a 12' length was added to the house for a larger kitchen and another bedroom and the attic was made into two bedrooms. Later that year the family moved back to the Wright homestead.

Meanwhile, Dorothy had continued going to school at Lost Springs by riding back and forth with her uncle August as he drove to and from his job with the section. In the fall of 1930 Dorothy was ready for eleventh grade and as it wasn't being taught at Lost Springs anymore she rode with Margaret Noreen to catch the Keeline school bus to Manville. Margaret Noreen Ball had graduated from Manville High School in 1927 and having taken normal training was teaching school in the Niobrara County school system and at this time was teaching the Chalk Butte School northwest of Keeline. For her senior year at Manville, Dorothy drove her uncle's car to meet the school bus and when the weather became bad she boarded with Mrs. Mattie Hitschew in Manville, graduating in May 1932.

On April 7, 1932 the family was again saddened when August was struck by a car at their turnoff along the highway when returning home from work and was instantly killed. His body was returned to Creighton, Nebraska for burial in the Anders family plot.

In December 1932 Dorothy and Edward Hale of London, Kentucky, who was working in the area, were married. They were the parents of Wilma Dorothy in November 1934 and Norma Louann in March 1936. Edward farmed and worked some for ranchers and drove a school bus until ill health overtook him. He died in July 1938 and is buried in the Jireh Cemetery east of Keeline. In October 1939 Dorothy married Charles Maurice "Chuck" Walsh, and they farmed for a time in the Lost Springs area where a daughter, Thelma Maureen, was born at Lost Springs in August 1940. They then moved to a farm and ranch in the Glendo area and a son, Melvin Charles, joined the family in May 1943 and a daughter, Wyoma Jane, in September 1944. From here they moved to a ranch northeast of Manville in the late 40s and in January 1954 a son, Richard, was born. In 1969 Dorothy and Chuck divorced and Dorothy and Richard moved to Ft. Morgan, Colorado to make their home near her daughter, Wyoma, and family and where Dorothy still resides.

Margaret Noreen taught school for a number of years and then married Owen Stewart, a friend of Ed Hale who had come to Wyoming with him, and they returned to London, Kentucky to make their home. They were the parents of Betty Noreen in August 1935, Patricia in January 1937 and Wallace Owen in August 1938. Owen died in about 1943 at Wayne, Michigan where the family made their home. In November 1952 Margaret married Azril T. "Jack" Rippee in Michigan and they continued making their home there until both retired and they moved to Black Rock, Arkansas where Margaret died on October 27, 1981. She is buried at Walnut Ridge, Arkansas.

Wilbur worked for Art Meinzer at the Springs Garage for a time then farmed for himself and also worked on construction jobs and in the winter of 1935-36 attended Hemphill Diesel Engineering School at Los Angeles, California graduating in May 1936. He was then employed by Ross Construction Co. near Riverton, Wyoming for several years and later by them at Meeteetse, Wyoming where he was shop foreman and where he met Ada Lucille Niehaus, daughter of Powell, Wyoming homesteaders of 1908, Frank and Sarah Miles Niehaus from Missouri. Wilbur and Ada were married at Billings, Montana on June 2, 1939. Wilbur continued doing construction work as mechanic and shop foreman for a time and was also employed in the oil fields.

A son, Wilbur Dale, was born to Wilbur and Ada on September 13, 1940 at Powell, Wyoming and in November the family returned to the ranch at Lost Springs due to the ill health of Wallace who passed away on February 1, 1941. He is buried at Chadron, Nebraska beside his wife, Effie, in the Ball family plot. Wilbur and family continued making their home on the ranch which they operated for his mother.

In May 1948 a daughter, Zadah Ann, was born but the family was saddened by her death in March 1950. Dale attended school through the third grade at Lost Springs when school was discontinued and students were bused to Manville.

On January 1, 1951 Lost Spring became Lost Springs due to a change in name by the United States Postal Department. Due to the combining of school districts in eastern Converse County, the Lost Springs children were bused to Shawnee the fall of 1953 so Dale attended the eighth grade there. He attended high school at Lusk graduating in 1958.

On June 17, 1961 Dale and Joan L. Wintermote, daughter of Lester and Grace Wintermote, were married at Douglas. They are parents of Anita Jean, born in February 1964 and Todd Allen in May 1968 and make their home east of Douglas.

Wilbur and Ada continued ranching with his mother until her death on June 29, 1964. She is buried at Lusk next to her granddaughter, Zadah Ann Wright. Wilbur and Ada inherited the ranch and still make their home there where they continue in the ranching business.

Yardley, John and Eolyn

John Yardley was born in Pollock, Missouri in 1896. Eolyn Otella Boon was born in Alliance, Nebraska in 1905.

When John was 14 years old he hopped a freight train at Pollock, Missouri and came to Wyoming to work on his cousin's ranch at Buffalo, Wyoming. He stayed there working on the ranch until he entered the marines during the first World War in 1918. After returning from the war he worked in the oil fields in Midwest, Wyoming.

He met Eolyn Boon (a teacher) at a box social in Redington, Nebraska, and they were married in Colorado Springs, Colorado on January 20, 1926 and went to Borger, Texas where John operated a garage for a short time. While living in Borger their home was a tent behind the garage where Eolyn prepared their meals on a campfire.

They returned to Nebraska in 1926 and farmed around Broadwater and Crawford until moving to Converse County in 1939 where they made their home west of Douglas, doing some farming and dairying. While in

John Yardley 1954

Nebraska there were three daughters born, Lenore (1927), Pauline (1929) and Helen (1931.)

They moved to the Glenrock area in 1941 where they operated a dairy and shipped milk to Casper.

They purchased a place in the LaPrele community in 1944 and continued to operate a dairy until 1959 when they engaged in the sheep and cattle business. They summered their cattle on the Clausen ranch in the LaBonte area.

There were no improvements on the land at the time they purchased the place in the LaPrele community. A house was purchased in Lance Creek and moved to the home place. The rest of the buildings were built with the help of their daughters. In the spring of 1946 they lost their home and belongings in a fire and lived in a sheep wagon until a house was moved in from Midwest, Wyoming.

Due to health problems they had a farm sale March 10, 1973 and retired in Douglas.

John enjoyed wild game hunting and reading western stories.

Eolyn enjoyed her involvement with the LaPrele Homemakers Club which she belonged to for many years. Long winter evenings were spent playing cards with neighbors and social events at the LaPrele Hall.

John passed away in 1977 and Eolyn in 1983.

York, Henry and Elizabeth Family

Henry York was born on December 25, 1880 in Pleasant Hill, Missouri, the son of Jonathan and Isabell Petty York.

Elizabeth Elgin, daughter of Charles and Lucy Graves Elgin, became Henry's bride on November 19, 1902 in Jackson, Missouri. Elizabeth was born on March 11, 1882 in Rich Hill, Bates County, Missouri.

Coming to Wyoming in 1904 with his brother, Tom, Henry found work in the Lost Springs area. He returned to Missouri for the winter and returned to Wyoming in 1905 homesteading two miles southeast of Shawnee.

Henry and Elizabeth's children were: Gladys (b. 1910, d. 1923), Walter (b. October 25, 1911), Thomas (b. October 15, 1914, d. May 5, 1936), Adelia (b. 1916, d. 1917), Paul (b. May 26, 1919) and Evelyn (b. June 18, 1923).

The family moved several times from the time they came to Wyoming to homestead to allow Henry to provide a living for his family. They lived for different periods of time at various places; among them were the Tumble place, Keeper place, Hartshorn, Oklahoma (where Henry worked in the Rock Alley Coal Mine) and at the family coal mine north of Shawnee.

Henry died on June 18, 1952, Elizabeth on January 9, 1958.

Walter married Hazel Stock (see the Stock story).

Paul married Marian Rickabaugh, daughter of Clarence Rickabaugh.

Evelyn married Verne Anderson.

York, John and Verna Family

On October 13, 1890 John Earl, the seventh of nine children, was born to Isabell Petty and Jonathan York at Rich Hill, Missouri. May 3, 1920, he married Verna Ethel, daughter of Grace Em Davis and Martin L. Thompson of Mountain View, Missouri. The Thompsons, having come to Mountain View from Lebo, Kansas, the place of Verna's birth on November 9, 1902.

John and Verna were married in the Church of England at Grand Prairie, Alberta, Canada. They returned to the states a few months after their marriage.

While living north of Shawnee, Wyoming with brother, Tom, and family, a daughter, Grace Bell, was born on February 10, 1921. In March of that year, John worked in coal mines near Douglas, Wyoming. With the help of Cloe Hatfield, he built a reservoir south of Douglas. About Christmas time, John took a man's horses and his own team to north Missouri. He journeyed on to Anderson, Missouri to visit his sister, Lena White, and family, and a brother, Charley, at Coffeville. He returned to Wyoming where a son, Earl Howard, arrived on September 9, 1922. They lived on the Glenn Keeper place north of Shawnee until April 1924 when John and Verna loaded their possessions, two children and Alberta, a sister of Verna, in a covered wagon and set out for Anderson, Missouri. When going through Sidney, Nebraska, the team became frightened and ran away. After all the excitement of the runaway was over, they had to stay at Sidney, Nebraska to repair the damage.

While in Missouri a second son, Donald Lee, arrived. This time while in Missouri, John found work at a sawmill and later worked in coal mines in Hartshorn, Oklahoma. He gave up mining in 1925 and bought a farm near Anderson, Missouri. Yearning to be back in Wyoming he sold the farm, had an auction and returned in 1930 to Shawnee. By this time Verna's sister, Alberta, had married C. O. Boman. She remained in Missouri where she resides today in Seneca.

John worked various places and at a variety of jobs at whatever was available to support his family. One of his earlier jobs was helping construct the grain elevator at Shawnee. The elevator was a landmark for several years, until in 1982, when it was torn down by John's grandson-in-law, Dale Wright and his friend, Vernon Poage.

In 1930 the John York family moved to Glenrock where John and his brother, Henry, operated a coal mine north of Glenrock. Later that year they moved north of Shawnee and mined coal on land owned by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. John sold his interest to Henry and moved his family on a farm west of Shawnee, owned by Al Fero. They lived on rented farms for a while. In 1941 they purchased a ranch joining the town of Shawnee. From years of hard work and perseverance they were able to purchase several sections of land.

John and Verna left the ranch in 1953 moving to Douglas leaving the ranching to their sons, Earl and Donald. John maintained an active interest in the ranch until his death, December 5, 1967. Verna continued to live in the home they had purchased on South Sixth Street. She worked at the Converse County Hospital as a cook, work she enjoyed and where she had made many friends during her 15 years of service at the hospital. She passed away December 18, 1978 in the hospital.

Earl married Clara Hublein, daughter of John and Annie Hublein. They had three sons, Waldon, Bobby and Wayne and one daughter, Shirley (Lazure), who died on December 14, 1970. Earl married Dorothy McBirney Condray after he was divorced from Clara. Dorothy had been married to Robert Condray and was the mother of one son, Donald Lee, and one daughter, Donna Lou. Earl and Dorothy live on the home place at Shawnee where they have built a new home. Earl also works for the Converse County Road and Bridge Department.

Donald and his wife, Donna (Browning) have a beautiful home on their ranch seven miles east of Douglas, formerly belonging to Tom and Ann McCarty. Here they raised two sons, David and Jeff and four daughters, Connie (Bower), Margie (Marler), Sherrie (Santistevan) and Linda (Newton).

Grace with her husband, the late Lester Wintermote, their three sons, Allen, Vernon and Steven, and three daughters, Peggy (Middleton), Joan (Wright) and Sharon (Ferris) have made and still call home their headquarters near the old XH Crossing on Shawnee Creek.

York, Tom and Myrtle Family

Tom York was born in Pleasant Hill, Missouri on August 27, 1876. He was the son of Jonathan and Isabell Petty York, both of whom had also been born in Missouri.

Tom came to Wyoming soon after the turn of the century by train to visit his brother, Henry. Henry and his brother-in-law, John Swickhamer, were working at a coal mine near Lost Springs, Wyoming.

The family of Tom remembers an incident that happened to him when he first arrived in Lost Springs. It seems he went into a bar. "He was dressed in a suit and 'Caddie' hat. The men in the bar thought 'here is a number one tenderfoot' so one of the cowboys asked Cody Shippen to offer a drink to the newcomer and if he doesn't take it pour it on him. Cody offered the drink to Tom but brought the drink back to the barkeeper since Tom refused it. When asked why he didn't pour it on him, Cody remarked, 'I didn't like the look in his eye so I didn't want to rough him up'."

Tom and Myrtle Elgin were married on August 26, 1909. Myrtle and her sister, Blanche, had come to Wyoming earlier to be with their sisters, Mrs. John Swickhamer and Mrs. Henry York.

Tom and Myrtle had one daughter, Noma (b. December 14, 1910) and two sons, Jesse (b. June 23, 1915) and Robert (b. February 16, 1917). The morning Jesse was born Tom blew the whistle on the steam engine where he was working a long hard blast. Paul Miller said, "Tommy must have had a boy."

The Yorks filed on a homestead near Shawnee.

Like most of the homesteaders, Tom worked at any work in the area he could find. One place he worked was at a sawmill out of Douglas. He also had a threshing machine and threshed grain for neighbors in the area.

One harvest season, Tom and his brother, Henry, went to Montana to work during the season. They asked a wheat farmer for a job. The farmer asked to see their hands and seeing that they didn't have calluses, wouldn't hire them. Henry told the farmer "Tom's hands may not show it but he was a mighty good hand and knew how to run a steam engine." Needless to say they got the job and Tom ran the steam engine all season.

Myrtle was known for her baking powder biscuits. She sometimes made several batches during the day for neighbors, cowboys or anyone passing by who stopped to eat.

The family moved to a ranch north of Moorcroft in 1952.

The Tom York family was kind and helpful to their own family, friends and neighbors. Fred Smith once was heard to say, "Tom York would take the shirt off his own back and give it to someone he thought needed it."

Myrtle died on August 8, 1952; Tom on January 5, 1959.

Robert served his country in the Seabees during World War II. He lives with his wife, Donnie, on the ranch at Moorcroft.

Young, Andrew and Hattie

In 1919 Andrew Jackson "Dude" Young and his wife, Hattie Elizabeth Young sold their dairy in Drumright, Oklahoma. They set out for Wyoming in an old Model T touring car with their three children: Sylvia Ann, 15 years, Ralph Andrew, 13 years and Audrey Mertie, nine years. Hattie's parents, Thomas Andrew and Lucy Ann Young, with their two children, Clarence Andrew, 17 years and Birdie Irene, 15 years, accompanied them in their Model T Roadster. (Hattie's maiden name was the same as her married name.) The roads were only trails and muddy most of the way. They got stuck over and over again and since Audrey was the smallest, the rest would push and she would drive. She swears to this day that she drove most of the way from Oklahoma to Wyoming.

Their first introduction to Wyoming weather happened about ten miles north of Cheyenne. They were caught in a real blizzard and finally stalled completely. Dude and Clarence set out on foot and followed a fence line until they came to a gate. They went through the gate and were able to locate a house with a large barn. The people were friendly and the men brought a team and wagon to rescue the rest of the family. The people were very kind and kept our family for ten days before the roads were passable again. They slept in the hayloft and ate with the generous family.

They pushed on, fighting snow and mud, until they reached Lost Springs where Dude's brother, Frank, met them with a team and lumber wagon and took them on to the homestead, about 28 miles north of Lost Springs, in the Twenty Mile Community.

They lived in tents until the men could build a large log house and dig a well. They loved their new home, especially the children, as they had never been around so much snow before.

Thomas and Lucy Young and family did not stay long and soon returned to Oklahoma. Dude, Hattie and family remained on the homestead farming, raising cattle, chickens and pigs. Hattie always had a large garden and preserved food for the upcoming winters. She also had a large strawberry patch.

About 1920 Sylvia Ann married Ralph Glen Reed, son of Jacob and Nancy Reed. They homesteaded nearby and were blessed with three children: Ruth Faye, born in 1924, Donald Keith, born in 1927 and Marvin Glen, born in 1932. Ralph Reed was killed in a coal mine cave-in on December 23, 1932.

Dude and Hattie made many very dear friends during the years and attended the community church, picnics and barn dances. Dude was often asked to call the square dances.

Times were very hard and after they proved-up on the homestead they moved to Colorado where Dude had a team of Clydesdale horses and worked in construction until they had built up a "Grub-Stake" and they moved back to their "home" in Wyoming.

Ralph Andrew left Wyoming in the mid '20s and followed the circus for a while. He eventually ended up in Payette, Idaho where he met and married Nina Bias. They had one daughter, Barbara Ann, 1928.

Dude and Hattie (to the surprise of everyone) also had a daughter, Lucy Myrle, born in 1928.

Audrey Mertie married James Edward Porter in 1931. They had three children: Patricia Ann, born in 1932, James Edward Jr., born in 1936 and David Andrew, born in 1949. Patricia died in 1934.

About 1934 or 1935 Dude took a job at the Fiddleback Ranch, near Dry Creek, and his wife, Hattie, cooked for the hired hands. Things were going well for them until Lucy Myrle got scarlet fever. The owner of the ranch "let them go" because he was afraid the hired hands would contact the disease.

Finally in 1936 Dude, Hattie and Lucy Myrle moved to Douglas. Dude went to work for the PWA and Hattie managed what they called the "Pest House." It was a nursing home of sorts, where they sent people with contagious diseases so they wouldn't infect other people.

In later years Dude was foreman of a "Cricket Gang." The men formed lines and walked through the fields with sprayers to kill the crickets.

Sylvia married Marian Faye "Junior" Whiting in 1936. They had one son, Thomas Alvin, born in 1937. Junior died when Tommy was just a few months old.

Sylvia became very ill and she and her children moved to Douglas with her parents. She was bedridden about three years and died in 1941. Her four children remained with their grandparents until they were grown.

During World War II Dude worked as a guard at the Prisoner of War Camp west of Douglas. In 1946 Hattie died and Dude, Lucy Myrle and Tommy Whiting went to Brookings, Oregon to make their home with son, Ralph, and his second wife, Irene, (formerly Irene Hoffman, a sister to Harry Hoffman).

Lucy Myrle met and married John William Dawson there in 1946. They had one son, Richard Lee, born in 1947. Later Lucy married Fred Ireton.

Dude spent his remaining years visiting his children and grandchildren with frequent trips to Wyoming to visit family and friends. His home base was with Jim and Audrey Porter in Longview, Washington. His twin brother, Anderson, and another brother, Frank, lived nearby and they spent many enjoyable hours fishing and reliving old times.

Dude Young died at his granddaughter's home in Bonita, California in 1957. He was preparing for a trip back to Wyoming the next day.

Young, Ellen Family

Lancashire, in the northwest county of England, where Robert and Ellen Young lived, was a county of coal mines and knitting mills. Children started working at an early age — boys at nine years of age in the mines was not an unusual circumstance. Ellen, herself, had worked in the knitting mills at the age of eleven years.

A momentous decision to join relatives in the new world prompted Robert and Ellen to bring their families to join them. In 1883, steerage class, they covered the rough Atlantic Ocean, often locked below decks when storms were fierce. They had three children: John, the eldest; Salena, who wore kid leather shoes because of weak ankles; and Florence (born April 29, 1881) in wooden shoes. Florence was listed as the child of another couple, since only two children per family were allowed. Middle names were not commonly given to children.

Robert settled his family in Creston, Iowa, near his brother, who was a doctor. There, a son, Henry, was born, and Robert died of typhoid fever. With a family of four in a new country, the young widow worked. She was adept at many jobs, including sewing, janitorial work in schools and churches and also homes. She also served as a midwife, often receiving just a pretty plate from families who had no means to pay her. Young John quit school and went to work to help support the family.

Hearing of coal mines with better pay in Glenrock, Wyoming, and also having relatives there, Ellen moved her family. They settled in Sleepy Hollow. Ellen continued working to raise her family, with the help of John, who worked in the mines.

John later invested in sheep with his brother-in-law, Frank Rate, and secured land in the Big Horn Mountains. He never married. Ellen kept house (camp) for him in the summer when the sheep were on the mountain range. The nearest post office and general store was at Nowood, also Manderson. John gave up mine work when he had sheep. It was an enjoyable way of life, and both Ellen and John looked forward to the rough wagon trip taking them to the mountains. In the fall, they would gather the sheep and start down for lower country around Lysite and Lost Cabin, where they wintered. John never owned or had driven an automobile until after his mother's death. He bought this first car when in his late fifties, and such an erratic driver, honking at the crest of a hill, nearly stopping on the side of the road to let oncoming cars pass, and then speeding up! But in later years, he became accomplished enough at driving to travel to California, Washington, etc. without incident.

Ellen spent winters with her two daughters: Salena, at Lost Cabin, and Florence, west of Douglas. She loved travelling: with "me hat" and luggage she would go by train to California, Iowa, and Arizona. She rode a burro to the bottom of the Grand Canyon. She went back to England on the Lusitania, the last round trip the "Floating Palace" made before it sank in 1915. One of her greatest pleasures was hearing the great singer, Sir Harry Lauder, who was the ship's entertainer. She loved the Rose Parade at Pasadena. She had many friends, and letter-writing and walking were among her favorite pastimes. Her hands were always busy, sewing or crocheting.

Ellen gave up her home when her children were grown, but there are still relatives living in Glenrock. She died in September 1933 and is buried in the Glenrock cemetery.

Salena married Frank Rate, a sheepman. They made their home at Lost Cabin and had land in the Big Horns for their sheep. They had two daughters, both deceased now.

Henry and his wife, Grace, had one son, Robert. He worked at Casper, and they made their home there.

Florence received her education in Cheyenne and Fremont, Nebraska, and became a teacher. Often she was much younger than some of her pupils. She was a teacher at the Olin-Sullivan School in the mountains southeast of Glenrock. School was held in the summer time, as the winters were too harsh for the children to attend school. Then in the winter she taught in a school east of the Fetterman Station on the Northwestern Railroad. Riding side-saddle, she got to school from where she boarded with patrons. When she taught the Gore School, she and some of the pupils used a light buggy, which she drove, crossing the swift, swollen waters of the mountain streams. One time she had a run-away with the buggy overturning, and it injured her quite badly. She received commendations from the State Superintendent of Schools, then Mr. A.D. Cook, father of Mrs. William Smith.

Florence married Charles Slichter on October 31, 1905. (See Slichter, Charles and Florence story.)

Zaichkin, Peter and Anna Family

Peter (Pete) Zaichkin was born February 2, 1885 in Russia. He served in the infantry as a peasant in East Siberia. After he was discharged from the army he resided in the village of Piatnitskaya, township of Karacmayerski, county of Orlovskaya.

While Peter was in the service he was married to Anna Andre Pervix. He was discharged from the army on December 23, 1909 but stayed in the reserve army. Anna was born in the central part of Russia on February 2, 1887. She was about 17 when she married Peter.

Peter first came to the United States in July of 1913. He sailed by boat from Crimea. The passport cost 15 rubles. His second passport was dated February 1914. At this time he brought his wife, Anna, and their three children who had been born in Russia: Nicholas was born November 5, 1910, Mary was born March 24, 1912. They were both born in Kovnoc in Lithuania, Russia. Elizabeth was born in Karachev, near Orel, in White Russia on October 22, 1913. When they came to the United States, Nicholas "Nick" was three, Mary was one and Elizabeth was six months old.

Peter and Anna's first home was in Hemingford, Nebraska. Somehow, Peter had heard of Wyoming and decided that he wanted to settle here someday. Peter worked in Hemingford for several years and then homesteaded on King Creek with his brother, Constantine. While the family lived in Nebraska, a son, John, was born on November 15, 1915 and Paula was born on the Wyoming homestead on December 25, 1918.

The Zaichkins left Nebraska in 1917. Their daughter, Mary, remembers that they packed everything in a covered wagon. Peter and his brother, Constantine, had applied for a homestead south of Douglas. After arriving in Douglas, they traveled up Bedtick Road and by Sheep Mountain. Mary's first memory of this area was seeing a large flock of sage hens just as they topped the ridge.

Constantine and Peter built a two room shack for their first homestead. This homesite proved to be a mistake because they could not find water. Soon they moved the shack to another place and later built a log cabin. They dug a 40 foot well here. Their homestead had a garden, animals, etc. They dry farmed and raised chickens and turkeys.

The children started school at Poison Lake School. Their first automobile was a Model T Ford. If there was much of a hill they had to back up because it had a gravity flow gas tank and it would quit if they went the other way.

Once asked if there were many rattlesnakes on the homestead, John said "Yep, I have two cigar boxes of rattle buttons."

Pete worked for ranches and for himself until his death on June 21, 1950. His wife, Anna, passed away on January 21, 1949.

Mary married Adam Mueller March 30, 1929 at Table Mountain Ranch. This had been Adam Schmeidlein's place. Mary and Adam had three children: Babette was born March 11, 1930, Laurence was born March 4, 1934 and on December 16, 1939, Kathryn was born.

Adam's Uncle Schmeidlein owned the Table Mountain Ranch. When he died Adam inherited it. During this time of working and raising their family, Mary and Adam were involved with several community things. Mary belonged to LaPrele Homemakers, Farm Bureau and they participated in community affairs like plays, etc.

They made many trips to Casper selling chickens and turkeys. Many of these were sold to the Henning Hotel. During the next year they milked 26 cows and shipped milk to Casper.

When Babette was one and one half years old, their house caught fire and burned, destroying everything they owned. This was a terrible setback. Since it happened on December 17, 1932 it destroyed a doll house complete with little wooden furniture that Adam had made for Babette's Christmas present.

When asked what her worst memory was, Mary replied "Pumping water for the garden, and the house burning down."

Mary's goals were doing things that she liked such as gardening, reading and helping other people. Some of the things that stand out in her mind are: Money being short, but otherwise not too bad during the depression; having 1200 to 1500 chickens at all times; canning pickles, sauerkraut and smoking meat; eating a lot of "free meat" such as rabbits, pheasants, prairie chickens, fish and pork; the blizzard of 1949, when the national guard went out and helped people get food, etc; and having a lot of fun at parties that were held during this time.

Mary said that Mrs. David Roush had a great influence on her life because she taught her many things.

Adam died September 5, 1951. Mary married John Metcalf on April 23, 1955.

John's parents were Luella (Jones) and Edward Metcalf. Edward died on May 25, 1935. They homesteaded near Orin. They had twelve children. John died July 23, 1981 in a Cheyenne hospital. In 1985, Mary married George Carothers.

Elizabeth married Lyle Hildebrand, son of Fred W.A. Jr. and Ada Pexton Hildebrand on April 12, 1945. They have three children: Jeneva, Ann (Rex) and Fred. She worked for Jennie Chamberlin before serving in World War II as a WAC. After her marriage to Lyle she worked for Jennie again until Jennie's death. She also worked for Albert Sims until his death. Lyle was hit by lightning while windrowing hay south of Douglas. He survived the incident but was burned very severely. He died on March 10, 1979.

John worked as a roughneck and ranch hand and is retired now. He was married to Edith Horton Young.

Paula was a housewife and waitress.

Cole Creek Wreck

The water snatched at her clothing. Her head reeled and sand filled her ears. He pulled her with him as the churning water swept them away in the darkness. The rain was of no consequence in the raging torrent but the brilliant lightning flashed across the September sky and gave them glimpses of their plight. The swirling maelstrom carried the pair toward the Platte River just a few hundred yards away.

Then, all at once, it tossed them into a shallow bay, carved out by the overflowing stream. H.M. Gallagher and Mrs. Nicholas Schmidt still clung to each other as they wandered through the cold stormy night, attracted by the bleating lullaby of bedding sheep. The shepherd clothed and warmed them at his camp and they told him how their train had plunged into Cole Creek.

Gus Phillips felt himself hurled from his seat in the smoking car. Rain pelted him and clouds of steam enveloped the hissing train as it shuddered and fell from the splintered trestle into the black night. Time halted. The jagged lightning revealed a scene of horror; the huge locomotive sliding from the collapsed bridge into foaming water was followed by the smoking car, mail car and chair car, leaving a Pullman teetering at the shattered edge. Lights were extinguished. Heat swiped at his face as he tumbled about in the dark. Climbing and scrambling over the tangled wreckage Phillips staggered through the rain to Lockett where section foreman Keline administered to his injuries and reported the tragedy. Simultaneous reports were made that night, September 27, 1923, by Dan J. McQuaid and Casper businessman, Henry Wyatt, passengers who also escaped and managed to swim, wade and walk to safety. The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy train number 30 from Casper to Denver had wrecked.

The drizzle that began at noon on Thursday had changed to heavy rain and thunderstorm by eight o'clock.

At Casper's Burlington Depot only 66 tickets had been sold for the Denver run, the smallest passenger list in many years.

Ed Spangler, a dedicated and respected freight engineer would replace the assigned engineer, Roy Jackson for the scheduled 8:30 p.m. run. Jackson laid off after he brought in number 29 Thursday morning. The storm was intensifying and had already closed some roads in the area when the locomotive and seven cars departed from Casper on time.

The continuing rains were causing a high run-off. Every dry gully was a running stream and Burlington personnel carefully checked the tracks. In the Cole Creek drainage area water tumbled from the north country into the Platte River as roadmaster Haygood took his work train over the route just northeast of Glenrock. Inspecting the tracks and bridge he reported an unusually large volume of water with conditions satisfactory despite the weather. Engineer Spangler was informed of the findings and advised to "take it slow."

Section foreman H.G. Keline and his work gang had also passed over Cole Creek, walked the tracks and inspected the wooden trestle spanning the draw. He found conditions to be good with water depth in the creek less than 16 inches. There was no evidence that the rain was having any effect on the safety of the structure.

But at a quarter past nine, reports of a train wreck had reached Glenrock and the dispatch office in Casper. The news was flashed across movie screens and over radio stations throughout the area. The worsening weather, the isolated location and darkness slowed rescue efforts. Before morning, a rescue train arrived and people came by all possible means to assist.

The rain continued. Roads in the area became impassable with stalled vehicles and washouts. Rescue operations, which had been hampered by darkness, improved with illumination from the light of the rescue train only to be halted again by a flash flood as Friday morning dawned. Water and sand poured into the wreckage totally burying the engine and the smoking car.

Despite this agonizing setback, determined workers intensified their efforts. One young volunteer from Casper, M.M. Gray, arrived at the crossing before five o'clock Friday morning. Young Gray, fearing that his father had perished in the crash, was an inspiration to all who came to help. He braved the swift cold water again and again to rescue survivors from the chair car. Risking his own life, he gave encouragement to the hopeless and exhausted victims as they awaited help. Barely escaping death themselves, a Burlington conductor, a passenger named Robinson and a porter on car number 20 joined Gray in pulling people from car number 19 as it too, finally slid from fractured timbers into the watery grave.

Another of the volunteers who worked diligently at the scene was the father of mail clerk, W.E. Hinrichs. For days these folks stayed, working beside railroad derrick crews. Medical personnel and relatives of the victims offered their services to treat and transport survivors. Others helped in the difficult and heartbreaking recovery of bodies or personal property while some worked to sandbag the upper portion of the site. Despite these heroic efforts, casualties mounted and it was soon apparent that this would be the worst train wreck in the history of the Burlington system.

A three-man coroner's jury convened on Saturday, October 6, in Douglas and traveled 37 miles where the hearing was resumed at the site of the wrecked train. After hearing testimony from as many as 15 witnesses the jury concluded that the Cole Creek train wreck was accidental and unpreventable. More than a month later, the Interstate Commerce Commission inspectors reported that there were no defects in any Chicago, Burlington and Quincy equipment. But October 20, 1923, the Burlington's tenth anniversary of service from Casper, was observed by the solemn arrival of the company's claims agent, R.W. Gaines. He joined general manager, Edward Flynn, already at the scene, and began settlement of damage claims.

An Arkansas man, Gus Phillips, who was still in Glenrock recovering from burns received when he was thrown from the careening train, was awarded the first settlement of $3,875.00, "The largest I every obtained out of court," according to John D. Dawson, Phillips' attorney.

The grim search for missing victims continued as the railroad made settlements of almost $60,000.00 to survivors and heirs of the known dead. By the end of November, 21 bodies had been recovered and identified. One unidentified body was buried in Glenrock and ten persons were listed as missing. Chicago, Burlington and Quincy began settling claims for missing passengers presumed dead.

In December, as 1923 came to close, the Pullman Company, manufacturers of sleeping cars involved in the Cole Creek disaster, honored two Burlington employees for heroism. Conductor L.D. Coburn and porter D.L. Littleton received rewards of $1,000 each.

M.M. Gray quietly left the scene when railroad derricks arrived and took over rescue and recovery operations. William E. Hinrich's father and a brother accompanied the mail clerk's body to Cheyenne for burial. Mrs. Nicholas Schmidt returned to Douglas to bury her husband and H.M. Gallagher continued on his interrupted trip home to Denver. M.A. Robinson, whose wife had to be hospitalized in Casper, remained at her bedside to await the birth of their child.

The bodies of two more Burlington employees would eventually be recovered. Conductor Guy Goff's body was discovered on May 29, 1924 when it washed up on an island in the Platte River and Edward Spangler's body was at last recovered when workmen building the new Cole Creek Bridge found it on January 22, 1925. Another body discovered at the construction site five months later could not be retrieved before the muddy spring run-off reclaimed it.

Railroad crews remained at Cole Creek for many months. The powerful one hundred ton engine had to be freed from the grip of the sand with the aid of picks and hammers. Then it and the damaged cars were moved to Denver for repairs costing nearly $98,000.00. A new bridge was constructed at the site and the renovated locomotive was returned to service on its regular evening run from Casper to Denver. But the human anguish along the route would continue long after searchers gave up their searching and bereaved families received claim settlements.

In Converse County alone, five lives were lost, including those of Nicholas Schmidt, Mrs. Minnie Owens, Charles A. Guenther, Edward F. Hines and J.P. Jensen. Miss Eva Boyer, Glenrock, Mrs. Nicholas Schmidt, Douglas and John Christie, Parkerton all survived the tragedy.

Fiddleback Ranch

The Fiddleback Ranch had its beginnings in the late 1800s. It touched many lives in Converse County until its demise in the 1940s.

George H. Cross Sr. tells how the ranch came to be in his memoirs. "The Taylor brothers established their Fiddleback Ranch north of Fort Fetterman, where they ran several thousand head of cattle. However, they sold out a year or so afterward to Dr. Hoff, the army surgeon and Ephriam Tillotson, sutler at Fort Fetterman."

The Converse County Courthouse records show the following transactions for the land where the Fiddleback Ranch buildings are located: February 27, 1890 - Joseph Pfeifer (F. Rec.), July 4, 1890 - Ephriam Tillotson (W. D.), June 1, 1906 - C. W. Ford (W. D.), July 30, 1906 - William Howe (W. D.), and February 1, 1944 - Mortons Inc. (W. D.).

Also on record at the courthouse are the incorporation records as follows: July 30, 1906 - capital $50,000 - Shareholders: Victor L. DeMott, William G. Howe and Otto H. Bolln. July 9, 1909 - Shareholders: William G.

Howe, 477 shares, Victor L. DeMott, 240 shares, Martin Madsen, one share and Roscoe Crary, one share. The July 9, 1909 entry was for 1488 acres of deeded land, 9500 sheep, 200 sacks of wool and horses and cattle. The value put on items were $20,000 on the land, $55,466 on the sheep, $15,375 on the wool and $3,000 on the horses and cattle.

By 1910 a major change of ownership came to be and is evident by the records which show that the Mountain Home Company became the majority stockholder. The records show the following: May 5, 1910 - Roscoe Crary, one share, C. J. Crary, one share, Mountain Home Company, 1,133 $\frac{1}{3}$  shares and Victor L. DeMott 666 $\frac{2}{3}$  shares.

At this point it is of importance to find out who owned the Mountain Home Company and how it came to be. On March 7, 1899 the Mountain Home Sheep Company was incorporated with Noah Young, John A. McDermott, Per Olson and John Heller putting in $5,000 a piece to get things started. By November 10, 1906 Roscoe Crary had entered the picture with a new company being started. It was called the Mountain Home Company with capital listed as $100,000 with Roscoe Crary, Ayres C. Scully, and Charles F. Maurer as stockholders.

The Mountain Home Company had its headquarters located west of Glenrock on the North Platte River. A big two-story white house was the residence of its manager, "Mountain Home" Smith. Smith's proper name was Edward W. Smith, his wife was Henrietta. (For more on the Smiths see their story in this book.)

The owner of the Fiddleback Company and its vast empire in Converse County was Roscoe Crary. Mr. Crary was born on April 21, 1867 in Hancock, New York. He came to Chicago in 1892 to serve as general sales manager for the United States Leather Company. He and his father had been pioneers in the leather business in the east and their interests were sold to the United States Leather Company. Crary also had extensive lumber interests. With the late John J. Mitchell he helped to organize the Texaco Corporation. He was a close personal friend of President Grover Cleveland and his son.

Mr. Crary died on April 2, 1937 in Chicago.

It is of interest to note that Henrietta Smith's brother,

George Mohr, was the manager of the Fiddleback Company on Cheyenne River. He assumed the position from Mr. Gleason. George Mohr's son, Carroll, assumed the position upon his father's death in 1923. (For more on the Mohr family see their story.)

By the time Roscoe Crary disposed his sheep interests in 1931 the Fiddleback and Mountain Home Companies had holdings of around 70,000 acres including land on Cheyenne River, Box Creek, Dry Creek, Fort Fetterman ranch on Lower LaPrele Creek, Sand Creek (north of Glenrock), lands north of the home place on the Platte River and lands south of the place on the river going into the mountains around Deer Creek.

The lands were leased to various leasees: Hugh Duncan and Dr. J. R. Hylton got the lands north of Glenrock, Mart Madsen Sheep Company received the lands on Dry Creek and Carroll Mohr leased the Cheyenne River and Box Creek properties.

In 1944 the lands were sold with Mortons Inc. getting the Cheyenne River portion, Carroll Mohr buying the Box Creek end, Elmer Cowell purchased some of the lands north of the Glenrock ranch and Herman Werner getting the majority of the remainder. Bob Boner and Marty Tillard own some of this today. The Valentines purchased the home place on the Platte River. The Jake Johnson family owns the Box Creek lands today.

LaPrele Irrigation Project

The LaPrele Irrigation Project was first conceived in the mind of one of the pioneer surveyors, Albert M. Crafts, who was never able to secure capital for its construction. The project was finally promoted and constructed by Dr. J. M. Wilson, W. F. Hamilton and B. J. Erwin who, in 1905, organized the LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Company. The first surveys were made in the fall of 1905 and construction was started under the direction of Frank C. Emerson in the fall of 1906. The contract for construction of the main canal was awarded to Pat O'Connor at 14 cents per cubic yard and was practically completed during the years 1906, 1907 and 1908. Tunnel Number One of the main canal, which is 800 feet long, was constructed on contract by Heller and Olsen of Glenrock, and the Sand Creek Flume was built by John LeBar and Fred Syphers. This flume, nearly 400 feet in length, was later replaced with new iron and reduced to a length of 278 feet.

The main or east side canal irrigates about 8,000 acres of land between LaPrele Creek and the town of Douglas and has a capacity of 170 cubic feet per second. The west side canal was built by small contractors. The tunnel of this project was 1,660 feet in length. This ditch irrigates about 3,200 acres of land, on the west of LaPrele Creek, and has a capacity of 50 cubic feet per second. The total project has about 55 miles of laterals in the distribution system.

The project has a direct flow appropriated from LaPrele Creek, which is supplemented by storage of 20,000 acre feet of water in the LaPrele Reservoir and a second supplemental right from the following sources: Rocky Ford Creek, Gould Creek, Reid Creek and Wagon-hound Creek. The ditches connecting these creeks were built in 1934 and 1935. They have a total length of five miles and a capacity of 100 cubic feet per second.

The LaPrele Dam was constructed by Ambursen Hydraulic Construction Company of Boston, Massachusetts, with N. R. Willard as engineer, except for the top 40 feet which were built under direction of Pat Mulcahy without engineering supervision. It is of concrete and what is known as the Ambursen or hollow type. It is 325 feet long, 137 feet high and the face is five feet thick at the base and has a slope of 12 to 14 supported by piers 17 feet from center to center, which are also five feet thick at the base and 14 inches thick at the top. It has five, 17 foot spillways which have a depth of five feet. The dam was built during the years 1907, 1908 and 1909. The cost of the dam, including rights-of way for the reservoir, was about $650,000 and the cost of ditches, diversion works, rights-of-way, etc. was approximately $350,000, making the total cost approximately $1,000,000. Approximately $2,000,000 additional was spent on power development, etc., which was abandoned.

Before completion of the irrigation system, however, the LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Company was absorbed by the North Platte Valley Irrigation Company which planned to irrigate an additional 10,000 acres adjacent to the original area plus 40,000 acres north of the North Platte River near the town of Glenrock. The latter area was to be irrigated by pumping from the North Platte River. The company constructed the powerplant, pumping plant, and poles for a portion of the transmission line required, but did no work on the proposed distribution system. In 1912, soon after completion of the above works, the company went into receivership. Approximately ten years later the panel boards, switches, transformers, generators and miscellaneous equipment in the power plant and pumping plant were removed and shipped to a firm in Denver.

The receiver operated the unit until August 1918 when it was purchased by the Douglas Reservoirs Company for $150,000. In the following year storage of 20,000 acre feet of water was first permitted in LaPrele Reservoir when a settlement was reached with a landowner for right-of-way for the upper portion of the reservoir basin. In May 1919 the Douglas Reservoirs Company and the State of Wyoming entered into a contract for ultimate conveyance of property and transfer of contracts and administration to the project settlers. More capital was invested in order to make necessary repairs to the canals and irrigation structures which had not been properly maintained during the period of receivership. The unit was then accepted by the government as complete under the provisions of the Carey Act. In 1923, after first receiving the balance due on existing water rights and selling additional rights for $30 per acre, the project was turned over to the Douglas Reservoirs Water Users Association which had been organized to administer the system for the project settlers.

Quite an extensive study was made of the dam and the existing project from 1948 to 1951 by the Bureau of Reclamation. In 1948 there were 75 families living under the project with 11,700 acres irrigated.

The project had been operating under restricted winter storage regulations since 1925 and created a water shortage half of the years up to 1948. These restrictions were lifted in 1956. However, due to drought conditions through the 1950s there was an inadequate water supply. This, along with restricted storage, failed to provide the project with adequate water.

Several proposals developed over the years included: Bringing water over from Boxelder Creek, pumping water from the North Platte River, or turning the project over to the Bureau of Reclamation. None of these proposals became a reality and the project continued with only improvements made in distribution systems with various methods developed to distribute water with a minimum loss.

In the 1970s the Board of Directors developed a plan with the Panhandle Eastern Pipeline to assist in renovating the dam. As a result of this agreement, about 4.5 million dollars was spent by Panhandle Eastern to repair the dam, to build a new spillway and to completely reface the dam. This work was done in exchange for one fourth of the water stored each year to go to Panhandle Eastern for their various projects. These improvements have put the project in a more favorable position for water storage and improved water supply for the project.

The LaPrele Project has had quite an economic impact on Converse County through the years. In the earlier years there were some sugar beets raised but the project has historically been a grain and hay and livestock type of agriculture with many farmers and ranchers successfully raising their families on the project.

Many of the original farming units have been combined and are now under one ownership, making fewer individual operators with larger operating units. Also some units have been subdivided and the total population in the area is larger than the original project.

Leadership in management is vested with the Board of Directors. This board has been characterized by hard working, dedicated individuals who have worked diligently to maintain a successful operation. Some of these early directors were: Dick Maurer, Judge Brown and Oscar Carlson. Others who devoted many years of service on the board were: Irving Carlson, Henry Gedney, Adam Mueller, Carl Engdahl, Harold Blackburn, Lee Moore, Lloyd Beach, Bill Barber, Jim Stephens, Grover Gallagher and Walt Busch. Oliver Roush served many years as project superintendent and Clark Bishop was a project engineer for ditch layout. The present board of directors are: Leon Chamberlain, Andy Moore, Walt Nicholson, Dick Strock and Mike Anderson.

The project has seen many changes through the years, but the original dam is still in place and continues to serve its purpose. Much of the land ownership has changed since the beginning but the LaPrele Project continues to function as an integral part of Converse County agriculture.

Lightning Creek Fight

Lou Cook, Pioneer Rancher
Recalls Lightning Creek Indian Fight in 1903

(Editor's Note: A Pioneer Sheepman of Douglas, Lou Cook, who was ranging his sheep in the locality of the Lightning Creek Indian fight which took place on Big Lightning Creek in Converse County, October 31, 1903, relates the following incidents from memory.)

On Big Lightning Creek at Jake Mill's cow camp and sheep corrals, we had finished working Jake's and my sheep Friday night. There were twenty of us including the herders and other help. Saturday morning we left with our sheep. Ed Hunter, one of the help, returned Sunday morning; he had heard shooting the evening before. Eagle Feathers was Chief of the band of Sioux Indians. The Indians were illegally hunting antelope and stealing from sheep wagons of outfits that were ranging in the southern part of Campbell County and the northern part of Weston County.

It was Friday, October 30th, that Sheriff Miller and two deputies overtook these Indians. There were two bands, and they were camped twelve miles north of the Fiddleback Ranch on the Cheyenne River. Miller informed Eagle Feathers (known as Smith by the whites and who was a graduate of Carlisle College in Pennsylvania and could speak good English) that he had a warrant for the arrest of him and his outlaw band. When Eagle Feathers conveyed this information to the band, the bucks immediately surrounded the sheriff and his deputies. The Indians protested that they had done nothing wrong and they asked to be left alone. Knowing that he was outnumbered, the Sheriff with his deputies, proceeded to the Fiddleback Ranch where they spent the night.

On the morning of the 31st, one band of Indians headed toward Newcastle and the other south. At the ranch Sheriff Miller told Johnny Owens and Frank Zerb what had happened. (Johnny Owens was an old-time law enforcement officer who had killed a dozen or more men in the line of duty.) These men joined the posse.

The posse saw the Indians a half-mile above the ranch going south up Lake Creek toward Dry Creek where they crossed at the Alex Ferguson Ranch. When the posse arrived at the Ferguson Ranch they were joined by Louie Falkenberg, a ranch hand who knew the trails to the cow camp.

Foster Rogers, who now owns the Rogers Drug Store in Lusk, was holding some of the sheep that had been cut out at the corrals. Rogers saw the Indians with twelve wagons and 140 ponies coming down Lightning Creek. When the Indians arrived at the pasture gate, Chief Eagle Feathers, who was in the lead, dismounted to open it. The posse was located in the creek bottom where they had selected cover. Miller emerged from cover and demanded of Eagle Feathers that the Indians surrender, but instead they started shooting. Louie Falkenberg was killed and Sheriff Miller mortally wounded in the battle. Rogers, who was coming to the corral with the sheep, hid behind a big greasewood and watched the Indians who ran past him toward the creek crossing. According to Rogers, the Indians had one wagon with a hind wheel missing which had been repaired by the use of a pole extending from the front axle to the rear. This wagon was hurriedly unloaded at the creek where it was abandoned. They then retreated to the divide between Twenty Mile and Lightning Creeks where additional property was abandoned. The dead Indians were Grey Bear, Black Kettle, and Grey Bear's boy.

Sheriff Miller was taken to a cabin where he died that night. After the battle, while enroute to the cabin, Foster Rogers came upon Eagle Feathers and family. Both the Chief and his Squaw were wounded and were taken to the cabin. At the cabin Eagle Feathers begged his daughter for a gun with which to kill Johnny Owens. Miller's body was in the adjoining room and was taken to Newcastle Sunday by Loren Thayer.

Steve Franklin, one of Jake Mill's cowboys, rode all night and arrived in Lusk early Sunday morning with news of the battle. He first related what had happened to Ral Collins, who was invoicing the merchandise in the Baker Store. Speaking in a low tone, he did not immediately arouse Collins' interest. However, he soon surmised that something was wrong and questioned Franklin who again related his story of the battle. Collins then awakened the C.&N.W. station agent and wired Sheriff McDermott at Douglas about what had happened.

Deputy Williams and John Morton left at once, followed later by John Steffen and other Douglas people. Morton told me later that when they arrived, there was no sign of life, but on Twenty Mile divide they found the supplies that had been abandoned by the Indians, among which was a nose bag with the "Picture Frame" brand of the Morton Sheep Company on it. There were also groceries and other supplies that had been stolen from sheep camps in the locality.

Sunday morning at about ten o'clock, a party enroute to Lusk met a wagon driven by Indians which had a wounded Indian lying on the load. Indians attending the burial ceremony at the State Fair about five years ago informed me this Indian died before they reached the reservation.

Ed Hunter, who is at present working for the town of Douglas, says that later an Indian came and picked up what was left of the food and equipment they had abandoned. Ed said there was a ton or more of jerky dried meat the Indians gave him — about 200 pounds of which proved to be beef as well as antelope.

On Monday I made a trip to the battle ground to look for something to keep as a remembrance of the battle, but the Douglas gang had taken everything loose. However, I did find a very nice peace pipe made from red popstone in a pillow of antelope hair that was under the head of Chief Black Kettle whose remains had not yet been buried. This pipe, with the stem, measures about eighteen inches. It was donated by me to the Wyoming Pioneer Association and is with their collection of pioneer relics at the Pioneer Museum in Douglas.

Nineteen of the Indians, consisting of nine bucks and ten squaws, were captured near Edgemont, South Dakota by a posse headed by Lee Mather of Weston County. Sheriff McDermott, of Converse County, brought them to Douglas where they stood trial for the murder of Miller and Falkenberg. Ben Wheelock, who was the interpreter at the trial, told me later that they were unable to find any evidence that would associate any of them with the killing, and they were turned loose. The names of the nine bucks were: He Crow (Chief), Iron Shield, Red Pin, High Bull, Broken Nose, High Dog, James White Elk, Charge Wolf, and Jesse Little War.

Five of us are living at the present time who were at the Jake Mill cow camp when this battle took place. They are Foster Rogers, Gus Cook, Ed Hunter, Roy Brenning and myself.

At the request of my friends, I have assembled the foregoing information as best I could from memory.

Wyoming State Fair

"Wyoming's state fair had its inception from an industrial exhibition held in Casper in the year 1904."

That is what the late Senator Robert D. Carey said in an article written of the fair in an issue of the Douglas Enterprise some years back.

"The old wool warehouse in Casper was the exhibition hall and a race track east of Casper provided the location for the race program," the article by the late ex-governor and senator revealed.

In 1905, through the efforts of the late J. M. Wilson of McKinley, a bill was introduced in the legislature creating a Wyoming State Fair Board of five members, to be appointed by the governor, and Douglas was designated as the place for holding an annual state fair.

The Converse County legislative delegation, consisting at that time of Lyman Cooper, who was the speaker, J. T. Williams, representative in the senate, and John Morton of Douglas and Thomas Bell of Lusk in the house, were able to get the bill through.

The measure called for an appropriation of $10,000 and this amount was duplicated by Douglas residents for expenses for the first two years. The 1906-1907 legislature appropriated $15,000.

Wilson was elected president of the first fair board, and the Northwestern Railroad donated the fairgrounds, on condition that a fair be held in Douglas each year.

The first fair was small, but those interested were satisfied and felt it was a success.

The legislature was not too liberal; it was necessary to erect buildings and fix the grounds and when the fair was over, the board was in debt.

At this point it became necessary for Douglas citizens to guarantee notes at the banks in order to meet outstanding bills.

When Carey became president of the board, he found that the two years' appropriation had been expended by the former board, but they were not to blame as the appropriation was too small. In order to conduct the fair, it was necessary for Douglas citizens to contribute funds to the amount of $4,000 and which was used to hold the fair, although there was a deficit of about $1,000. Again the citizens of Douglas signed notes, trusting the legislature would reimburse the banks and it did.

The deficit worried Carey who said, "Later when one of the fair boards came to Cheyenne when I was governor asking for an additional appropriation to meet a deficit of about $50,000, I felt that I was somewhat of a 'piker' to have worried about the $1,800 deficit. The fair deficit became so regular and apparently so impossible to avoid that the legislature in 1921 put the management of the fair under the jurisdiction of the State Board of Charities and Reform, either considering the fair a charity or an institution that needed reforming because of its deficits."

Speaking of the first state fair in 1905, M.C. Barrow, early day publisher of "Bill Barlow's Budget," had the following to say in his October 11, 1905 issue:

"Well, to begin with, the weather was perfect, as though made to order—bright sunshine, warm, and but little wind. The attendance, estimated at about 2,500, possibly a little more than that..."

"The best of order prevailed during the entire four days. There was plenty doing each day, uptown, on the grounds each afternoon and at night a half dozen attractions served to keep everybody amused and entertained according to his or her inclinations.

"The big show was all of that...only five ladies entered the relay race: Miss Maggie Reid of Douglas, Mrs. Guy Newell of Springhill, Mrs. Mott Quest of Newcastle, Mrs. William Irwin of Cheyenne and Mrs. Sturgeon of Casper.

"Refusal on the part of the committee to permit her to ride two of the horses she had brought here for the purpose and the fact that she was thrown twice the first day, resulted in the withdrawal of Mrs. Irwin; later Mrs. Sturgeon also withdrew.

"The race was not decided until the last day and was won by the Converse County Champion, with Mrs. Newell a close second, and Mrs. Quest, third. Miss Reid (Mrs. W. H. Bolln) received $375 in cash, the $400 piano given by the city of Douglas, the loving cup given by the 'Denver Post,' one pair of blankets, five pounds of creams, and a handsome cut glass prize offered by J. J. Steffen and valued at $25.

"Mrs. Newell received $355 in cash, a pair of blankets and the cream and sugar set given by the 'Cheyenne Leader'. Mrs. Quest received $230 in cash and a set of solid silver teaspoons."

In preparation for the 1905 opener, the Douglas

Construction Company bid less than $5,100 to build a grandstand with a roof, an exhibition hall, two horse stables, one cattle and one sheep shed, a poultry house and two thirds to three quarters of a mile of board fence. The grandstand, with a roof, at a $500 cost, hardly proved to be a bargain. Originally facing west into the afternoon sun, experience and public opinion necessitated it being moved in 1906 to the west side of the track facing east.

Entertainment at these early fairs always included horse races (relay races, trotting races, and a wild horse race, etc.). Rodeos also were held at some fairs. Boxing matches were a feature of several early fairs, as well as, baseball tournaments and many other types of entertainment. State and Federal troops were in camp north of the fairgrounds and the ninth cavalry band entertained in 1911. Billy Fisher's "Ideal Theater" was also entertaining crowds with silent motion pictures in the evening.

The crowning achievement of the 1913 fair was the new brick, agricultural exhibit building just completed at a cost of $20,000. Reported then as a thing of beauty and promised to be a joy forever, it included a lecture hall, initiated by at least a dozen speeches that first year.

By 1917-1918 a considerable change had developed in the nature of the entertainment when the commission contracted with a Chicago Theatrical Exchange for a number of professional acts. Included were a Chicago Grand Opera Quartet, auto racing, auto polo, motorcycle riding exhibitions. "The Girl in Red," a member of Professor Carver's High Diving Girls, jumped her diving horse from a platform into a pool below. Baxter Adams was doing airplane stunts and racing motorcycles daily. This appears to mark the beginning of the shift in entertainment competition from the participants who came from ranch and range, to professionals traveling the circuit of fairs, carnivals and similar attractions.

In these early days, premium list advertisers constituted a memorandum of "Who's Who" among Douglas businessmen. DeLaval Cream Separators, Mica Axle Grease and "Black Leaf 40" or Chloro-Naphtholeum Dip and Disinfectant advertising carried much of the premium list advertising load.

Over the years the state fairgrounds plant was a major community resource in Douglas. The year round facilities have been unusual in a community of Douglas' size.

The stock barns represented an unauthorized winter playground during those years. Facilities, first in the Agricultural Exhibit Hall before 1912 and subsequently in the new brick hall in 1913-1914 enabled Douglas to introduce and enjoy indoor basketball when it first came to the community.

Currently the facilities are used regularly by county and state groups and organizations, for organization meetings, livestock sales, National High School Rodeos, steer roping, etc.

The fair was conducted every year after 1905 until the depression years forced cancellation of the 1935 and 1936 fairs and a polio outbreak cancelled the 1937 event. World War II caused the 1943-1945 events to be cancelled. There has been a state fair every year since the end of World War II (1945) to the present (1986).

Many local people have served in various capacities, throughout the years, in assisting with the state fair. Many of the pioneers have been actively involved during the fair each year for most of their lives. They serve as superintendents in each department, clerks, security and many other capacities necessary in conducting a state fair.

Since 1923 the management of the fair has been vested in the Wyoming Board of Agriculture, an able group, representing all of Wyoming with a Douglas resident now and then a member. This is a departure from the 1905-1920 arrangement providing for a five member Board of Fair Commissioners appointed by the governor. During these 15 years, 47 of the 70 member years were served by Converse County residents.

Beginning in 1911 a modest start was made in paying the commission secretary as the chief administrative officer. Prior to that, the only paid workers were clerical staff members, grounds workers and temporary help during fair week. 1915 marked the first year the secretary was a full time employee and not a commission member, an arrangement which continued until 1921 when there was a board of fair managers operating under the control of the State Board of Charities and Reform. People serving as chairmen of the Board of Fair Commissioners from 1905-1920 were: Dr. J. M. Wilson, Edward David, Robert Carey, John Flynn, Luther Freeman, Russell Thorpe, Wm. C. Irvine, Dr. B. F. Davis, Joe Garst and Otto Bolln.

Early day secretaries or directors were: Henry Hern, 1931, Lem Carmin, 1939-1942, Joe Sullivan, 1946, Vance Leeper, 1947, Earl Farnsworth, 1948-1950, Jim Roush, 1951-1955 and 1960-1978, Floyd Tetreault, 1956-1959, Lyle Crosby, 1979 and Bill Ogg 1980-1986.

The latest improvements have been: a new cafeteria, girls dormitories, new grandstand and concession area, in addition to improved areas for parking, hook-ups for recreational vehicles and additional hard surfaced roads. Adjoining land has been purchased to enlarge the entire state fair facility.

Management continues to be under the Wyoming Board of Agriculture, who hires a director to carry out the function of the fair. The board also has an advisory committee to help with planning and recommendations.

There has been a fantastic growth since the first fair in 1905; however, you still find the cooperative effort of Wyoming people working together to make the state fair a success.

Water Wheels

The water wheels that I am writing about were located along the North Platte River between Douglas and Guernsey. They were used by the farmers and ranchers in the river valley from the mid teens through the mid 1930s as a means of supplying irrigation water to their meadows and fields. Few locations throughout the world were as adaptable as the North Platte River to this water wheel, designed and used for irrigation.

The water wheels varied in size with the diameters varying from 18 to 32 feet and the lengths varying from 16 to 24 feet. The water wheels were constructed predominately with 12 paddles although there were a few with 16 paddles. The paddles were three to four feet in width and extended the full length of the water wheel. Each paddle was supported by six spokes radiating from the central shaft. Bracing to the adjacent paddles around the perimeter gave the water wheel its required rigidity. The blades extended beyond the spokes at each end of the water wheel by about three feet. A wooden bucket was built between the adjacent paddles at each end of the water wheel so that they were beyond the outer most spokes. This allowed the flume to be nested within the water wheel cylinder and under the bucket to catch the water as the buckets emptied. Three steel cables were placed around the periphery of the water wheel, one at each end and one at the center and tightened with turn-buckles to hold the water wheel firmly together.

As the river's current turned the water wheel the buckets dipped water from the river and delivered it to the flume near the top of the wheel. The flume in turn carried the water to an irrigation ditch in the river valley.

Two log cribs (generally made of stripped cottonwood logs knothed and fitted like house logs) filled with river boulders supported the wooden bearings at each end of the water wheel's axle. The cribs were diamond shaped being about 30 feet long (with the rivers flow) and about 15 feet wide. One of these piers was placed at the bank and the other out in the river roughly perpendicular to the river's bank.

The bearing that supported the water wheel's axle was a "Vee" knotch in the top of the wood support column. Over the axle at each bearing support was a wooden bottomless grease bucket that was fit to the axle and the "Vee" knotch. This arrangement served as a self lubricating device.

Each site for a water wheel was carefully chosen and the design of the water wheel varied with each location. The height that the water had to be lifted above the river to be delivered to the field governed the diameter of the water wheel. The speed of the river's current and the amount of water required for the fields governed the width of the water wheel. A swiftly moving river did not require as long a wheel as a slower current and a need for a large volume of irrigation water required more paddle area.

It was desirable to locate the water wheel in a cove at the edge of the river. A cove often has a faster current during moderate river stages than the center of the river and during high river stages the faster moving current moves out to the center of the river. A cove of this character was sought to provide some protection from the fast moving drifting debris at high river stages. Other factors considered when designing a water wheel were:

- (1) the length of the flume
- (2) the size and slope of the field to be irrigated
- (3) the composition of the soil in the field
- (4) the anticipated crops

Water wheel on the Nylen-Gillespie ranch.

(5) the prevailing wind.

The timetable for building a water wheel was crucial. It was carefully planned and material stockpiled in readiness. Pier sites were excavated or leveled for construction below the lowest water level. As the lower pier logs were placed, ballast was added to prevent them from floating away. After the piers came the placement of the bearings and the axle. The water wheel's elements were constructed in place by swinging the first spokes from the axle with the final sections being assembled at the very top. The rain, snow, wind, temperature and river fluctuations each had an effect on the construction.

The function of Wyoming's water wheels was unique due to the control of the river's waters by the upstream Pathfinder Reservoir near Alcova. When the released irrigation waters reached the water wheels the river's flow would turn the water wheel and irrigation water was delivered to the fields. When the reservoirs stopped releasing irrigation water, the river level would drop and the water wheel would stop turning. The water wheels were designed with a mechanism so that by using jacks it could be moved vertically about three to four feet. This vertical adjustment allowed the water wheel to be raised out of the river during low flows (ice forming), but would not allow the water wheel to be raised above the irrigation flows in the river. It is to be emphasized that there was no possible way to stop the wheels turning during the irrigation water releases.

Water wheel maintenance was a never ending job. The axle had to be greased twice each day that the water wheel was in operation and a constant attempt was necessary to keep drifting debris cleared from the water wheel. Often a water wheel would be destroyed, or nearly so, by drifting debris as the owner watched helplessly from the bank. It was not uncommon, during high river stages, to see a team of horses or a tractor and a man proficient with a lariat; lasso and drag drift from in front of the wheel.

Another element of disaster was the river flooding by excessive rains or snow melt below the reservoir. When a substantial flow was being released from Pathfinder Reservoir (which would take a couple weeks to travel to the water wheels) the addition of excessive rain water could be disastrous.

The following is a list of people who had water wheels built on their property. These locations are known and have been verified. There were others that I have heard mentioned but I could not verify their existence. Because a positive location for them could not be identified they have not been mentioned. The water wheels described in this article were all in full view of Laramie Peak.

Roy and Laura Willey built a water wheel around 1925. It was located just above Sand Creek on the north side of the North Platte River (about three miles upriver from Orin). The flume was longer than most and that added to the maintenance, but under the Willeys' care the water wheel worked well for many years.

Walter and Martha Cakebread constructed two water wheels. Walter, being a carpenter as well as a dairyman, built the water wheels with great concern for details and perfection. One was located near the farmstead straight south of the Orin School House and the other located across from the pyramid shaped hills. Both were located on the north side of the Platte River. Mr. Cakebread built a dike to protect the upstream water wheel and help direct the river's flow under it. This arrangement created a deep pool that became the "swimming hole" for the area. The Cakebreads allowed everyone to come, swim and picnic at this gathering place on the North Platte.

The Nylen and Gillespie ranch built four water wheels all on the south side of the North Platte River. The first was at the old ferry of the 1880s (this is about one half mile up stream from the present Burlington Northern Railroad bridge just south of Orin). As this water wheel deteriorated a second was built a few hundred feet downstream. This second water wheel performed so well at this location that a third water wheel was built on the river side of it. This resulted in two water wheels sharing three piers. The fourth water wheel was built below both the newly constructed highway and railroad bridges one mile southeast of Orin. This water wheel was very productive and was one of the few that withstood the 1934 flood on the North Platte River.

Byron and Bess Wilson, owners of the Platte Valley Ranch near McKinley, Wyoming, built three water wheels on that property. Two were located on the north side and one on the south side of the North Platte River. The largest water wheel was 32 feet in diameter and was located just below Shawnee Creek and irrigated a meadow below Shawnee Hill. It was a well constructed water wheel of good craftsmanship, but like so many others it did not withstand the 1934 flood on the North Platte.

The Wilsons also built three water wheels on their Platte Valley Sheep Company ranch. They were all located downstream from the mouth of Muddy Creek on the east or north side of the North Platte River. This area is now inundated by the Glendo Reservoir.

Fred and Lola Roediger constructed a water wheel below the mouth of Elkhorn Creek on the north side of the North Platte River. This location is now under the waters of the Glendo Reservoir.

Charles and Florence Wormwood built an excellent water wheel with a high output of irrigation water. Charles was an engineer and an accomplished carpenter which resulted in a water wheel built upon concrete piers and a water wheel that was in existence until the Glendo Reservoir covered it. It was located on the west or south side of the North Platte River straight north of Glendo, Wyoming.

Walter and Myrtle Cundall built a 28 foot diameter water wheel on the west side of the North Platte River that went into operation in 1924. They received more than twelve years of service from this well-built water wheel. It had 16 paddles rather than the twelve that existed on most water wheels. The flood of the North Platte River in 1934 extensively damaged the water wheel and no major repairs were made on it. It was replaced later by an electric pump. This wheel's location is also inundated by the Glendo Reservoir.

William and Elizabeth Barry constructed a water wheel near Cassa, Wyoming. It was one of the earliest wheels built and was located below the present Glendo Dam on the west side of the North Platte River.

First Baptist Church of Douglas

The First Baptist Church of Douglas began services in January of 1915 and these services were held in the Chapel Car "Glad Tidings," one of a fleet of seven such railroad cars which rolled over the rails throughout the west, stopping off at towns which had no regular churches. These Chapel Cars were church and parsonage combined. One part was complete living quarters for a minister and the other part was a church equipped with a brass lectern, organ and sufficient pews for about 125 persons. The Chapel Car in which our church first held services was located in the vicinity of what is now the Gene L. Payne Company.

On March 25, 1915 a regular (Missionary) Baptist Church was organized. Charter members were:

Mrs. Flora Bunton	Mr. Asa Reece
Mrs. Ida Ballard	Mrs. Betty Reece
Mrs. Will Edwards	Mrs. Eva Shaw
Mrs. Maude Fowler	Mrs. A.M. Smith
Mrs. M.A. Grimes	Miss Minnie Smith
Mrs. Sarah Hammond	Miss Zada Wisdom

Later in the year of 1915 the corner lot of Fourth and Oak was purchased for $1,200 but no immediate plans for building materialized and services were continued in the Chapel Car. Attendance was growing rapidly and Rev. Davis, who was pastor at the time, held the first baptismal service in an empty garage building, the "pit" being used as the baptistry. About twelve people were baptized at this time.

In February of 1917 the church was incorporated.

There was a great need for the Chapel Car elsewhere so the Lodge Room of the Unity Temple Building was rented. In October of 1918, work was started on a church parsonage but due to poor health of several pastors, the war, flu epidemic and lack of money nothing was accomplished until August of 1923 when our first church building was completed. It was dedicated in May of 1924 at which time the State Baptist Convention was held in Douglas.

There followed a series of pastors until the arrival of Rev. John Falconer whose faithful ministry all during the depression years of the 1930s was a great blessing to the church.

In 1938 a hot air furnace was installed, basement remodeled and the kitchen enlarged; but the need of more space became urgent, and in 1946 the church purchased one of the buildings at the old Prisoner of War Camp and moved it to the lot to be used as Sunday School rooms.

In May of 1947, Rev. Clyde Thompson accepted the call to be pastor and under his leadership the church continued to grow and plans went ahead for an adequate sanctuary which was completed in March of 1957. This same year we began broadcasting some of our Sunday morning services. During 1965 our last bond was paid off and the church was debt free. This was the 50th anniversary of the church.

After 30 years of faithful service, Rev. Thompson gave his last sermon on Mother's Day of May 1977. The attendance at Sunday School and Church has continued to grow and in the fall of 1979 a decision was reached to have two Sunday morning services. To give more room for growth, the house and lot immediately south of the church building were purchased in 1978 and paid off in 1980.

First publication of a monthly newsletter was issued in September of 1980. We became even more active in mission work, supporting Bill and Kathy Bacheller in Trinidad, West Indies and other missionaries in the U.S. and Thailand.

"Elective" Sunday School classes for adults started in 1981 and this brought immediate and large increases in attendance.

March of 1983 brought a decision to build additional space for Sunday School classes and morning worship. Our 11 o'clock worship service is now broadcast every Sunday.

Val Keiter took up duties as our first full time Administrator of the church in September of 1983. This will relieve our pastor of some of the heavy workload he has been carrying.

The addition to our sanctuary plus more classrooms were begun in midsummer of 1984. As usual, our goal is not to build buildings, but to use buildings, as we invite people to Christ and as we build up Christians in their faith.

St. James Catholic Church Douglas

The first priest known to have come through Douglas, Wyoming was Father Patrick Brophy. In a letter received from him he writes, "I visited Douglas in June 1887 and Mass was celebrated for the first time in Douglas on Sunday, June 5, 1887 in a public hall in the western part of town. It was the end of the road at that time. I also said Mass at old Fort Fetterman on this occasion. The fort was then being dismantled."

"When I was preaching the first Sunday, a short-handled heavy ax came flying through the door. The congregation became excited and was going to administer treatment. The poor fellow was on his way home to his dugout in a sandhill further west. This was a form of salutation in those 'wet early days' in Douglas.

"I visited Douglas again in August 1887 and said Mass in the same hall. Then in October, Wyoming became a diocese. My last trip was in 1896, a little while before the arrival of Bishop Lanahan. On this last trip to Douglas, I found very few Catholics there and the town looked like Goldsmith's Deserted Village."

In June 1898 Bishop Thomas M. Lanahan confirmed the four O'Brien girls, Margaret Ferguson and William Henry in the old Town Hall, then situated on Third and Center Streets.

Father James Keating of Casper began to come to Douglas regularly for services in the fall of 1898. That same year, he erected a small church at 127 North Fifth Street. The total cost of this church was $876.45. The last payment was made in 1901.

During the next several years, priests again came to Douglas sporadically. Beginning in December 1902, Father George Bryant of Casper visited Douglas regularly. In the spring of 1905, he succeeded in preparing several Catholics for confirmation by Bishop James John Keane.

Bishop Keane saw the need of stationing a priest in Douglas. Father Neil Brennan, Chaplain at Fort Robinson, was the first to fill the position on a full-time basis although he remained only a few months.

In 1907, the church on North 5th Street was sold to J. A. McDermott who moved it to 222 South Sixth Street where it was made into a residence and remains there in 1986. Assumedly Masses were said in Unity Temple.

Toward the end of 1909, Father Ignatius Berna, a teacher at Trenton College, Trenton, New Jersey, became the first Franciscan pastor at St. James in charge of 10,000 square miles of mission area including Lusk, Wheatland, Glenrock, Van Tassell, Manville, and Salt Creek. His assistants were Father James Hermes and Father Dominic Miller.

Father Ignatius' first task was erecting a new church and rectory. Property including a seven room house was purchased from Harry LeBar at the southeast corner of Fifth and Elm Streets for $4,000 in October 1910. Mass was said in the house; and on Sundays, a late Mass was held at the Unity Temple.

The cornerstone of the new St. James Church was laid at 2:30 p.m. on Sunday, October 14, 1912. The new church was estimated to cost $8,000 and could seat 175. The dedication was held June 1, 1913 with Bishop Patrick McGovern officiating. A Solemn High Mass was sung. Father James was celebrant, Father Dominic deacon, and Father Ignatius sub-deacon. Bishop McGovern delivered the sermon.

Father James succeeded Father Ignatius and remained pastor until October 1916. Rev. Father Mathias was then appointed as acting pastor and continued in this capacity until November 1918 when Father Adolph Bernhoiz was sent to Douglas as pastor. During his administration the brick St. Louis Church was built at Glenrock at a cost of about $10,000.

Records show that in 1935 Bishop McGovern donated a new automobile to the parish. This must have made the assistants' travels a lot more bearable and much more dependable. In the year 1939, St James church held 20 baptisms and ten marriages. Just for comparison, in 1979, the last year before the new church was built, there were 54 baptisms and nine marriages.

During the '60s the home of Elizabeth and John Flynn was moved from the southwest corner of Fifth and Elm to its present northeast corner to be used as a convent. St. James Center was erected on the vacated land. When it was built it was intended that it would be staffed with sisters and become a regular school. That never did become a reality, but it has given the parish classrooms, a parish hall, and a kitchen.

The end came about when it was no longer possible to ignore the fact that Douglas had tripled in population and that St. James Church was bursting at the seams. In 1979 an architect was selected, plans were solidified, pledges were made and the old church came crashing down. The next spring a hole appeared in the ground and the new St. James Church began to rise. On March 22, 1981, on a windy and cool day, the cornerstone of the newest St. James Church was laid.

Congregational United Church of Christ

In August 1886, two young theological students representing the Congregational faith came to Douglas and held the first services in the dining room of the hotel at Fort Fetterman. By the next month, the "Tabernacle," a shack-tent, was built in the permanent town along Antelope Creek. It housed Congregational, then Presbyterian, then Congregational congregations once more.

The first Sunday School was organized November 14, 1886 with H. R. Paul as superintendent, Mrs. Lane as his assistant, and C. O. Davis as secretary. Thirty-six scholars were enrolled.

The first pastor of the yet-to-be-organized church was Reverend Bross from Chadron, Nebraska who arrived in December 1886 and formally established the Congregational Church.

The Ladies Aid was organized in March 1887 with Mrs. Lee Moore as president.

On July 10, 1887, the first building committee was appointed to find a suitable building for worship. On July 25, 1887, the First Congregational Church was located on Center Street where the Episcopal rectory now stands; the pastor was Rev. Benjamin Stanton.

During the years 1889-1890, the church met in the Methodist Church rooms every other Sunday. In 1891, rooms were secured in the Lageir Building on Center Street. On February 11, 1893, the Congregationalists moved into a new church, 32 feet square, costing a total of $1,455. This building was on the site of the church recently vacated on North Fourth Street between Center and Walnut Streets.

On April 11, 1899, the church was officially recognized as the First Congregational Church of Douglas, Wyoming.

By 1912, the little white wooden church was not large enough; and for another two years, another building was used for worship. In 1915, yet another building committee was formed to plan a new church facility on the same site.

The cornerstone of the new church was laid on July 6, 1916. The building cost $15,000 with members raising $4,000 and the Congregational Building Society loaning $350 to begin the project. During the years prior to 1937, many pastors came and went.

Reverend Lewis Gale became pastor in 1937; and during his pastorate which ended in 1952, the mortgage was paid and burned, except the loan from the CBS. Renovations were made which included accoustical tile, a new organ, and wood floors for the Fellowship Hall.

Prior to the 70th anniversary, under the pastorate of Reverend Dr. Herman Linderman, another renovation program took place - such things as new lighting, remodeling the kitchen, a new roof, and a new brick front stairway entrance.

In the summer of 1977, the church was given its final face lift with paint and cleaning for its 90th anniversary.

A gift of land during the winter of 1983 prompted the members to realize that a new church was possible. Large gifts from several families gave the building program a big boost. Eddie Moore, Chairman of the Long Range Planning Committee, led the way followed by Earl Scott, Chairman of the Building Committee. After months of planning, working, committees and more committees, the ground for a new church at 605 North Sixth Street at Poplar was broken. Griffin Construction and Design submitted the low bid of $509,225; and ground-breaking took place on a bleak March 4, 1984. Nine months later, the first worship service was held in the new church.

Much of the latest progress of the Congregational Church can be credited to the leadership of its present pastor, Reverend Robert W. Nuhn, who has served the church since 1976. The present congregation has a membership of 230 which continues to grow.

Christ Episcopal Church of Douglas

When two theology students held the first church services in Douglas in May 1886, their church was a saloon in one of three moveable tents where a card table served as an altar. And in Chicago that year a new missionary district was created on the western frontier by the Episcopal Church, and a young priest from Missouri was elected to serve as bishop.

Bishop Ethelbert Talbot arrived at his appointed district, Wyoming and Idaho Territories in July of 1887. By then Douglas was a thriving frontier town and church services were held regularly in a building known to all as "The Tabernacle." Denominational congregations were organized in those early years, but occasional visits from circuit riders and ordained clergy were long awaited events and attracted townsfolk of all persuasions.

Bishop Talbot made his first visit to Douglas in the spring of 1888. Finding an enthusiastic hunger for God's word and a strong desire for an Episcopal Church, he arranged to preach there whenever possible. By 1890 he had a considerable following, so it wasn't surprising when a meeting of the bishop and interested families of the community resulted in the purchase of the Congregational Church building by the Episcopal Church of the Missionary District of Wyoming and Idaho.

Dr. Mortimer Jesurun, Messrs. George, Fred and Harry Foxton, George Metcalf, DeForest Richards, L.J. Swan and John T. Williams served on the first vestry and J.S. James was the first rector. Pastor James had recently immigrated from England and was new to the Episcopal Church. He was unaccustomed to the services, but it being difficult to attract priests to the western territories, the bishop sent for him anyway.

The bishop's apprehension concerning his new priest was realized at their first meeting. The only vestments that could be found to garb the diminutive fellow were from the boys' choir room, his knowledge of the Prayer Book was non-existent and he had the peculiar habit of addressing the bishop as "Your Lordship." However, after two days of tutoring, he was probably about as familiar with the service as his varied flock whom, according to the bishop, did not have an Episcopalian among them. Rev. James remained at Christ Church for three years, passed his examinations and was ordained to the priesthood. His ministry was followed by Reverend John Leal and in 1896 Reverend J.H. Dodshon was called.

By 1897 the congregation had outgrown its building. Reverend Dodshon, Bishop Talbot and a six-man building committee began to draw up the plans for a new Episcopal Church to be built on the corner lot next door to the existing building. The proposed site would face onto Fourth Street and adjoin the presently occupied property east of it on Center Street. The members of the building committee, DeForest Richards, Dr. Jesurun, George Metcalf, L.J. Swan, F.S. Knittle and Mr. Foote received bids, finally accepting one for $2,190, submitted by T.A. Littleton.

Construction began in July 1898 and the cornerstone containing several timely articles was laid on August 9. The town's Opera House was secured for services to accommodate the growing congregation and it was here that Bishop Talbot preached his farewell sermon on September 7, 1898 for he had been elected Bishop for the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania.

The new church was completed soon after the bishop's departure and dedication Sunday was held on the Feast of Christ the King, November 20, 1898. A total of five services were held that day and among those present were guest musicians and visiting clergy from Laramie, Lusk and other towns in the diocese. The celebration continued on November 13th when the choir hosted a party and fireworks display to commemorate the historic event. Many of the money raisers organized to help pay the debt on the new church were established as social traditions and held annually. The Shrove Tuesday pancake supper in February is one special event that is still carried on. Concerts, lectures and fancy balls were sponsored. A turkey dinner in November and a summer craft fair became traditional community events even though the church was no longer the sponsoring body. Election night balls and Easter Monday dances were held for years, but originated as projects to help raise money for a new rectory.

Reverend Dodshon stayed on at Christ Church until after the turn of the century, but left before the rectory was realized. He must have kept a special place in his heart for Christ Church, though. He returned on November 18, 1912 to observe dedication Sunday and conduct services. At that time, he was the Archdeacon of the Diocese of Ohio.

When Reverend J. Arthur Tancock came to Christ Church in 1903 he began the first rural ministry which is carried on to this day. He and his family were beloved in and about Douglas and during his eight year ministry the church continued to have an important role in the life of the community. In 1909, during Tancock's time as rector, the new rectory was built on the lot where once stood the little Episcopal Church that was purchased in 1890.

Except for a change from the original pale green to a white exterior, most of the changes that have taken place in more than 85 years have not altered the appearance of Christ Church. In 1946 a basement was excavated. Six years later the steeple and bell tower, which had been condemned as unsafe, were repaired and restored to their original height. In August of 1979 a new parish hall was added on the south grounds and is a testimony to an ever growing Christian enthusiasm. On November 17, 1980, the church and rectory were entered in the National Register of Historic Places by the Department of the Interior. This designation guarantees the preservation of the church as the only remaining wooden church in Douglas which still represents the Gothic Revival Architecture of the mid and late 19th century.

Adding to the history of Christ Church while preserving its functional purpose as a place of worship, the interior was remodeled in the summer of 1981. Changes included arranging the sanctuary with a free-standing altar and removing the rood screen. None of the changes made were such that the original interior could not be restored if desired. In the summer of 1982 white steel siding was applied over the wooden exterior, thus protecting the original building.

Whether a brand new church in a tiny pioneer town or a quaint little church in a modern Wyoming community, Christ Church, Douglas, is a proclamation by Christ's people to all who pass through town or tarry.

Bill

Before the Dry Creek community had a post office we waited until someone was going to Douglas and then neighbors would ask whoever was going to town to bring the mail. Often the visitor to Douglas would bring the mail for six or seven, maybe ten families along with needed supplies—sugar, coffee, thread, etc.

In April 1919 a group of neighbors who were living in the vicinity of the present Bill Post Office and north along the Cheyenne River area met at the Fairview School. The purpose of the meeting was to establish a Grange. Granges were being organized at this time by farmers who believed agriculturalists should unite. The attendees at this meeting on April 9, 1919 at the school soon decided a post office was more important. As I remember, Bill Dorr, Bill McMann, Bill Barker, Bill Howisay, "Bob" Featherston and Harry Russell were some of the staunchest promoters for the post office.

It was necessary for the community to provide some funds before the post office could be established. One project I remember was a "Sock Social." The idea was the same as a Box Social excepting that the women packed the lunches in stockings instead of boxes. The stockings were auctioned to the highest bidder and the man who bought the stocking ate with the lady who prepared the lunch. My what a display of ideas! Some lunches were packed in a pair of men's work socks, some in ladies silk hose, some had tassels and bells on the heels and toes, some had fancy garters. I remember whispers among the women about "What was Bill Dorr going to do with seven pairs of socks he bought?" He had only two sons and I don't know what happened. I believe he and his two boys sat with the women and had a picnic.

Another event was an evening entertainment. The young people in the community put on a play. The stage was built outside the Fairview School House and the actors used the school room for dressing and the windows as entrances to the stage. The stage was lighted with gasoline lanterns and the audience sat in the yard on benches. The young Steinles and the Bushey girls were the actors. Elisabeth and I thought Betty and Rose Steinle and Nina, Emma and Marie Bushey were the prettiest young women we had ever seen and that Fred and Ernie Steinle were handsome young men.

The post office became a reality on September 12, 1919. It was located on Bill Barker's homestead which is perhaps three miles east and a mile north of the present Mary Steinle ranch headquarters. The name first chosen for the post office was Barker. When it was learned that there was already a post office with that name, the name of Bill was proposed because so many of the promoters were named Bill.

Bill, Wyoming community hall 1920s

And it was accepted. The first Postmaster was Bill Barker.

Mrs. Tom Hamlin was the next Postmistress. When they moved to Idaho, the post office was moved to the Dry Creek Store and Roy Lynch became the Postmaster. It is still located at this place. James McCall was the first carrier.

Bill Barker was quite an interesting fellow, a bachelor who prided himself on his bread making and always had it in the oven when the mail came. He had a violin which he was always ready to play. I can't remember if he knew any tunes other than "Let Me Call You Sweetheart" and "Listen to the Mockingbird."

Douglas

An article in the June 23, 1936 edition of the Douglas Enterprise written by A. R. Merritt tells the following about the founding of Douglas, "In April 1886, there were three tents pitched on the shore of the Platte River just north of where Antelope Creek empties into the stream. One was occupied as a general merchandise store by C.H. King and Co. under the management of J.F. McReynolds, who afterwards became our first postmaster, one by a restaurant and the other a saloon.

"People came in slowly until June, when arrivals were very rapid and pitching their tents wherever there was a favorable spot. Later in the same month when the construction company began building the fill and grade, nearly all were obliged to move on the hill just above Antelope Creek.

"There were three streets in this tent town, all classes of businesses, including a newspaper, "Bill Barlow's Budget," many saloons and two large dance halls. The proprietors furnished the dancing girls and after each dance you set up the beer to your partner at the cost of a quarter. With so many saloons one would think that this would be a very disorderly community, which was not the case.

"Fort Fetterman had been the supply point for the stockmen, but hearing of the larger stocks of merchandise in the new tent town, people came here more and more to do their trading.

"Many a time we would hear at the breakfast table that C. H. King and Co. sold $500 worth of goods before breakfast.

"August 29, the first passenger train arrived loaded with people. The next day the sale of lots began, the town having been platted during the summer.

"The first lot sold brought $760 and sold to A. R. Merritt. (This lot is owned by Higgins in 1985.) The First National Bank corner (Third and Center Streets - Gambles in 1985) brought $1,200. In all there were 242 lots sold at public auction for $70,405.

"Erection of buildings began immediately and for the next 60 days you would hear the pounding of hammers from daylight until dark.

"In October an epidemic of typhoid fever developed. Dr. Barber had gone east for treatment on account of contracting blood poisoning. Dr. Wilson at one time was visiting as many as 60 patients daily. During this epidemic we lost our first school teacher, Cora M. Rice, and two other persons.

"Jim Bury built a two-story structure, the lower part of which remains standing just south of the light plant. Here were held the first schools, churches, lodges, public meetings, dances, and other entertainments.

"During the fall of 1886, great numbers of cattle were driven in from Texas. The range was very much overstocked. When the March storms came on, there being very little feed and cattle thin and poor, half of them laid down and died. This calamity put a crimp in the community and from a settlement of at least 1,500 it gradually dwindled down to less than 400."

From "Bill Barlow's Budget" anniversary edition, 1907, we learn: "Coincident with removal from the temporary to the permanent townsite a move was made looking to incorporation; but the proposition was voted down at a mass meeting held September 19, 1886. Those favoring the proposition made a census in March 1887, and listed 805 souls, and at another mass meeting held March 10th it was decided to incorporate and a committee comprising F.E. Caffey, C.M. Garver, J.A. Bennett, Tim Higgins and M. C. Barrow were named to take the necessary legal steps. This application was finally granted by the commissioners of Albany County in September, and at a mass meeting held October 3rd it was decided to ignore party lines, and C.M. Garver was nominated for mayor, F.E. Caffey, C.E. Clay, J.M. Wilson and W.F. Miller for council; L.C. Nash treasurer, M.C. Barrow clerk and J.W. Overman marshal. Although another ticket was placed in the field all were elected, and at the first meeting of the council held October 7th M.B. Camplin was appointed city attorney and J.H. Hutchison assessor."

A census taken in the winter of 1888 by Judge Maurer and M. C. Barrow showed less than 300 people in Douglas. Those remaining had courage and energy and a firm faith in the future. Boosters who not only believed but who made others believe as well - who evolved the municipal slogan of "Knock the Knocker - Douglas Does!" And so through the years - slowly at first - Douglas regained population until it had reached almost 2,000 people in 1907.

Many changes were taking place by the time the twentieth century arrived. In 1902, the Unity Temple Building (Bolln's Food Market) was built. The second floor was used for a place to hold dances, meetings, etc. E.E. Russell tells of the time when a cowboy decided to crash a dance on his horse. He rode his animal up the stairs onto the dance floor; then after surveying the scene, and his horse slipping around on the dance floor, he rode his horse back down the stairs. Many masquerade balls and dances were held there.

The Wyoming State Fair was organized in 1905 as noted in the Fair article in this book. One of its attractions was the first car in Douglas. It was a chain-driven, two-cylinder Rambler owned by Friday Nelson. Tickets were sold at 50¢ each to ride in the car.

A landmark still around is the LaBonte Hotel (Inn). It was built in 1913.

The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R.R. was built through Douglas in 1914.

On July 4, 1924, one of the largest crowds ever to gather in one place in the State of Wyoming congregated at the Wyoming State Fairgrounds. An audience of 6,000 people came to hear Madame Ernestine Schumann-Hienk sing. She was a world reknown Wagnerian contralto who had been engaged by the Douglas American Legion to perform for one of its fund raising efforts to raise money for the local airport.

The event was described in a July 1924 edition of the "Douglas Budget," "When asked what was the climax of her career, Madam Schumann-Heink replied, 'Yes, I know, it was in a little town that has not yet found its name registered on the map - Douglas, Wyoming.

"I had been asked to sing there, and I had expected to greet a small audience but to my astonishment I had an audience of 6,000 people.

"Some had motored-for others the railroad had run special trains-while the great mass of the audience were cowboys.

"The concert began! I gave the best I had to give. I gave them thrills, coloratura and bravura.

"In return they deafened me and themselves with applause. One cowboy, with a wild yell, leaped from his saddle, dashed over to me, hugged me, kissed me, and presented me with his whip and sombrero. At this there was almost a general stampede.

"And then I decided to give them something from my soul-I sang them that simple little song in which lives the whole of life - 'The Rosary'.

"As I finished there was no applause-but that of a big sob from 6,000 throats. That was the biggest moment of my life-the greatest success of my career."

The Woodruff Seed Company built a two-story building on Center Street between the two railroad tracks to process seeds of many agricultural plants. It was a source of employment for many people until they shut the doors in the 1950s. The building was moved south in the 1960s to house the present livestock sale barn.

The population of the town stayed fairly constant until the 1970s when the energy boom came to the county. The census showed Douglas to have 3,000 in 1970 and 6,000 in 1980. New annexations were made, some of them are: Clearfield, Riverbend, Frontier Village and others.

New public buildings were also built during this time. A new County Courthouse, Hospital, High School and Middle School are among them.

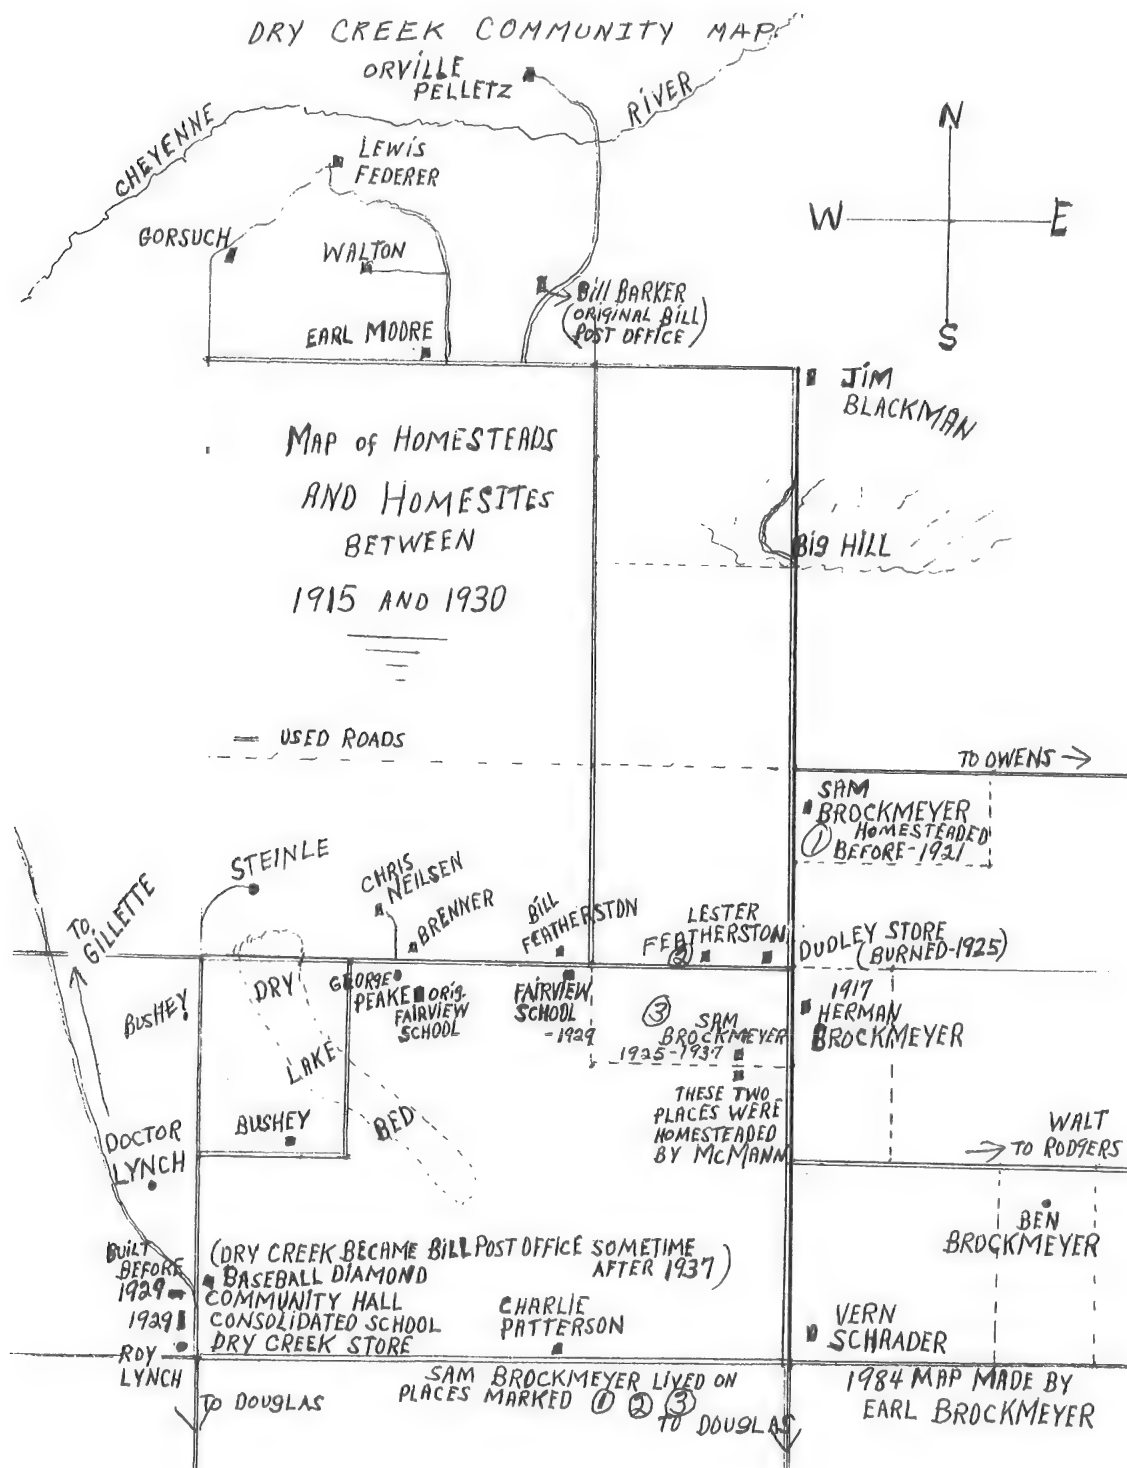

Dick George is presently serving as Mayor with Brad Johnson, Tracy Gentle, Mac Payne and Russell Kueck as councilmen.

Dry Creek

The Dry Creek Community takes its name from the "dry" stream - Dry Creek that runs past two miles south of Bill. Settled in the late teens and up to the 30s, the Dry Creek Community included an area of about six to ten miles radius from the present Bill Store. Now it takes in most of northeast Converse County, including the old communities of Bill, Verse, Dull Center and Cow Creek.

Verse was said to be the end of the county so they took the end of the name "Converse" for its name.

The Dudley Store sprang up early on the corner bordering the Brockmeyer and Featherston farms. It did rather scant business because no one had enough cash to buy much. The store also included a garage and gas station right next to it. The most excitement that Dry Creek ever had was one night in 1925 when someone was short of gas and the store was closed. The prospective "buyer" checked to see if there was any gas by lighting a match and the whole gasoline supply caught fire! The whole community soon showed up and carried water in buckets from a nearby pond. By soaking the roof of the store they managed to save it but the garage was lost. The store soon closed up. The Lynch Store near the Community Hall started up and is still in operation.

The speed of communication got a big boost in north-east Dry Creek when some hand-crank telephones were brought in. The unbelievable part of the operation was the use of the barbed wire stock fences as the wires connecting each family's phone to his neighbors. How rusty barbed wire could be wrapped together and still conduct a current is still a miracle! Whenever the "telephone line" came to a gate, an extra piece of wire had to be run up on poles and over the gate high enough to clear any load that came through the gate. It was even more difficult to get the wire to cross the main roads but it was done. Every time a cow tore down the fence the telephone wouldn't work!

The Dry Creek Community Hall was built in 1927. 116 families and businesses donated from one to ten dollars and labor to build the hall on land donated by Dr. and Mrs. H.G. Lynch. First priority was to be Sunday School and Church, then it could be used for other community gatherings. Earlier, Sunday School was held in schools. The tree windbreak was planted in 1930 or 1931.

A "Dry Creek Home Harvest Festival" fair was started in 1927. People brought exhibits of vegetables, field crops, flowers, clothing, fancy work, food and 4-H projects. There was a picnic lunch at noon, then a baseball game, foot races, penny toss for tiny kids, wrestling, boxing and pie eating contests, followed by a dance lasting until daylight. The "stand" was open all day to sell ice cream cones, pop and hot dogs. These fairs continued until the mid 1950's.

The first Fourth of July celebration, rodeo and dance were held in 1928, with the chute being built in 1930. Prize money paid out was:

Bucking Contest ($1.00 per head entry fee)	$52.00
Horse Race	6.00
Ball Game	10.00
Girls Foot Race	.75
Music for Dance	30.00

One celebration ended up with six inches of snow.

In the early 1930's, Dry Creek had a baseball team and in 1932 they won the Converse County Farm Bureau Baseball League Championship. Eldon Alvord was manager, Olaf Hanson, captain and players were; Emmet and Melvin Ballard, Wm. Dixon, Ivan Crouse, Babe Reed, Wm. Reed, Paul Sevier, John Lofstead, Rodney Funk and Howard Dickson. They played ball at the Dry Creek ball diamond nearly every Sunday afternoon in the summer.

The hall was a place for literary gatherings. Literary musicians in the late 20s and early 30s included Red Githens on guitar, Olaf Hansen on violin and Anna Lynch on the piano. Every month or so there would be a Saturday night dance with local people playing the music. Ray Henry was one of the square dance callers.

There were various clubs: 4-H, a Men's Club, Extension Homemakers, Grange and Farm Bureau. The Dry Creek 4-H Club celebrated its 45th anniversary in 1977 with a prize winning float in the state fair parade. It featured a huge birthday cake on a horse drawn wagon driven by two of the first members and followed by many others who had been members over the years.

The highway between Dry Creek and Douglas was moved to its present site and built up in 1935 and 1936. The "shoulders" were finished with horse and fresco. Many local people took their teams and worked on the new road. A lot of coal was trucked from the Antelope Creek coal mine during those years. It was oiled to Dry Creek in 1939 and the highway on to Gillette was straightened, built up and graveled at that time.

Many changes have taken place through the years. Cattle and sheep still graze, but people have given up trying to farm unless they can irrigate. People now travel in nice cars, four wheel drive pickups, and airplanes. Many of the roads are all-weather (more or less). Electricity arrived in the south part of the community in 1960, telephones in 1976, although there had been various "fence line" phones for years. The railroad started hauling coal in 1979, a school bus now runs from Bill to Douglas for high school students and others desiring to ride it.

The one thing that hasn't changed is Mother Nature. She still shows who is boss when she comes through with an "equalizer" blizzard like the one in April 1984.

Esterbrook

Tales of turn-of-the-century mining claims at Esterbrook, while seldom heard these days around the Laramie Peak region of eastern Wyoming, continue to interest many old timers and newcomers alike.

Perhaps the first person to actually settle in the Laramie Peak region was Jackson "Jack" Newell, a trapper and big game hunter who, in 1876, came into Wyoming Territory from Iowa to hunt elk for supplying meat to eating houses along the Union Pacific.

While hunting one day Newell reportedly came across an out-cropping of galena (lead ore) in some rocky ledges near Laramie Peak. For him prospecting at that time was merely an avocation. But in 1879 Jack was joined in Wyoming by his brother, Harrison Newell, who, although having come west primarily for his health, also became interested in mining. Not until Harrison stumbled one day upon a large gold nugget, however, did his prospecting take on a fevered pitch.

With this discovery the Newells reportedly sent east for their brothers Jim and George and together the four of them developed the Silver Tip Mine near Eagle Peak. When, after five years the venture proved unprofitable, the brothers turned to ranching for a livelihood. The area they worked, however, is known yet today as Miner's Hill, although no work has been done there since the turn of the century.

Esterbrook at this time was yet to be founded. In the years since, however, five generations of this pioneering family have lived in this north Laramie Peak region.

Mining activity in the area known today as Esterbrook reportedly had its beginning in 1897 when General W. "Ginny" Johnston began digging with pick and shovel on a barren crossing of two rocky trails about eleven miles north of Laramie Peak.

An earnest prospector, Johnston managed to dig a hole ten feet deep. Even more amazing he had unearthed an impressive showing of lead, copper and some gold. Now, no longer able to throw his diggings to the top, Johnston hired Tommy Barnes to operate a hand windlass, a venture which continued for several years.

According to recorded documents Johnston and Barnes were associated with three other pioneer residents of that area (namely Lyman B. Cooper, John "Jack" Foxton and M.B.O. Rutherford) in the early promotion of four mineral claims. These were sold to the Esterbrook Mining Company on July 1, 1897 for $10,000. The company was incorporated August 31, 1900 with a capital stock of $125,000. Foxton at this time was reportedly appointed mine superintendent.

Under corporate management and with additional capital derived from the sale of stock to eastern interests, the Esterbrook Mining Company flourished during the winter of 1902-03. A large shaft house was built and equipped at the mine site.

About this time A.R. Kelly of Queens County, New York became an active promoter of the venture. He reportedly took up residence at Esterbrook in order to assume alternate around-the-clock shifts with Foxton, the two of them firing the big boiler which supplied steam for the compressor that powered the drills and hoist.

While Foxton and Kelly are credited with getting a post office for Esterbrook it was actually Merdy Coffee's voluntary rides, horseback, the four miles between Springhill and Esterbrook every weekday that finally convinced the U.S. Postal Department in Washington that the new mining camp had enough cancellations to warrant mail service.

At first the camp's post office was located in one end of the company owned boarding house run by Frank Tinkham who served as the mine's head cook. While Kelly and Foxton are listed on the "official" roster as Esterbrook's first two Postmasters, it is Tinkham who followed third in 1911 that is best remembered by the area's old timers as actually having tended to post office duties.

Esterbrook was named for Esther Cooper, wife of Andrew Cooper.

Drillers, muckers, blacksmiths, woodcutters, firemen, tool dressers, hoist operators and handy men all were part of the settlement that grew up around the Esterbrook Mine with a work force of about 20 men at the time operations reached a peak in 1906. Other major mining operations adjacent to Esterbrook, most of which had their heyday between 1900 and 1929, included the Hobo Mine, the Maggie Murphy, the Three Cripples, the Tenderfoot, Saul's Camp, the Snowbird and the Trail Creek Mine. Each of these, with the exception of the Hobo, is discussed, in depth, in a journal published in 1916

Esterbrook Lodge 1930

by the U.S. Department of the Interior, copies of which are now rare.

In September 1907 the Esterbrook Mining Company sold to Kelly and two New England partners for $39,000. Legal documents show that the company, in turn, was resold a month later to the Boston-Wyoming Copper Company of Tie Siding, Wyoming, for a reported $1,199,850. Kelly served as secretary of this latter firm.

For years optimism ran high with regard to the mine's future. The ore never ran out but operations repeatedly had to fold for six months or longer as the money dwindled. The mine's promoters, however, continued to believe paying quantities of ore would eventually be found.

By 1910 the Esterbrook Mine had a main shaft 300 feet deep with two major drifts and several lesser ones running in various directions. The north drift reportedly extended some 170 feet. Two "stations" excavated at different levels along the main shaft housed pumps and tools. Ground water from springs was one of the major problems constantly dealt with at Esterbrook.

Recorded documents show that the Esterbrook claims were repurchased by sheriff's sale on June 21, 1916 by Kelly, Hency C. Hall and Frank E. Woodruff for $4,100 and, in turn, assigned on February 7, 1917 to the Esterbrook Copper Company, a Delaware corporation with a capital stock of $100,000; trustees Omar Powell, E.W. Stevens and G.J. McNeill. Powell reportedly forced the Boston-Wyoming Company to sell the mining claims to settle his judgment against them for 100,000 shares of capital stock.

Woodruff redeemed the property on January 13, 1925 for a $7.19 tax sale from Albany County (Esterbrook did not become part of Converse County until 1956), with the land being transferred at that time to the Esterbrook Lead & Mining Company, a Delaware corporation. Woodruff and his family during these years occasionally vacationed in Esterbrook and are well remembered by that community's older residents.

When work was again resumed at the mine in 1925 under Woodruff's direction, it is said that two weeks were required to pump the shaft dry before work could begin. When operations finally ceased many of the miners settled in the region as homesteaders and ranchers.

On October 11, 1941 ownership of the Esterbrook mining claims passed to Luther Freeman whose heirs hold the property today. The last work in the mine was reportedly done the summer of 1943 under the supervision of Dean Butler of Lusk. Of all the buildings once a part of this mine complex only two are said to remain; the old powder house in which mine explosives were stored and the Kelly house (residence of the A.R. Kelly family during the mine's heyday) now partially dismantled with the remaining portion leased as a summer cabin.

As the mines around Esterbrook, most of them within a ten square mile area, began to falter in the early decades of this century, some of the community's residents began catering to a resort trade as a means of livelihood. Thus, Esterbrook soon became a popular retreat for summer residents. A business which, in recent years, has grown to year-round status.

Glenrock

Located at the confluence of Deer Creek and the North Platte River, Glenrock has the distinction of setting astride three of America's most famous pioneer trails.

Glenrock's first recorded brush with destiny came on December 1812. Robert Stuart with a group of American trappers, bent on escaping an Arapaho war party crossed a creek later to be called several names before being named Deer. They were "Deep," "Fish," and finally "Deer." Stuart recorded in his diary his crossing on December 18, 1812.

Mormon stalwarts, the first destined to go to Salt Lake Valley under the leadership of Brigham Young, stopped at Deer Creek on June 10 and 11, 1847.

In the spring of 1849, the great gold rush was underway. From atop the Rock-in-the-Glen a continuous stream of wagon trains could be seen.

On October 9, 1856 Hyrum Kimball, a Utah Mormon, was awarded a postal contract from Independence, Missouri to Salt Lake City. Early the following spring, Kimball began constructing the Deer Creek Mail Station three and a half miles up Deer Creek from where the Oregon Trail crossed the creek. By July a corps of 76 men had planted crops, built two irrigation ditches, erected a mill, constructed a fort, and were in the process of erecting 42 houses when without warning or Congressional approval, President Buchanan declared war on the Mormons. The mail station was immediately abandoned with all workers fleeing to the safety of the Salt Lake Valley.

In this setting, Joseph Bissonette moved his trading post to Deer Creek in the fall of 1857. Following close behind was Major Thomas Twiss, Indian Agent for the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the Upper Platte Agency. Taking over the abandoned Mormon mail station on October 29, 1857, he shortly entered into a treaty with various Indian chieftains, which had it been ratified by Congress would have created an Indian Reservation on Deer Creek.

In 1859, German Lutheran missionaries wintered at the "Twiss Agency" along with two companies of troops under the command of Captain William F. Raynolds, all guests of Major Twiss. That Christmas at the Agency, the Lutheran clergy celebrated the first formal Christmas ceremony ever held in what ten years later would become Wyoming Territory.

A station for the Overland Stage near Bissonette's trading post came into being in 1859 with Joseph Bissonette being named Postmaster. The following spring a relay station for the Pony Express was erected. In the fall of 1861, the transcontinental telegraph was completed and a relay station was built. By 1862, a military outpost named Deer Creek Station was added. It had a military surgeon and on occasion, an officer with the rank of colonel carrying out sorties against renegade bands of Indians.

John Bozeman used Deer Creek for his original point of departure when he blazed his Bozeman Trail in 1863.

Shortly after the Indian attack on Platte River Bridge Station on July 26, 1865, the Deer Creek military outpost was abandoned. Bissonette moved his trading post closer to the sanctuary of Fort Laramie and the following summer on August 18, 1866, the Indians burned the Deer Creek telegraph station. The Lutherans fearing attack, abandoned their Indian Mission and returned to Iowa in 1867. Gradually, Deer Creek's activities diminished - then grew silent.

Settlers began to locate in Deer Creek Valley; and by 1884, a voting precinct designated "Deer Creek" was listed in the Wyoming Territorial records. Two years later, on November 2, 1886, Territorial records for the first time lists a voting precinct called Glen Rock.

Although tradition has it that Glenrock came into existence with the coming of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad in 1887 this writer finds no evidence to support such a belief. Similarly, nothing tangible exists to support the claim that Glenrock was once called "Mercedes" or "Nuttall."

In searching through the old Albany County records, Glen Rock was definitely in existence by 1886. The records show that Joseph McNeely mortgaged the "Olsen and Heller Livery and Feed Stable" situated on Lots 16 and 17 of Block 2 in the Town of Glen Rock on November 11, 1886. Territorial records for the Glen Rock precinct nine days earlier show that in the race for Justice of the Peace that A.A. Abbott garnered 48 votes, while M.D. Hershberger tallied 44 and F.A. Woodson came in last with 28.

On January 19, 1887, the local newspaper mortgaged all equipment "belonging to the 'Glen Rock Graphic'." The earliest copy in this writer's files is April 18, 1888, printed as "Vol. 3, No. 15." This would place the first edition as published in January 1886.

The "Glen Rock Bridge Company" was organized as a toll bridge across Deer Creek in February 1887. A bridge had previously been built by John Richard and other French fur trappers in 1852.

In May and June of 1887, the field notes of William Owen make reference to "a point just East of the buildings in the Town of Glen Rock which is wholly on the reservation" while making an official survey of the Fort Fetterman Hay Reservation for the government. Glenrock appeared on legal documents on December 7, 1887 for the first time as one word instead of two.

Upon the arrival of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley survey crews, they were chagrined to find a townsite already laid out. After bargaining in vain with the subdividers and the Deer Creek Coal Company, it was decided to lay their own townsite further west. The depot was built close to the Rock-in-the-Glen and wasn't moved back to the original town of Glenrock until years later despite the town father's pleas.

When the railroad construction crews moved on, the town's population dwindled to a few hundred citizens. Some continued to work in the mines while others operated businesses. In Col. Emerson Kimball's "Glenrock Graphic," the local merchants aggressively advertised for new business. Some of them were: The Stroud Brother's Elkhorn Livery Stable, Bird and Post's Maverick Saloon, Lord and Payton's saloon and pool room called "Lord's House," E. J. Well's Confectionery Store, W.S. Peck did "Watch and Jewelry Repairing," P.C. Hubbard sold "Pure Drugs and Medicines," A.D.

Chamberlin peddled "Everything in the Building Line," Druhling and Co. had the "Meat Market," John Kirby ran the Sutphin Hotel and John E. Higgins owned a General Store.

A spur line was built by the railroad to the tippie of the Glenrock Coal Mine and a second spur was built to the Stone Quarry southeast of Glenrock.

Ed Shaffner built the first telephone line through Glenrock shortly after the turn of the century. The first electric plant and sewer system was built in 1918. Glenrock was on the map for sure when the "Atlantic-Yellowstone-Pacific Highway" came through town.

Two attempts to incorporate the town failed. One was defeated by the coal company because Glenrock's boundaries took in too much of its property. The second effort failed because the railroad filed complaints for the same reason. In 1909, having deleted most of the coal company and railroad lands, the vote was in favor of incorporation.

When coal mining was at its best, Glenrock's population held at about 500, but from 1906 to 1915, it dropped to hardly more than 200 citizens. Then in 1915, Parker & Whiteside discovered oil in the Shannon sand (at 1,000 feet) west of Glenrock. The following year, A.C. Humphrey completed a good producer in the Frontier sands - and the "Big Muddy" oil boom was underway. Wildcatters frantically bunched cable tool rigs so close their wooden derricks almost touched each other. By 1919, two hundred producing oil wells had turned Glenrock into a boom town once more and lots were selling for 20 times their normal value. Five miles west, the town of Parkerton sprung up as a housing and service center for the oil workers.

During the boom years, the IOOF, Commerce Block, Lincoln buildings, the Higgins Hotel, the Baptist and Catholic Churches, and most of the finer homes were built. The Episcopal Church was rebuilt on the same site as the original building which dates back to 1887.

To absorb Big Muddy's production, in 1917 the Mutual Oil Company built a refinery adjacent to Glenrock on the west. Shortly afterward, Standard Oil of Indiana followed suit with a second refinery. About that time, officials of Continental Oil began negotiating with the Yellowstone Park Transportation Company to supply lubricant and gasoline for a fleet of motor touring cars as partial replacements to their horse-drawn carriages, the only means at that time by which tourists could view Yellowstone. An agreement was reached whereby refined products would be delivered to Continental's bulk plant at Gardner, Montana. To accomplish this, teams hauled the fuel, twelve to fourteen barrels per wagon. Once the gasoline reached Montana, it was sold at four separate locations in the park by dispensing it through a piston which metered out one gallon at a time at a price of 47½¢ per gallon. In this unique way, Glenrock contributed in popularizing one of America's greatest attractions Yellowstone Park.

By the 1930s a marked reduction in oil production was evident. The pools of shallow oil were being pumped dry. An effort to drill into lower sands commenced in 1927, resulting in a second comeback. Then in 1949, rotary rigs capable of drilling to much greater depths, struck new pay sands and Glenrock experienced yet another boom.

In the mid-50s, Continental Refinery shut down

Glenrock 1880s

Glenrock Coal Mine 1880s

(Standard already had done so several years earlier) and Glenrock again looked for some form of revitalization. It came in the form of the Dave Johnston Power Plant, completed in 1964. Pacific Power's new coal-generated power plant employed a work force of such proportions that a housing development was needed to handle the influx of new residents. The old Badger coal mine, 15 miles up Sand Creek to the north was acquired. A railroad to haul the coal was built from the mine to the power plant.

The 1970s saw the uranium industry impact Glenrock. North of town the Highland Uranium District attracted major producers: Exxon, United Nuclear, Kerr-McGee, Teton Exploration, Bear Creek Uranium and others. Huge pits were dug and two mills were built, one at the Exxon facility, 20 miles to the north and the other at Bear Creek's mine on the old Ross Road.

The Glenrock-Parkerton High School (built in the 1920s) was replaced with a new facility, completed in 1967. That in turn became the Middle School upon completion of a new high school in the Oregon Trail Estates in 1981. Two years later the Administration Building and Oregon Trail Elementary School were added; and in 1984, major expansion of the Middle School was accomplished. With the Fred Grant Elementary School in place, Glenrock can accommodate a total of 1800 to 1900 students.

Yes, times have changed, but Glenrock's heritage lives on. Proud of her past - confident of her future - she remains a community steeped in tradition - a part of the heritage that made America great.

Hyland Community

If it hadn't been for the availability of coal, the homesteaders would have left sooner than they did. The winters were so cold and there was a lot of wind, so fuel was very important.

We had 14 miles to haul coal from the head of the Cheyenne River. It took about 16 double box loads of coal to get us through the winter. We had to take off the overburden so we could get to the coal and sometimes the overburden would cave in and cover the coal. Generally, several people would go with fresno's on the same day to get the mine ready. Then we would hurry back before someone else came and took the coal.

After several years of fighting the overburden, Domsallas leased the mine from the state and, since they were miners in Illinois, opened up the mine. They would load the coal for us for one dollar per load. This made it pretty nice and more and more people came for coal. Mr. Domsalla, the father, would get dinner for everyone. He raised hogs and lots of potatoes, so he set a pretty good table. While the Domsalla boys would load your coal, you went to their cabin and enjoyed a big meal and lots of conversation and beans, beans, etc.

Coal hauling for winter became a pleasurable pastime instead of a dreaded chore. Neighbors brought cake and cookies to help with the dinner and everyone had a good time. Years later, Domsallas got a big truck and delivered coal to anyone wanting it.

In about 1928 the Farm Bureau was very popular with regular meetings held in the communities and a large monthly meeting of all locals. Each month, one community would handle the entertainment for the general meeting so the Hyland Community chose a meeting several months in advance so we could prepare a program. We chose a minstrel show because we thought we would have a lot of fun rehearsing for it. We contacted Scott Layton, a grocer in Douglas, to be the director. It was surprising to see all the local talent and their voices were pretty fair. There were about 20 people in the show, including Dan Reeder, Richard Reeder, Bill Vollman, Earl Schlichting, Lee Fowler and Elmer Cowell. The women blacked up and were in the chorus. We didn't have a piano so once a week we would fill the back end of my truck with cushions and robes and load everyone up to go 30 miles into Douglas to Schlichting's, where we could practice. We did this once a week during the winter. We had a hard time writing the script, so many changes were made. But, finally it was ready and we put the show on in the old high school. We also did shows in Esterbrook, Orin and Glenrock.

In the late '20s we talked about getting mail delivered to this community. Mrs. Eula Spellman seemed to have a lot of interest in it and she did a lot of leg work to locate a route. She invited the commissioners out to her home for Sunday dinner along with several other people from the community. The county had put in several culverts north of the shearing pens. They were not included in the survey so sometimes the water would go around the culvert instead of through it. On one occasion, it had rained the night before. The commissioners became stuck in the mud and had to walk about three miles to Spellmans to get a team to pull them out. Needless to say, they were in favor of a road capable of handling the mailman. We all looked for road location. Harry Gillespie, a commissioner, had the county grader grade a temporary route and also mark spots for culverts. Times were tough and the county had no money, so on the road through Hyland, the people brought four horses and a fresno and moved dirt to cover the culverts.

In the meantime, Mrs. Spellman had contacted the Postal Service and they sent out a man to go over the route. He approved and we had an old fashioned barn dance in Spellman's big barn to celebrate Route 7. Without a doubt, Mrs. Spellman deserves the majority of the credit for getting the mail route started. She gave of her time and drove many miles getting everything put together.

Around 1930, A.E. Hyde, the County Agent, organized a country league of baseball teams. There was one team for each community; Verse, Dry Creek, Hyland, LaPrele, Flat Top, LaBonte, Walker Creek and Shawnee. Every Sunday we had four games. Bylaws were drawn up and rules and regulations were achieved and an exciting summer was enjoyed by all. I had a new Chevy truck and we would put cushions in the bottom and covers and a load would go to the games in it. It got harder to get people out to play. Some were leaving so the teams were consolidated. Dry Creek and Verse, Hyland and Orpha, which continued as the Orphan Annies and got suits for years. Flat Top and Walker Creek threw together. The league lasted several more years and certainly gave the dry farmers something to do during the dry years as well as something for all of us to think about besides the drought and hard times. There was a lot of competition between teams. Thomas Meisner, a rancher in Walker Creek, brought in two ball players from Nebraska to pitch and catch for Walker Creek and, of course, they were good. LaBonte teams would put on a fish fry on July 4th for all players in all teams. The two best teams would play and everyone had all the fish they could eat.

The social life of the Hyland Community started around 1930. It was centered at a school house which was small for meetings, etc. Finally the children of school age outgrew the eighth grade and we made a deal with the school board of District 17 and the people bought the building from the school district.

Mr. Archie Bruce, a carpenter from Douglas, was contacted for ideas on enlarging the school house. They cut it in two, lengthwise, moved the sections apart twelve feet and then enclosed it. They also put in a new floor. The building was kept very busy with dances on Saturday night and also Church Services and Sunday School. Once or twice a month we had a potluck dinner and the whole community would come. The Leuenberger brothers played for the dances and the men would put in 25 cents each to pay for the music. The women would fix sandwiches and cake for the midnight lunch. The dances always started before dark and lasted until daylight because the lights on the Model T cars were not too dependable. About 60 people in the community would attend the dance with hardly anyone coming from town. The young people of the community always attended and we were glad to be able to entertain them in their home community. This was especially nice because we couldn't afford to go to town for our entertainment. Several years later, Mr. Domsalla said that you couldn't get $20 out of the whole dance crowd. Now everyone has $20 but no time to visit.

Janet Post Office

In 1912 LeRoy Moore started the Janet Post Office. He named it after his daughter, Jane. It was located at the Moore ranch northwest of Douglas at Skeleton Springs near Walker and Lightning Creeks. Later it was moved to the William Burbank ranch on Walker Creek and still later to the Bill Kinders, Earl Pounds and finally Lores.

To establish a mail route the mail had to be carried by someone for six months free of charge. In the Walker Creek area the mail was carried by Lewis Hanlin and a neighbor. Each homesteader or rancher had two mail bags made of canvas, one for outgoing mail and one for incoming mail. Twice a week the mail carriers would pick up the mail bags, take them to town to the post office and then leave the bags on their way home. Lewis had 18 gates to open on his way. Rural Route #4 was established in their area and the post office was abandoned.

Lost Springs

In 1880, the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company engaged the services of the Sioux City and Pacific surveyors to plot a route for a railroad line beginning at Lusk and extending, eventually, to Casper, Wyoming. The principal objective of the line was to service the cattle industry which had been shifting northwards from the Texas-Kansas area into the high plains country east of the Rocky Mountains.

That first survey map indicated a spring of some magnitude located in the eastern part of what is now Converse County. When the construction crews reached the area, they were unable to find the spring, but the engineers platted the proposed town, complete with named streets and a depot in the immediate vicinity of the spring's location on the original map. Later on, the spring was found on the homestead of H. B. Card which was located about one mile south of the townsite.

The track was laid in 1886 for the parent company, the Chicago and Northwestern, by a construction crew owned by the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad. The new line was known as the Wyoming Central Railway Company. It was completed to Douglas before the winter of 1886-87 set in. However, it could not be extended further until permission had been granted from the federal government to cross the Fetterman Military Reservation northwest of Douglas. In 1903, the titles, rights and franchises of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad were sold to the Chicago and Northwestern. The line which had been completed as far as Casper by that time, was extended on to Lander, Wyoming.

For approximately five years, a boxcar served as a depot. George Watts Wright acted as the first depot agent and telegraph operator. The sign on the end of the depot read "Lost Springs" during those early years, but when the new depot was constructed in 1913, the name was changed, through error or by intent, to "Lost Spring". Spur lines connecting the coal mines north and west of Lost Springs with the main line were in operation until 1923.

When Charles and Lillian Hitsheew dedicated the land for Lost Springs, there were not a sufficient number of electors to incorporate the town, the required number being 30. Therefore, the ranches which lay within a given radius were included in order to provide the number of electors needed. A map which can be found in the Lost Spring Town Book of Ordinances shows a red connectional line from one ranch to the next, all situated in a rough circle, having the town as its center and its radius about one mile. The line begins at the ranch of R. C. Willey, extends from there to the Howards, from the Howards to H. B. Card, on to G. W. Wright, then to William VanDine, on to George A. Fenton, from there to C. W. Case, on to O. L. Vincent and ends at the starting point, the Willey ranch.

After its incorporation in the fall of 1911, Lost Springs elected its first mayor, William Snyder. Ordinances were passed to govern the citizens. The first provided for the officers of the town including a town marshal for carrying on business and keeping law and order. Other ordinances dealt with public health; speed limits for both horses and cars; one pertaining to disorderly horses and their riders which forbade inebriate or boisterous persons using sidewalks for riding or from entering saloons or other places of business on horseback. Provisions were made for the humane treatment of dumb animals. One must purchase a license for his dog, and licenses were also necessary for places which housed gambling games at the rate of $5 per year for each game table. Theatrical troupes, menageries, and circuses must purchase a license before performing. An ordinance concerning the carrying of concealed weapons, specifically firearms, was passed to prevent persons from settling arguments with knives or pistols.

Since the town was bisected by the tracts of the Northwestern, an ordinance was passed concerning trains of cars which, when stopped across Main Street, obstructed the flow of traffic from the north to the south sides of town. Chimneys, or the lack of them, seemed to be a problem for there are regulations governing their construction.

By 1915, Ordinance No. 17, listed offenses in the nature of misdemeanors, punishable by a fine not to exceed $100. Included were assault and battery, reckless driving, instigating or causing a riot which could end in a fine of 30 days in jail, or both. It was also illegal for person or persons to disquiet or disturb any congregation meeting for religious worship by making noise or by indecent behaviour within or near the place of worship. Profanity and intoxication were also listed as misdemeanors.

About 1907 a building believed to be the first in the city limits was constructed by Ad Spaugh. It was located south of what is today U.S. Highway 20. This building was a combination livery stable and hotel which also housed a post office. It was constructed for the convenience of cowhands and supply wagons used on the immense roundups in the area. It served as a supply depot for them and offered a chance to have a hot bath and a clean bed.

The post office located in the Spaugh building was not the first post office, however. Records indicate that there was a post office of sorts established in 1896 and that the first postmistress was Maggie Holdorf. It is probable that the post office occupied a part of one room in the home of Claus and Maggie Holdorf. Their homestead was located about one and one-half miles north of Lost Springs.

The first bank, called the State Bank of Lost Springs, occupied a corner of the building which also housed the local billiard parlor. To substantiate this statement, there is an old photograph which has a sign reading in large letters "Billiards", and beneath, in much smaller letters, "State Bank of Lost Springs." The charter was granted in 1911, and cancelled in 1927, according to records at the County Clerk's office.

The Citizen's Bank opened its doors October 15, 1916, having G. C. Butterfield, formerly of Pilgen, Nebraska, the principal stockholder and president. Fogarty, Clyde Bowell, Charles Hitschew, William Howard and John Mills were shareholders. This bank was located across the street from the first bank. It was located on the corner of North First and Main Streets. The Butterfield family lived in the rear part of the bank building. Mr. Butterfield is remembered as a heavy set, dark haired individual, his wife, a small petite woman. It was jokingly said of Butterfield that when he died and arrived in Hades, the Devil had better put him in a kettle and put the lid on quick, or Butterfield would have a mortgage on Hell.

The Butterfield Bank purchased the Bank of Shawnee in December of 1925. After Butterfield's death in 1926, John Mills took over the disposition of the bank after it went broke. It was through his efforts that all depositors were paid in full, 100 cents on the dollar. The examiner's office in Cheyenne can verify this statement.

The map which accompanies this account of Lost Springs attempts to indicate the locations of buildings which were erected both north and south of the highway. It is meant solely to provide the reader with a more vivid picture of the town in its early years. It is certainly inaccurate in some respects since it reflects the memories of persons living today who were only small children then.

Actually, though, it is not buildings nor the location of businesses which make a town. It is the people who lived and worked there. Remember "Cheap John"? He had a homestead near Lost Spring and operated a very small General Store in town. He was of Jewish ancestry, a dark-complected man with a long black beard. He was a bachelor, and, reportedly, none too clean. When asked why he did not change his very dirty shirt, or wash it, he would reply that it cost 10¢ to have it washed, but he could buy a new one for only 9¢.

John's tiny 12 x 16 foot store building was located south of First Street on the corner of Main. Since the building was so small, he was obliged to put part of his wares out on the sidewalk in front of his store during business hours. On one occasion, he had placed several jugs of syrup there. Harry Turner, then a small boy, was coasting down First Street in his little red wagon. He turned at the corner in front of the store. Syrup and Harry ended up in a sticky mess.

Another time, John's horse had disappeared from his homestead. Cody Shippen, whose home was northeast of town, found the strayed animal. He went to John and asked him for a complete description of the missing animal. John supplied the information, to which Cody replied that he had a horse which was a "dead ringer" in his pasture. It was John's horse, all right, and the beast was very "dead."

One day Cheap John vanished, never to be seen or heard from again. No amount of searching turned up any clues. What happened to his store, his wares and his belongings? Harry Turner could not remember.

After the town incorporated, the mercantile store belonging to Boyd and Snyder housed the post office. In 1912 the receiver of the first long distance telephone connection was located in that store.

Elmer E. Turner built his meat market in 1910. Elmer, his wife and their two sons lived in a two story house located behind the market. Elmer traveled to local farms or ranches to buy both pork and beef. He slaughtered the animal at the farm, butchered it out, and hauled the carcass back to his market. He carried a tripod and other necessary tools of his trade in his wagon. Elmer had constructed a specially built cooling house. It was about 8 x 12 feet, and had an attic room above. On the attic floor he placed blocks of ice to cool the room below in which he hung his meat.

Art "Colonel" Buffington is remembered as an old, thin man who liked to play poker and drink whiskey. He was the editor of the local newspaper, the "Lost Spring Times." Evidently, he was incarcerated in the town "lock up" regularly to sleep it off. At these times, he would become very loud and somewhat violent. Local youngsters, Harry Turner, Marshall Kamp, Three-rail Posey and the two Fenton boys, Joe and Herbert, took great delight in tormenting the poor man when he was in jail, though when he was out, they were afraid of him. They would go to the jail to "sing" to the colonel, infuriating the man, and causing him to shout even louder. According to Harry, the caterwauling could be heard all over town.

Teasing Art Buffington seemed to delight older persons as well. Once, a bunch of cowhands saw Buffington and his old sway-backed nag standing outside Fogarty's Mercantile. Now the Colonel was very proud of his horse. The men got some itching powder, rubbed it on their hands and went over to the Colonel and his horse. They rubbed their hands over the animal, on his neck, shoulder and hip all the time telling Art what a fine animal he owned. When Buffington mounted the animal a short time later, the horse, almost loco from the intense itching, pitched the hapless Colonel into the street. Said the Colonel, sitting in the dust, scratching his head, "The damned old fool never did that before!"

The home of Bob Howard, who was married and the father of seven children, was located near town. Bob was a strict disciplinarian towards his family and was thought, by the townspeople, to mistreat his family. Rumor has it that they once decided that Bob should be chastised for his treatment of his family and subsequently he was summoned to appear in court to answer for his actions. Mrs. Prudence Howard was in the room to testify that she had been repeatedly beaten by her husband. When asked about it, however, she calmly stated, "If Mr. Howard wants to thrash me, he has a right. He is my husband." Case dismissed.

Bob was known to drive into town in a one-horse buggy. A little while later, Mrs. Howard would come in on foot, carrying whatever produce she had to trade at the store. Later, Mr. Howard would be seen going home in the buggy, and still later, Prudence would go by on foot, carrying the groceries she had purchased.

J. J. Freeland had gas lights installed in his store on Main Street in 1912. That same year, Malcolm and Donald Campbell, sons of Malcolm Campbell, the first sheriff of Converse County, purchased the Fenton Livery Stable.

Remember to visit the Kandy Kitchen when you are in town. You will be sure of a square deal at the hands of Mr. and Mrs. I. M. Coggeshell, proprietors. They carry a full line of drugs, stationery, confectionary and baked goods, and serve lunch on short orders. Ice cream is kept on hand at all times.

Another well-known person in the town was Sadie Fenton. She was a very large woman, weighing some 300 pounds. Unable to buy a chair large enough to fit her comfortably, she had Harry Ruhl make one for her. She must have had a natural flair for nursing since Dr. Hylton, when called from Douglas to attend some ailing citizen, always went by to get Sadie to help him with the sick. Sadie smoked at a time when women were not known to do so. She used Bull Durham and it was said of her that she could roll a cigarette faster with one hand than any man around.

A short distance to the east of Lost Springs, there is a tiny cemetery. The land once belonged to Bob Howard. There are only three small graves there, those of William Davies, born 1911 in Des Moines, Iowa, died 1914 in Lost Springs; Alvin White, stillborn in 1914; Baby Vincent, whose grave has no date. It is of interest to note that the cemetery in which Lost Springs residents buried their dead lies further to the east and south in Niobrara County and that two of the three children buried in the Lost Springs Cemetery were offspring of families living in the Shawnee area, five miles to the west.

Of all the businesses in the town, only one has the distinction of having operated without interruption since it was started so many years ago. This is the General Store which first belonged to Mr. Fogarty. It has been enlarged, the owners changed, but it still is open for business. Lost Springs also is the smallest incorporated town with a post office in the United States. In 1929, according to records of the town council meeting, a Mr. Meinger tried to have the town unincorporated, but failed in his attempt.

The town was incorporated as Lost Springs and all official documents past and present and the town seal reflect this spelling. When the post office came into being, it was also named Lost Springs. Evidence indicates that at some point in time, the postal department changed the spelling to Lost Spring; in the 1950s, the post office once again became Lost Springs.

Lost Springs, a town which over the years has played host to calloused-handed miners, rowdy cowhands, cattle barons, wandering gamblers, stout-hearted homesteaders and aspiring politicians stands today with but five old buildings to mark its place. It was a city born to fill the needs of those who came to settle, to work, and sometimes to proper in Converse County at the turn of the century. Though it is no longer a thriving, bustling community, it seems that the town refuses to become a "ghost town" to be lost in the dust blown by the Wyoming winds.

In 1886, Spencer Moore purchased 80 acres of land from the Wyoming Central Railroad, described as the SW $\frac{1}{4}$ NW $\frac{1}{4}$ ; SE $\frac{1}{4}$ NW $\frac{1}{4}$ , Section 15, Township 32, Range 68. Spencer and his wife, Edith May, had homesteaded about half a mile north of this property.

At this time there were few homesteaders in the area, but during the next decade more and more families were attracted to the community. Coal had been discovered by Everett Onyon in 1904 about three miles northeast of the Moore homestead and the Onyon brothers were developing a working mine which offered employment to persons coming into the area to file claims.

In 1910, a group of six families, those of John Swickhamer, Noal Harkins, Tom and Henry York, Charles Elgin and his father, Tom Elgin, came to Wyoming from Bates County, Missouri to take up homesteads. More families arrived shortly afterwards. The Haas store, located close to the railroad tracks, became the center of the community. In 1911, a post office was established, housed in the store. Chauncey Onyon of Lost Springs, became the first postmaster. The post office was there for only a year, being moved to Lost Springs in 1912. The railroad changed ownership, as well, being sold to the Chicago and Northwestern.

According to abstracts, the 80 acres of land which Moore had bought from the railroad were transferred to Thomas Blair in 1918. Thomas Blair then dedicated this parcel of land to the public for the townsite of Shawnee, hoping that a city would spring up on the empty prairie. He sold lots for houses and businesses at a price of $25.00 per lot. The average size of the lots was 20' wide by 132' deep, which would seem too small for a building for business purposes. In fact, some persons purchased several adjoining lots in order to have sufficient room for their establishments. With the purchase of the lot, the buyer received all the mineral rights.

Blair worked diligently to convince the residents that the town should be incorporated, but his efforts were in vain.

The streets were laid out measuring 60 to 66 feet in width, with the exception of Center Street, which measured only 40'. Evidently, the reason for this was that the land lying west of Center Street was a portion of Section 16, a State School Section.

On December 26, 1918, a patent for the northeast five acres of the N $\frac{1}{2}$ SE $\frac{1}{4}$ , and the southeast five acres of the SE $\frac{1}{4}$ NE $\frac{1}{4}$  of Section 16, Township 32, Range 68 was issued to Mrs. Ida Preuit, having been sold to her by the state for the sum of \$150. She divided the acreage into lots, the first of which she sold in March of 1919. This parcel of land was known as the Preuit Addition, but whether it was ever within the city limits of the town is unknown.

Abstracts also indicate that Rosa Blair, wife of Thomas Blair, dedicated an addition to the town in 1920. After the death of her husband in 1924, Mrs. Blair moved to Yakima, Washington, later disposing of her husband's interests in the town.

The accompanying map and legend show the probable locations of the various businesses, schools and dwellings. This information was provided by descendants of the early inhabitants of the community.

The most imposing building was that of E. J. Sinn, owner and operator of the local lumber company. It was a two storied affair, having the office and supply room of the lumber company on the ground floor to the north and on the south a mercantile store. The two businesses were separated by an enclosed stairway which led to the second floor. On this floor was a large room used as a community hall to the front and to the rear were several small rooms which housed a six bed clinic run by Dr. Earle, physician and surgeon. The clinic was closed after several years, and the rooms were remodeled into two rental apartments. The hall, which was available for many functions, served as gymnasium, dance hall, town meeting hall and was the place where the townsfolk held box socials to raise money for worthy causes, one of which was the purchase of the bell for the school house.

South of the railroad tracks stood the boxcar which served as the Shawnee Depot. The stockyards were nearby and to the west a short distance was the Blair grain elevator. Shortly after its completion, the elevator was destroyed by fire, but another was constructed to take its place. Before it was torn down in 1982 when the Chicago and Northwestern upgraded its tracks to ship coal from Gillette eastward, it was owned by the Gene L. Payne Company of Douglas.

John Masek, a practicing chiropractor, was proving up on his homestead south of Shawnee. He opened a small office in the Preuit Addition where he served the community.

There is a small cemetery located north of the town about half a mile. Some of the graves have been moved to other locations, some are untended, but still others are cared for today. As late as the 1930s funeral services were held in the Community Hall and interment was in the Shawnee Cemetery.

In order to establish a school in the early 1900s, seven pupils between the ages of seven and 18 years were required. Due to the fact that only four of the local children qualified in the year 1910, the resourceful citizens enrolled the two Elgin girls, Blanche, who was just past the age of 18, and her sister, Nora, just under 18, but already married. Dee Harkins, the seventh student was only five years old. The classes were taught by Eva Thesher.

The first school building measured 14' x 28'. It was constructed in 1911, with all the labor being donated. John Swickhamer supervised the work.

By 1912, a sufficient number of qualified students were living in the community. Three children of the Harkins family, three of the White family and the son of John Swickhamer, Lee, made up the student body. Classes were held in the small building for eight years until 1919, when the new building was erected. Then the small building was sold to Mrs. Guy White and was moved to the White homestead, where rooms were added. It was a great improvement over the tiny log building in which the White family had lived when they first homesteaded.

Land for the school was leased to the district in 1917 by Charles and Lulie Seymour and Spencer and Edith Moore, each couple leasing one acre. The leases were to run for 99 years unless the school went unattended for a period of two consecutive years, or was released by the school trustees. In the late 1930's, the acre leased from the Seymours was cancelled and the school stands today on the land which once belonged to Spencer Moore.

The building which was built to house the high school is used today by the community for public gatherings. A new modular building houses the school which is located a short distance west of the old building.

During the years in which there was a high school at Shawnee, the elementary grades held classes in a small building next door to the Jack Wright store. The elementary grades were also housed at one time in the Community Hall. In 1925 two buildings were brought to the school grounds for the elementary grades, one for primary, one to four, and the other for intermediate grades, five to eight. At this time, the enrollment was the largest, listing between 150 and 200 students. Fred Logan, who had taught in Shawnee for some years, was appointed as superintendent. His teaching staff consisted of two teachers, Nancy Jones and Helen McCartney.

In 1928 the first class graduated from the Shawnee High School. It consisted of three students, Britton "Harry" Crosley, Lorena Johnson and Gladys Crosley. Bus routes were established to bring the children from both north and south of Shawnee. The length of the routes was determined by the location of the homes of school-aged children.

Competitive sports were a part of the school curriculum for many years. The first boys basketball team was organized in 1922 with Fred Logan acting as coach. The first girls team was organized in 1932. Towns which competed against Shawnee were Glendo, Manville, Sunrise and Lusk. The adults in the community were also sports minded. They organized a baseball team which competed with other small communities in the area such as Orin, Lost Springs, Manville and Keeline.

Not many buildings remain in Shawnee today, nor are there many persons living there, but it served the area well in those early days, providing a convenient place to purchase supplies, pick up the mail and educate the children. As with so many other towns, it thrived only as long as it was useful.

The range was open at that time. The large cattle herds grazing in the area belonged, for the most part, to Tom Bell and Jim Shaw, while H.B. Card owned most of the bands of sheep. These stockmen had an imaginary line running north to south close to Shawnee and agreed among themselves that the cattle could graze on one side of the line, the sheep on the other, but neither could invade the other's territory.

The Moore homestead north of Shawnee lay within the open range and was unfenced at the time. They had a real problem with loose cattle and sheep trampling and destroying their crops. Mrs. Moore was a heavy-set lady, noted for her home brew beer which was in great demand by the cowhands tending the stock. Her reputation was no insurance against the invasion of her property by loose stock however.

On one occasion, Mrs. Moore in desperation took drastic action. She hitched her horse to a two-wheeled cart, and enlisting the help of a neighbor to act as driver, she planted her ample personage upon the seat. She was armed with a double-barrelled shotgun loaded with rock salt. Whipping the horse into a gallop they went bumping and bouncing across the sagebrush covered prairie in pursuit of the offending cattle. Mrs. Moore peppered the cattle with salt till their behinds were raw, but she protected her precious crops.

Of interest is the fact that there was no saloon or pool hall in Shawnee in the beginning which is unique. During the 1934-1936 depression and drought years, the local meat market in Shawnee accepted and butchered some of the slaughtered livestock, which they then returned to the persons who had owned them for food. The owner of the market was a man named Hicks. His wife, Faye, canned much of the meat to keep it from spoiling.

The Jack Wrights were the parents of eight children, all of whom died before reaching legal age excepting one who lived to the age of 32, when he died of pernicious anemia.

Antelope Coal Mine

The Antelope Coal Mine is located near the Antelope Creek in the north central part of Converse County 55 miles north of Douglas on the Gillette Highway and ten miles northeast on graveled road.

It consists of 120 acres of state land leased February 1, 1931 by Jesse Morsch and operated under the name of Antelope Coal Co.

A small tonnage of coal was sold for a couple of years, then increased each year for a number of years.

The lease expired February 1, 1936 and Jesse Morsch obtained a new lease for ten years, operating under the name of Best Coal Co.

It showed steady gain in tonnage each year. It sold for $1.00 a ton when Jesse Morsch first took over. The peak years were from 1942 to 1946. Yearly tonnage these years were around 10,000 to 11,000 tons.

All work at the mine was hand labor until 1944 when power shovels were used to eliminate most of the hand labor and coal hoppers were built for lump and pea coal which gave better service to the public.

From 1947 on, the production started to be less each year and when the mine was sold to Ernest Ireton on March 1, 1951 production was about 7,000 tons a year selling for $3.50 per ton.

It was a strip mine and the coal vein maximum thickness was 38 feet. When the mine was sold March 1, 1951, the coal vein was about 22 feet in thickness.

Ernest continued the operation of the mine under the name of Best Coal Company. When the lease expired in 1956 Ernest obtained a new lease for 99 years and carried on the mining operations until 1964. Due to ill health he sold the mine to his step-son, Kenneth Brannan.

Kenneth had been in the mining business about a year when the disastrous flood on Antelope Creek destroyed everything at the mine on June 14, 1965 and took Kenneth's life.

Kenneth had gone to the mine in the late afternoon to blast down coal so he would have it ready when Herman Werner's hired man came early the next morning for a truck load of lump coal.

A neighbor living near by reported seeing a few heavy black clouds to the west that evening, but nothing that should cause anyone to be alarmed.

Kenneth had no doubt retired early and was sound asleep, when without warning at about eleven o'clock, allegedly a 60 foot depth of swift rushing water carrying a mass of conglomeration (tree branches, rocks, clay, sand and other debris) filled the mine pit. Its next destruction was the living area north of the pit. The cook house, main house, where Kenneth lived, and other buildings were torn and crumbled to pieces as were many more things, which were carried along with the swift rushing current of water, as it sped downstream for miles.

When the water subsided the next day, Kenneth's body was found about  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a mile downstream in a mass of debris and fence wire. The men who found the body predicted that when the fence that crossed the creek collected more debris than it could hold, the wire, under the pressure, suddenly broke, throwing the fence and debris, with Kenneth's body, on higher ground.

There were very few things salvaged. The machinery and equipment remains covered in the mine pit with conglomeration deposits and water. The weight scales were found leaning against a tree a mile downstream. Household furniture, refrigerators and other items were found half buried in packed sandrock. Boards and other building materials were found among debris lodged against trees, and scattered in other places as far as 20 to 30 miles downstream. The valuable receipts, debit record files and the cash register were never located.

All that is left of the mine are the cement foundations where the buildings once stood and a pond of water that covers the pit.

Where there was once a well known producing coal mine and landmark may in the future be another landmark that will be a thing of the past, "Lost and Forgotten."

Burning Mountain Home Coal Mine

(As remembered by August Riehle and dictated to the author, Mrs. Velma Steckley)

The mine is located east of the Dry Creek Store near the Mountain Home Coal Mine and about two miles from the August Riehle homestead. The description being given is Township 39, Range 68 West of the 6th P.M., Section 22: SE $\frac{1}{4}$ .

The origin of the burning mine has never been determined. However, it is believed that the heat from the sun caused a combustion of the coal below the surface.

In 1919 August Riehle helped haul poles and timber across the area that later became a burning mass of flames. At that time when they were hauling poles from the timber land east of the mine to his father's ranch near the Dry Creek Store there was no sign of any burning area. In 1924 the Riehles attempted to use this road again but discovered that the once traveled road was now a burning pit. The ground was sunken 10 to 12 feet with deep wide cracks in the earth and bursting forth from these cracks were flames of all colors; red, yellow, orange, bluish-white to a deep blue. The cracks were sometimes a foot across. It is definitely agreed that it started burning sometime in the early '20s, probably about 1921. The government, several years later, attempted to put out the fire but failed.

The site became a spot for picnickers and historical interest. Hundreds of people flocked there each year to observe its significance and beauty. At night the brilliant flames could be seen for several miles. People who dared to venture close enough to peer between the cracks were forced back by the intense heat.

Years went by and the burning pit became larger until it covered approximately 60 acres of land and an enormous amount of coal was being destroyed every day.

In 1950 the government finally realized the vast amount of coal that was being wasted each year by fire and put up for bids to contractors to have all burning mines put out. The Isbell Bros. of Riverton got the bid for this mine and began work on it in the summer of 1950. It took them three to four months to complete the job. The mine was surveyed, holes drilled around it to determine how close workers could get without running the risk of losing their lives. The crew took large bulldozers and smoothed the rough country around it for working, then they hauled dirt in and pushed it over the burning area until they had it completely covered and smothered out. The extermination of this one mine cost the government approximately $80,000.00. Other mine fires throughout Wyoming were put out the same year.

Niemcyk Mine

Niemcyk Mine

There is another coal mine located near the Antelope Creek about a mile east of the Best Coal Company Mine, on Antelope Creek. In the 1920s it was called the East Antelope Coal Mine operated by Elmer Gladson and his brother.

Felix Niemcyk bought this mine from the Gladsons in 1933. He obtained a state land lease in 1933 and operated the mine under the name of Niemcyk Coal Mine. He carried on the operation of the mine up until the time of his death on April 7, 1943.

Felix's wife, Hazel, with the help of Felix's brother, Albert, whom Hazel later married, continued the operation of the mine for several years. Hazel then sold the equipment, closed the mine and moved to Newcastle, Wyoming.

The mine was not in operation for about 20 years after Hazel and Albert left. After the flood, which destroyed the Best Coal Mine in 1965, Wayne Brannan, step-son of Ernest Ireton, reopened the Niemcyk Coal Mine in the fall of 1965. Wayne operated the mine, selling stoker and lump coal. It was in the 1970s that the Federal Government passed strict regulations concerning mine equipment. If Wayne were to have continued to operate the mine he would have had to purchase the equipment required, which would have been costly and useless to a one man mine operation, so Wayne closed the mine in 1975.

The mine has been purchased by NERCO Coal Company, and coal is again being mined at the site in 1986.

Onyon Coal Mine

In the month of August in 1904, Everett Onyon was riding across some open range when he noticed something which appeared to be the den of some animal. Curious, Everett dismounted and began to dig. After enlarging the opening, he discovered it led to a sizeable room which proved to be a deserted coal mine. The old shaft was in good condition and there were mining tools lying about. Everett was elated! He was convinced that there was an excellent chance that the mine could be developed into a profitable operation. He lost no time filing the necessary prospector claim.

The mine was located on land which belonged to the State of Wyoming, being the W $\frac{1}{2}$  of Section 36, Township 33, Range 68. Evidently, Everett entered into some sort of agreement with the state in order to begin the development of the mine.

The Onyon brothers, Everett and Chauncey, had come to Wyoming in 1895 and had taken homesteads. One tract was located in the SE $\frac{1}{4}$  of Section 2, less than a quarter mile from Everett's discovery. They had built a ranch house there made of hand hewed logs, which was considerably larger and more comfortable than the average homestead dwelling. Near the house they drilled a well and struck artesian water. The Onyon brothers raised cattle, horses and later sheep on their holdings.

The operation of the mine began on a small scale, probably sometime in 1905. At first a short span of railroad track was laid into the mine, extending only a little distance outside the mine entrance. Carts, traveling on the tracks, were pushed into the mine, loaded and brought out by a steam powered winch where the coal was then loaded into horse drawn wagons by hand. A three sided windbreak, eight or ten feet high, made of hand hewed logs, offered some protection from the elements to the boiler and winch. Outside of the enclosure, but close by, was a wooden water tank which stored the water for the boiler. The open end of the enclosure faced the entrance of the mine.

When the brothers decided to expand and form the Lost Springs Coal Company, their father, Baxter Onyon, and their uncle, William Sprague, participated in the venture.

The track beds and the grades were built using four horse fresnos to move the dirt. Culverts, made by placing two large fresnos about 30' long parallel to each other and joining them by nailing 3' sections of slab wood across the top, served to drain the water away from the fills.

As the business grew, buildings and better facilities were added. A basic tippie was built so that the loaded cars could be dumped directly into the wagons, thus eliminating much of the hand labor. The windbreak surrounding the winch and boiler was replaced by an enclosed building. Several dwellings were built for the convenience of some of the miners and their families. These were located in a cluster some distance from the tippie.

In 1908, both Everett and Chauncey Onyon returned to Harvey, Illinois to marry. Upon their return to Wyoming, the Chauncey Onyons lived in the town of Lost Springs, while Everett and his wife, Sabra, lived at the ranch. The brothers built a phone line connecting the two residences the telephone being of the hand crank variety. In October of 1910, Vera O. Onyon, Chauncey's wife, was granted a homestead patent on 151.24 acres of land which adjoined the ranchland.

In order to facilitate the shipment of the coal, the Onyon brothers built a new tippie which would accommodate railroad cars. They constructed a spur line from the main Chicago and Northwestern Railroad to the mine, a distance of about three and one quarter miles. The loaded cars from the mine then could be pulled up on the Tippie and the coal emptied into grading screens and then into the railroad cars. They also purchased a railroad engine which pulled the loaded railway cars to the main line.

The coal from the mine did not ship well. It tended to "slack" or become powdery when exposed to the sun and air for long periods of time. Chauncey wanted to try to make "brickettes" of it, but the company never achieved the financial status to venture into that operation.

It is of interest to note that among the documents provided by the Onyon family for this history are several having to do with G. D. Butterfield. Butterfield owned and operated the Citizen's State Bank of Lost Springs. He came to Wyoming in 1911. A prospector's lease to mine coal on the W½ of Section 36 was held by Mr. Butterfield in 1919. He assigned the lease to C. W. and E. F. Onyon on the 16th of June in 1921, with the approval of the Commissioner of Public Lands. It is not clear how or why Butterfield held the lease.

The lease was quite detailed. It was to run for five years with a yearly rent of $100 per year, in advance, to be applied upon the royalty of six cents per ton due on all coal mined from the premises. Lessee agreed to make a true and correct statement of all coal mined during each month of the term of the lease; statements were to be accompanied by a remittance of the royalty on all coal mined during the preceding month, except where such remittances had not as yet equalled the advance payment. Only such portions of the surface as were necessary to properly conduct mining operations should be disturbed, and the lessee should fully protect the rights of all grazing leases which had been heretofore granted or which would be hereinafter granted, by erecting fences, and keeping closed all gates in all fences, and enclosing and keeping covered all shafts, holes, or open cuts, for the protection of stock grazing upon said premises. The lease could be cancelled at any time by the lessee, by giving 30 days written notice thereof to the Commissioner of Public Lands. The document shows that the brothers made a yearly rental payment in 1919 and one in 1920.

Various problems such as cave-ins and flooding helped to halt the mining operation coupled with the fact that a late May blizzard in 1922 decimated their livestock. That same year, the Onyon brothers mortgaged all of their remaining stock, 40 head of horses and 44 head of cattle for a sum of $1750 indicating that they were in poor financial shape. The mine closed and the elder brother, Everett, returned to Harvey, Illinois to make his home in 1925. Chauncey moved to Midwest to work in the Salt Creek oil field there.

The mine, while in full operation, employed about 25 men. It was of great benefit to the people in the community, providing a source of income to homesteaders who were in the process of proving up on their land. There is little evidence today of the extensive operation carried on by the Onyon brothers. The hand of time has erased all traces of their ambitious undertaking.

Poison Lake

The Natural Epsom Salts Company's project located approximately 20 miles southwest of Douglas created quite a stir in the community in 1916. The company intended to extract the mineral sulphate of magnesia out of the natural lake located nearby and process it into the product Epsom Salts. The lake was known locally as Poison Lake. The effect of the water on livestock who drank it was well known by stockmen of the area - death was the result when they consumed too much. Stockmen fenced the lake to keep cattle from drinking the water. While on a tour of the area in latter years, owner Silas Guthrie told his son, Rodney, "We hauled the wire from Rock Creek, Wyoming in the 1880s to fence out the cattle."

The Natural Epsom Salts Company was incorporated on August 30, 1916 for $100,000 with William A. Bell, Jefferson H. Darris, William S. Jackson, Jr., Henry J. Arnold, and John E. Lunstrom as directors.

An article in the June 22, 1916 edition of "The Douglas Budget" had the following to say about the project. "An analysis of the water shows that the principal ingredient is sulphate of magnesia from which comes the commercial Epsom Salts. A company, which has been promoted by W. P. Spaugh of Manville, has been formed and started operations at the lake for transforming the "poison" waters into the salts. A plant will be built immediately.

"At the head of the company is Dr. William A. Bell, one of Denver's prominent citizens. Associated with him is W. M. Arnold of Denver, one-time Mayor of that city.

"Dr. Bell is one of the interesting figures in the building of Colorado. To him more than anyone else is given the credit of the building of the Denver and Rio Grand R.R. of which he was vice president. He was the man who secured the English capital to finance the project, bringing to Colorado $20,000,000 of English money. He was one of the builders of Colorado Springs and laid out the town of Manitou."

Another article in "The Douglas Budget" in 1916 said: "The supply of Epsom Salts has heretofore come from Austria-Hungary and Greece. 30,000 tons are used in this country every year."

It was at this time that a road was laid out over Poison Lake Pass. Previously the road had gone down Wagonhound Creek.

Evidently the project was a failure as little more was heard of it, and the company was dissolved on July 20, 1927 by Wyoming's Secretary of State.

All that are left on the site in 1985 are the fence around the lake that is kept up by owners of land surrounding the lake and a forlorn run-down cement building.

Rosin and Sunset Coal Mines

Orville Vincent established the Rosin Coal Mine as a private business venture in 1909. Later, being unable to finance the business, he sold stock in the Rosin Coal Company. The stockholders were Nebraska farmers for the most part. The Rosin was productive for some three years, but was shut down in 1912 for some reason. A caretaker by the name of Hoge was hired to look after the premises. The mine was re-opened in 1914, and was in operation for a year or more before it was closed permanently. Al Hoge's wife, Ida, was employed to cook for the miners during the latter period.

The Rosin Mine is located about eight miles north and one mile west of Lost Springs, Wyoming. It was a pretentious operation, consisting of numerous buildings, a private power plant to supply electricity to the mine and the buildings, modern plumbing and a telephone line connecting the office building with the city of Lost Springs.

The largest of the buildings, 18' x 24' housed the main office. It was a two-storied structure, the office occupying the main floor and the second floor providing storage space for extra cots, mattresses and supplies. To the south of the main building was a small general store and to the south of that was the cook house, measuring 24' x 30'. There the meals were prepared and served to the miners and other employees. North of the office building were located a power house, a blacksmith shop and a bath house. The bath house was equipped with several enameled bathtubs for the comfort and convenience of the mine personnel.

Northeast of the bath house stood the bunk house where the miners slept during the work week. The bath house was flanked on the north by the main track extending from the mine entrance past the tippie and roundhouse and joining the main track of the spur railroad. A cement cistern completed the building complex. Since there was no water at the mine, it was hauled in tank cars from a pumping station located west of Lost Springs. They unloaded this water into the cistern near the power plant. The water was used for steam power as well as for human consumption.

Many of the men who worked in the mine were homesteaders in the area. Several whose homes were as much as 15 miles distant walked to and from their homesteads each weekend, spending the remainder of the week toiling in the mine. According to Miss Lillie Meinzer, men earned from 85¢ to $1.00 per day, of which it cost 75¢ per day for room and board.

The men were paid by the number of small cars of coal which they dug each day. When one hired on, he was issued a number with several "Coal Checks". These checks were copper discs about the size of a 50 cent piece. Each was engraved with "Rosin Coal Company" and a large number, and in each was a round hole to accommodate a nail. If a worker's number was nine, then his checks were all numbered with nine. Each time he loaded a car of coal and hauled it from the mine, one check was hung on his nail. At the end of the day, the checks were counted, and the wages for the day then computed.

The work was very strenuous. The main tunnels were five to six feet high and the "rooms" off the main tunnel four to five feet high. Each of the rooms had rails laid on the floor which joined with the main line in the main tunnel. Mules were used in the main tunnel to pull the cars full of coal out of the rooms to the mine entrance. There, an electric locomotive moved the small cars to the tippie located east of the bath house. Due to the fact that the veins of coal were not thick, the miners spent most of their time in a stooped position or on their knees. There was no electricity in the "rooms" so the miners used lamps which burned a special oil. The wicks in the lamps were cylindrical in shape, about as large as a lead pencil. Though they provided enough light for the miners to work by, they gave off a large amount of smoke.

After the coal was hauled to the tippie and loaded on coal cars, it was transported on a spur track called the Wyoming Northern by means of a steam locomotive. West of Lost Springs the spur joined the main line of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad. Upon reaching the junction, the steam engine was turned around and returned to the mine with empty cars. The loaded cars were maneuvered about the yards with mule teams.

The Sunset Mine was smaller than the Rosin Mine. It was located three miles north of the Rosin. There was a large four room house there, a barn, cook house and a bunk house. Mules were used to pull the coal cars out of this mine too, and to deliver it to the railroad spur at the Rosin. Plans had been made to build an additional spur over to the Sunset, but the plans did not materialize.

The primary reason for the dissolution of these mines was probably due to the quality of the coal. It was of the lignite variety, soft, burnt quickly and produced a great deal of ash and clinker. Since the veins at both mines were close to the ground surface, the coal was flaky. Upon being exposed to the weather, it deteriorated rapidly to slack coal or small lumps rather than remaining in big solid chunks. This, of course, reduced its saleability since it must be hauled long distances by rail.

The site of the Rosin Mine is almost obliterated. The main entrance has long since caved in. A tipple about a half mile to the north is still discernable. It was the entrance to a vein which was mined by Henry "Sugar" McGowan for ten or 15 years after the Rosin Coal Company was dissolved. The cement foundations of most of the buildings lie in the gulleys below the mine and the cement cistern has been almost filled with dirt. The railroad fill which ran from the mine to Lost Springs is still definite. The wooden trestles which bridged the gulleys and creeks are gone, as are the rails and spikes. After the closure of the mine, the building materials, rails, tools, ties and any other thing which the homesteaders in the area felt would "come in handy" were taken away long ago. It is hard to believe that such an establishment really existed as one stands among the jack pine and cedar trees at the site of the mine. It did though, a product of the dreams and efforts of Orville Vincent and his backers, the farmers from Nebraska.

ORGANIZATIONS

Woodbine No. 18 Order Eastern Star

On January 5, 1906, 38 ladies and 39 gentlemen met and signed a petition for a dispensation, solicitating for the organization of a Chapter of the Order of Eastern Star, at Douglas, Converse County, Wyoming. This petition was accompanied by a certification that the names of the gentlemen were indeed Master Masons, in good standing in Ashler Lodge No. 10 A.F. & A.M. This certificate was signed by Frank S. Knittle, Worshipful Master and attested under seal of the Order by Otto H. Bolln, Secretary of Ashler Lodge. There being no fault to be found in the petition, authorization was given for Brother Charles H. Townsend of Fort Casper, Chapter No. 4 Casper, Wyoming to convene the petitioners and confer the degrees and to collect the Charter fee of $20. This happy event took place on May 16, 1906.

The Charter, which hangs on the south wall in the southeast corner of the Chapter room was granted by the General Grand Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star under date of September 18, 1906 certifying Sister Jennie Phillips Worthy Matron and Archie D. Cook Worthy Patron.

Originally Woodbine Chapter's jurisdiction extended over what is now Converse and Niobrara Counties, but on August 21, 1907 the Chapter was petitioned for a waiver of jurisdiction and for consent to the organization of a Chapter at Lusk, Wyoming. Consent was granted and on September 5, 1907 Niobrara Chapter No. 26 Lusk, Wyoming was chartered.

Election of officers for Woodbine took place on December 19, 1906 and on January 2, 1907 all officers elected and appointed were installed: The Worthy Matron Jennie Phillips, the Worthy Patron Brother J. M. Lowndes and secretary Sister Ella J. Peters.

The last minutes of any meeting of the Chapter in 1918 were dated October 2, 1918 and it was recorded that eleven members were present. Following this October meeting, the next meeting was January 15, 1919. The meetings having been resumed, the officers elected and appointed were installed. No explanation for skipping the meetings between those dates has been given, but it may influenza epidemic prevalent at that time.

At the meeting October 31, 1931, the Chapter commemorated its 25th anniversary, Bessie Leman, Worthy Matron and Floyd Bartling, Worthy Patron. Brother J. M. Lowndes, who had moved away, was present and spoke interestingly and entertainingly of the early history of the Chapter.

During the early 1930s times were very bad. These were dry years, business was slow and finances were low. Many members found it difficult and others impossible to pay their dues. The Chapter Treasury was in distress and the Masonic Building Committee was not receiving all of the rent from many using the Temple. Project Committees from the Chapter were serving dinners, when they had the opportunity, and the charge was $.50 per plate, proof that money was hard to come by.

In 1934 the Chapter turned over to the Masonic Building Association $600.00 in Masonic Temple Bonds it had acquired when times were better. This paid the back rentals and applied a balance toward payment of the 1934 rental.

Sister Leona Bartling presided as Worthy Matron in the year 1935. Plans were being discussed and committees appointed to assist in entertaining The Grand Chapter Meeting which was to be held in Douglas that year.

The Grand Chapter meetings were held in the high school gymnasium during the latter part of August 1935. The Masonic Grand Lodge was meeting on the same dates in Douglas. It should be noted that Brother Floyd Bartling was Master of Ashler Lodge No. 10 at this time. The Grand Chapter Meeting at Douglas was pronounced an outstanding success, splendidly complimented and by many it was said to be the best Grand Chapter Meeting in 20 years. A highlight of the meeting was for Sister Daisy Anderson, a former citizen of Douglas who had organized Job's Daughters the first Bethel in Wyoming at Douglas, was elected Grand Associate Conductress of the Grand Chapter. Sister Daisy became Grand Worthy Matron in August 1937. She was once a native of Douglas.

Sister Leona was presented with a gavel made from cedar wood, taken from a telegraph pole off the line on the Old Oregon Trail, in appreciation of her diligence and devotion to the Chapter.

Following the summer vacation the regularly scheduled meeting September 1, 1935 was postponed due to an epidemic of infantile paralysis and no meeting was held on April 6, 1955 due to a severe storm, but rare indeed are cancelled meetings, even during the severe winter of 1949 all meetings were held at their regular times.

October 17, 1956 Lawana Davis, Worthy Matron and Lee H. Davis, Worthy Patron opened the Chapter to celebrate the 50th anniversary of Woodbine Chapter. There were 150 members and friends present including Past Grand Officers, one of these was Sister Effie Lowndes who was an original member of Woodbine, later affiliating with Fort Casper Chapter No. 4.

In September of 1981, Dorothy Taylor was serving as Worthy Matron, and it was time to celebrate 75 years of sisterhood for Woodbine No. 18. This was 50 years since her grandmother, Bessie Leman had celebrated the silver anniversary.

Something worthy and commendable occurred during the reign of all Past Matrons and Patrons while they were serving in the East, all have served with dedication and devotion for the Order of Eastern Star and all that it stands for: Faith in Christ, Truth, Love, Fidelity, Hospitality, Aid to the Distressed, and Fellowship.

Extension Homemakers Clubs

Some men won't admit it, but all women are practical! It takes a practical head to manage a household and meet the problems of cookery, comfort and clothing which every housewife must solve.

There was, and is, one problem with which even the most practical nature cannot deal-all women get lonely, and delight in the company of their kind. These are general conditions which faced homemakers of Converse "Live and Learn" club having a hobo party. Top row: l. to r.: Phoebe Barnes, Mary Brooks, Violet Grabow, unknown, unknown, Hazel Johnson, Hattie Martindale, Ethel Cowell, and Lucille Beaver. Seated, l. to r.: unknown, Nona Oak, Georgia Horton, Etta Hoffman, Lillian Dickau, unknown, Gertrude Falkenburg, Agnes Davis, and Clara Fulton.

County from the earliest date down to September 1984. It is with much anticipation and enthusiasm that women, then and now, look forward to the organization of Home Demonstration Clubs (now Home Extension Clubs) in this area. Now there are active clubs in rural, urban and city.

Converse County Extension homemakers clubs have varied from six to as many as 33 since their organization in 1924. The first two clubs organized were Walker Creek Progressive on April 23, 1924 (now Walker Creek) and Lower LaPrele in June 1924 (now LaPrele). The clubs had noon meals and the first meetings were attended by women on horseback often with a tot both fore and aft or brought by the husband in Model T's. At present, there are eight active clubs: Douglas Homemakers, Dozen Doers, Dry Creek Moms and Tots, LaBonte, LaPrele, North Platte, Sundowners and Walker Creek with 140 members. Over the years there have been male members.

The first recreation camp was held at Careyhurst the summer of 1927. Women from all clubs were present. This practice of having women's recreational camps was continued for several years and proved to be popular and educational.

Beginning in 1929, the first years of extension work, the Extension leaders came to each community to give the club their demonstrations. It finally became necessary for leaders from clubs to meet the specialists through county leader training meetings because request for training had grown so great.

In 1932 a song writing contest was held and Edna Presba of the Orin Club won first place.

CONVERSE COUNTY HOMEMAKERS SONG

(Tune: Wearing of the Green)

Our home is out in Converse
Where there's plenty of room and air,
Where the fields are broad and fertile
And the weather is mostly fair.

We have farms and we have ranches
We have many noble streams;
We have fifteen club of Homemakers
We will join to sing their names.

Now there's Sand Creek, Dry Creek, Deer Creek
And there's Happy Hollow too:
And there's Walker Creek and Cheyenne
Which into a river grew.

Shawnee, Orpha, Shawnee Basin;
Upper LaPrele makes nine;
LaBonte, LaPrele, Hyland, Orin,
Boxelder - makes it fine.

We have learned a home to manage
We have learned to bake and do;
How to serve and save and clean and sew
And can a cow or two.

We are proud of Converse County
Where this little song was born;
Of our clubs and our Farm Bureau
So we'll loudly toot our horn.

If you'll join us in our meetings
Then we'll tell you of our plans
How we've filled with fruits and jellies

Rows and rows of empty cans.

Converse homemakers are happy and her clubs are hustlers, too;
And we greet you at this meeting,
For we like to work with you.

Extension work was discontinued in 1933 with no County Agent or Home Demonstration Agent to carry on the work. For seven years this caused many clubs to fold and become only a memory. However, six clubs carried on and held regular meetings without assistance from Extension personnel. During these seven years Eula Brockway served part of 1933 and Edna Presba 1933-34 as County chairman. Nora Wilkinson served 1935-40.

Whether by accident or design, home demonstration groups solved the problem of companionship for the ranch wives. No distance was too great, no means of conveyance too ignoble to keep these women from their monthly club meetings.

The first homemaker clubs in this area were begun in 1924. Mary Rokhar from the university and County Agent A. E. Hyde helped the clubs organize. The charter members of Walker Creek Progressive were Charlotte Anderson, Frances Beaver, Lorinda Cram, Mrs. Willard Vernon, and four other ladies. Lower LaPrele charter members were Caroline Curtin, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Roush, Mrs. Brown, Lillian Pexton, Ica Beach, Eula Brockway, Mrs. Mitchell, and Mrs. Prickett.

Since 1940 Converse County has had a County Agent and Home Demonstration Agent (now called Extension Home Economist) with on-going Extension programs.

Club meetings not only lead to fact and food but to fancy as well. LaBonte Club put on two plays "Coming Around the Mountain," 1952, and a three act comedy play "Arrellia Bridge from Hemlock Ridge," June 1954.

LaPrele Club had a memorable "Amos An' Andy." North Platte presented various skits. Dry Creek had an active literary branch which gave plays. Various clubs in the county presented comedy skits. One of significance is "Little Brown Jug".

On October 18, 1947, the Converse County Homemakers, cooperating with the townspeople of Douglas, planned and organized the "Shoppers Lounge." The first Shoppers Lounge was located in three rooms in the back of the Converse County Bank building. Mrs. Sarah Bushey was the first matron. Mrs. Ela Good was matron for 29 years. At 101 years of age she still worked two days a week, until the lounge was closed on July 1, 1984 due to the lack of a need for it. The average number of visitors per day since 1947 was 20. Over the years, there have been visitors from as far away as Canada, Libya, France, England and Scotland.

National Home Demonstration Week, now called National Extension Homemakers Week, has been observed the first week in May since 1945 and Converse County Homemakers have participated in the activities during that week each year.

A wide variety of projects and activities have been carried. Among those are: Achievement day since 1931 - gives members a chance to review their work and see how their club compares with others in the area; County Spring Tea during the first week of May; Hobby Day

-where members display their hobbies and have demonstrations; Culinary Fair - a display of their culinary work; Consumer Day - a showing of new items and techniques; Annual Smorgasbord - serving 500 to 750 people to support the American Heart Association of Wyoming from 1964-1986, (the smorgasbord also supports the local Throat Culture Program since 1970 - 1986; participation in the County Health Fair; and the homemakers current project is child seat belt rental.

A number of teaching projects have been given. A few of them are: dress forms, hat making and sewing contests, cheese making, soap making, water refrigeration, pressure canning, and many, many more too numerous to mention here.

The County Homemakers adopted a Japanese boy, Kiyomitsua from Yokahoma, Japan in 1963-1964.

The County Homemakers started and used a point system in 1967 to credit clubs for their activities. This was used for several years.

Man's Eye View - And what do the men think of home demonstration club activities? In the beginning, charter members found some husbands distant, or even cool toward the entire project. Perhaps they tended to look on the organization as another of "those women's Tom fool notions". The ladies not only overcame this minor thorn in their determination, but developed their husbands into ardent supporters.

All they did was invite the men along, provide loads of their famous food, and club days became as much a part of the male social calendar as it was with the homemakers and children. Still today, some clubs meet for a noon family meal.

GRANDMA'S LYE SOAP

2 cans lye	1 10# pail melted fats
1 box 20 Mule Team Borax	1 10# pail cold water
1 bottle citronella

Melted, strained fats should be hot but not boiling. Pour water into an earthenware crock. Carefully add lye. Stir with a long stick. Keep as far away from fumes and vapor as you can and still be able to stir it. Stir until lye is dissolved. Add hot fat, borax and citronella, then stir at an even steady pace. Stir until soap is the consistency of cooked cereal.

At this time, a drop off the end of the stick will leave a mark in the mixture. Pour into a large enameled pan. Cover and wrap tightly so as to keep steam inside. Let set overnight. Next morning cut into bars, set out before storing or grinding.

DEPRESSION FLOWERS

Take an ordinary clinker, or a chunk of coal may be used. Put the clinker in a large bowl and pour over it a mixture of the following: Two tablespoons of water, bluing and salt. The next day, add two tablespoons salt; third day, repeat the first mixture and in addition, sprinkle a few drops of mercurochrome and iodine over the top. Then let stand, away from the sun. If the plant becomes dry, add water to the bowl and occasionally some salt.

Converse County Extension Service

The Smith-Lever Act of 1914 created the framework for the Extension Service followed by the Enabling Act of the Wyoming State Legislature which provided for a contract agreement between County Commissioners and the University of Wyoming.

A. F. Scott was appointed the first County Agent in 4-H camp at 1920's state fair; Beryl Hornbeck is one of the delegates.

Converse County on February 18, 1918. Converse County had long been dominated by big sheep and cattle men, but the coming of the homestead ended the era of free range. The new homesteaders welcomed the coming of a County Agent as they needed his advice. The ranchers felt that if the agent would let the dry farmer alone he would soon starve out and leave. Thus, the stockmen were slow to accept the agent and many opposed the county spending money for his support. Mr. Scott resigned after six months service. The following spring the Board of County Commissioners cancelled their contract with the university.

Four years later, with a change in County Commissioners, a new contract was negotiated and on May 1, 1922, Glen McBeth was hired. McBeth started 4-H club work and introduced home economics work for rural women, as well as working with farmers. He resigned in February 1923 to farm for himself. A. E. Hyde was transferred to fill the vacancy. He had been serving as County Agent in Niobrara County. Hyde served for about ten years and is best remembered for developing leaders in agriculture, home economics and 4-H club work. Mr. Hyde also did pioneer work in organizing a Farm Bureau; in the planting of trees and shrubs in Douglas and on farms and ranches; and in organizing farmers cooperative marketing.

Gayle Neubauer was the first Home Demonstration Agent in Converse County. She began work on April 1, 1929.

In the '30s, as the great drought and depression started, stockmen began to demand a cut in taxes and county expenses. The County Commissioners again cancelled the contract and in June 1933 Mr. Hyde and Miss Neubauer left the county.

With the government's cattle and sheep purchase program in 1934, an Emergency Assistant, Archie Hale, was placed in the county in May to implement the program and to attend to other emergency problems as they arose. When the emergency work was completed and funds were used up, Mr. Hale was recalled from the county on September 30, 1935.

No further Extension work was done in Converse County until February 1, 1940 when Lee Wiegand was appointed agent. Mr. Wiegand helped develop an interest in an R.E.A. project. He was called for military service early in 1942.

On April 6, 1942 Ray Wolfley was appointed. Mr. Wolfley worked on grub control, Bangs vaccination and weed control. He also helped with establishing and handling the P.O.W. Camp in Douglas.

Dorothy Waggoner Grapes was appointed HDA on July 1, 1945. She served until April 17, 1948. Her successor was Frances I. Olson who served until July 31, 1948.

At the close of 1945, Mr. Wolfley was transferred to Uinta County and he was succeeded by William Chapman. Mr. Chapman stayed until March 31, 1951. Orville L. Nicholls became the new County Agent on April 15, 1951. He stayed until his retirement on December 31, 1974. An Acting Assistant Agent, Max M. Wall, was hired for September 1, 1957 to July 31, 1959 when Mr. Nicholls took an education leave. Frank Henderson followed Mr. Nicholls on February 1, 1975 with an interim agent, Gary Small, appointed from June 1, 1978 to January 1, 1979 when Mr. Henderson took an education leave.

Miss Olson was followed by Priscilla E. Brown - February 15, 1949 to June 30, 1951; Alleen Holbrook, June 20, 1951 to October 31, 1951; Barbara Burnside Wise, July 1, 1952 to May 19, 1956; Margaret E. Schluckebier, January 1, 1957 to her retirement, June 30, 1973; Martha Armitage Klauman, July 16, 1973 to March 19, 1976; Jann Johannes, June 1, 1976 to September 30, 1978; Barbara Daniels, November 1, 1978 to present.

4-H Program Assistants have been Gwenda Freed

(September 1978 to October 1980) and Charlene Bloem (November 1980 to March 1981). Darlene K. Nicholson became the full-time 4-H Agent in September 1981.

Barbara Daniels

I knew and worked with A. E. Hyde when he came here in 1923. He started organizing the Farm Bureau and 4-H. He organized the county into eight communities; Verse, Dry Creek, Walker Creek, Flat Top, Hyland, LaPrele, LaBonte and Lost Springs. These communities organized and held meeting each month.

Each community also organized a baseball team and on Sunday there were four games played. Mr. Hyde drew up the schedule and bylaws. A county wide celebration was held on the Fourth of July at LaBonte diamond.

Each community put on the entertainment for the monthly meetings; and as they had lots of time for practice, there were many good programs.

The ball games were discontinued in 1932 when times got bad and the people started leaving the county.

The County Commissioners composed of John Engelking of Glenrock, Tom Meisner and Tom Fleming of Douglas. They were cutting expenses and Mr. Hyde submitted his budget as always, and the commissioners tried to have him cut his budget but he wouldn't. They called him in and John Engelking asked him to cut and he said, "No" so Engelking said, "I won't sign your voucher any more." After a tussel with the Extension Service in Laramie, Mr. Hyde left here and went to Greeley, Colorado where he stayed a short time and then left for parts unknown.

The county just coasted along until 1934 and 1935 when the national agriculture programs were organized. The County Commissioners wrote Washington D.C. to see if the county could get in on the corn and wheat program. Washington replied that even though we didn't have a County Agent we could have a program. The county would have to supply an office and a person to handle it.

A county wide meeting was held in Douglas and Elmer Cowell was elected chairman. The County Commissioners called Elmer in and asked if he would set up the office and get the program started. He accepted and stayed for ten years. The AAA program started about this time. The program later developed into the ASCS.

Elmer Cowell

O. L. Nicholls served Converse County for nearly a quarter of a century as County Agricultural Agent. In this work he became personally acquainted with many of those persons involved in the accounts of this historical record of residents of Converse County.

Nick dedicated himself to his job and appreciated the opportunity to serve the people of the county.

His job included work with both adults and youth (4-H) and involved sheep and beef cattle programs, weed control, rural fire control, Brucellosis vaccination and certification and various insect, rodent and predator control programs. His youth programs saw numerous 4-H members and volunteer leaders involved in award winning trips that took them to all parts of the United States.

Nick is a Wyoming native and a World War II veteran. His wife, Jo, was a 4-H leader, homemaker and actively supported the extension programs. Two children, Steve and Carol, were raised and educated in Converse County. Both were active ten year 4-H members.

Converse County Farm Bureau

Farm Bureau had its first beginnings in Converse County in the 1920s with locals being organized in most of the rural communities and also at the county level.

Ernest Beaver and Clyde Bower were among the first county officers elected in 1926.

The locals sponsored demonstrations. The topics varied from turkey dressing to table service and etiquette. They also had pie socials, fund raising dances, played bingo and helped with community projects. They built benches for community halls, provided Christmas treats for 4-H and school children, repaired county fish ponds and improved community buildings. They worked together and played together. County Extension Agent A. E. Hyde helped organize many of the locals and had input in the programs.

During the 1930s, the depression years, formal meetings of the organization were discontinued due to the economic situation.

In 1947 County Agent Bill Chapman helped to reorganize the locals and began the county wide program. Locals included Beaver, Douglas, Glenrock, LaBonte and LaPrele. New locals were added; Dry Creek (1950), East Converse (1952), Northwest (1961) and Shawnee (1978). In 1985 six locals remain active; Beaver, Dry Creek, Glenrock, LaBonte, LaPrele and Northwest.

The county FB was and is involved in many projects. They have an impact on legislation, 4-H, FFA, water quality, community projects, game and fish and agriculture marketing.

The annual CCFB projects have ranged from a Talent Find Contest (beginning in 1954) to a county picnic. Other county-wide events are; Tours, Ranch-Farm Day (1955, Institute), FB Recruitment Days or Campus Days (1956, to get acquainted with the University of Wyoming), Scholarships for students from FB families (1956), Agriculture Essay Contest (for high school juniors and seniors), Safety Poster Contest (1960, highest number of entries was 116 in 1962), FB Week (1962), CCFB Queen Contest (1963), weekly news column "Your FB," Radio programs, Meet the Candidate picnic, Meeting with Legislators, Little Red Barn (State Fair), membership drive, participating in State Fair Parade and County Library-Citizenship work.

CCFB started an annual banquet in 1949. In the early years each local took turns hosting the banquet (preparing and serving the meal, setting up and finding a speaker). Now the host local sets and decorates the tables. The Converse County Bank has provided a speakers fund that provides the money for the speaker that the county board selects. Speaker topics have ranged from humorous to educational to legislative, all with an agricultural slant. A full house in many years enjoyed the various types of entertainment: calf judging (men's calves), fiddlers, accordion players, dancing and skits.

From the start CCFB has been an active and hard working county organization. In the fall of 1946 some of the members participated in the 1946 State Convention in Worland. Then in 1947 Converse County hosted the State Convention. 275 out-of-county delegates participated. CCFB has received many awards, district, state and national level; FB and non-FB. They received awards for Citizenship, Membership and Information. The county FB has been named Top County many times. In 1957, '58 and '59 CCFB won first in Citizenship at the national level for states under 10,000 members. Examples of other awards; State Fair float winner and Friend of 4-H.

CCFB has a Distinguished Service Award that is presented each year to a deserving member. The first award was given to Orville "Nick" Nicholls, county agriculture agent, in 1962. Other recipients have included hard working members, community leaders, state leaders and congressmen. In recent years the county has awarded two Distinguished Service Awards, one to a person directly involved in FB and one to a person outside of FB and agriculture. FB pins were also given to outstanding members in each local.

The county officers and local members have gone on to serve FB in district, state and national level. Allene Kohrs was honored with a silver plate in 1961 from AFBF for longtime service and several terms on the Western Region Women's Committee. Mrs. Ferris "Mary" Bruner was honored in 1958 for Citizenship. Charles Pexton is presently serving as the state district director.

The Good Roads Club

Incorporating in 1910 with one hundred and fifteen members and capitalization of $50,000.00, the Good Roads Club began as a way to enjoy the new automobile and evolved into a local organization dedicated to improving and promoting the Converse County road system

Illustrating the way everyone in the community did their part to improve the roads is a story told by Beef Bolln. He recalls as a child riding out what is now the Cold Springs Road on the way to Natural Bridge. There was a particular hill on which they would always stop. At the top, everyone in the automobile got out and threw five rocks off the road — the ritual would be repeated at the same spot on the ride home, thus leaving a better road than when they had arrived.

One early event sponsored by the club was an annual race from Wheatland to Douglas by route of the road running by the Platte River. It ended on the hill that now leads up to the Douglas Golf Course. A banner marked the finish line, and a large crowd was usually on hand. Always among the top finishers were Jesse Morsch, Tom Anderson and Charlie Saul. It should be remembered this race was over a dirt road covered with only a small amount of gravel — there was no such thing as an oiled road at that time. One particular race was lost by Jesse Morsch near the finish line, when due to "road conditions" he was bounced from the front seat of his car.

In 1911, the second floor above the Douglas Garage was renovated as a club room. Bill Barlow's Budget described it as "the finest room of its kind in this section of the West. The furnishings cost $1,000.00 wholesale, and the rugs were of the quality scarcely found in private clubs many times the size of Douglas."<sup>1</sup> The rest of the second floor was made into bachelors quarters by W. J.

Morsch. Later, when the P.O.W. camp came to Douglas during World War II, the club room was converted to small apartments.

In 1915 the group changed its name to the Good Roads and Commercial Club and vowed to broaden the scope of the Club's work. By 1917 they voted unanimously to hire a full-time secretary at a salary of $600.00. His job was to solicit funds locally to be used to improve the road system.

The year 1918 marked a turning point for the Club. They elected Robert Hawley—President, C. D. Zimmerman—Vice-President, W. H. Davis—Secretary & Treasurer. The board members were Hawley, Zimmerman, Davis, G. P. Bercher, and E. T. David. They vowed to "build up an organization that will do things for Douglas, for it is believed 1918 will be the most important year in the history of the development of the town."<sup>2</sup> On April 25, 1918 the Good Roads and Commercial Club voted to become the Douglas Chamber of Commerce. One of the first projects was enlisting moral and financial support for the Yellowstone Highway — built at the astounding cost of $7 million. The group was told by the officers of the Yellowstone Highway Association that Converse County had the best section of road on the entire route. The Good Road Club had accomplished much in the years since the automobile was first introduced.

Glenella Rebekah Lodge No. 41

Glenella Rebekah Lodge No. 41 was instituted on March 7, 1930 by the Rebekah Assembly officers as follows: Past President, Emma Sturgeon, Vice President, Mable Vollmer, Acting Grand Secretary, Louella Phillips, Acting Grand Treasurer, Carrie Williams, Warden Delia Clark, Conductor Della Blake, Chaplain Bess Wright, Inside Guardian Ida Barker, Outside Guardian Leona Bishop. Lodge then opened in form, Charter Members were presented and Obligated, the dispensation was read by the Grand Secretary and the membership roll was then signed by the following sisters and brothers: Mary Potterof, Elinor Tabor, Leonard Tabor, Dick and Viola Colby, John and Bertha Hakalo, John and Margaret Turner, and Stuart Anderson.

The members then elected the following officers: Nobel Grand-Viola Colby; Vice Grand-Bertha Hakalo; Secretary-Brother John Hakalo; Treasurer-Margaret Turner. Next in order was the installation of the officers by District Deputy President Emma Sturgeon and her staff: Rolla Luxon, Warden; Louella Phillips, Secretary; Carrie Williams, Treasurer; Mable Vollmer, Marshall; Bess Wright, Chaplain; Ida Barker, Ins. Guardian; Leona Bishop, Out. Guardian and Francis Thomason, Musician.

Applications for membership by card were read and balloting was favorable, electing to membership Brother Chris and Sister Esther Kennaugh and Brother R. L. Harrison by transfer certificate.

At the evening session, the same officers of the Rebekah Assembly degree team conferred the Rebekah Degree on 12 brothers and 22 sisters, several of them are still living and maintaining continuous membership. They are Viola Colby, Marian Clark, Evelyn and Fred Grant, Mona K. Griffith, Helen Griffith, Margaret Turner York and Nora Olin.

On October 7, 1932 we had a silver tea and cleared $4.48. This was the start of our rug fund. We continued to serve dinner dances, card parties, Conoco safety banquets and bingo parties to add to the fund. The Rebekah Tea Club gave us $30.00. Finally we had enough to buy a rug from Joslin's Department Store in Denver on February 2, 1949, at a cost of $888, installed.

In 1935 at our Annual Roll Call, Sister Mary Potterof presented our Lodge with a beautiful white Bible, which we are still using. The Tea Club was very active at this time and gave the Lodge our chrome trays, silverware, several dozen cups, saucers and plates. Before this, each member had to bring her own table service.

Our members sewed kits and gowns for the Red Cross in 1944 during World War II.

Sister Cora Grant, mother of Sister Jessie Hakalo, was President of the Rebekah Assembly of Wyoming from June 1945 to June 1946. We have since had two more Presidents, Sister Evelyn Grant and Sister June Lythgoe.

Brother Ellis Culshaw was the Grand Patriarch of the Grand Encampment in 1952 and was fatally injured in a car accident on his way home from making official visits to the Encampments over the state. His death was a great loss to everyone. In 1952 the chimes at the Community Baptist Church were dedicated to the memory of Brother Culshaw and his daughter, Beatrice. We have two other Past Grant Patriarchs, Brother William "Wick" Lythgoe and Brother Robert B. McIntosh. Brother Hershel H. Wickett is a Past Grand Master and Past Department Commander. We're proud to have them as brother Rebekahs in our lodge.

The Odd Fellows lodge of Glenrock held a mortgage burning ceremony on January 2, 1957, which was a joyous occasion for Odd Fellows and Rebekahs alike. The Rebekahs served the banquet and the lodge hall was packed with visitors from the neighboring lodges. This was the highlight of their year and we shared in their happiness.

As the years have gone by we have seen many changes. At one time we had the best Degree Teams in the state, every officer knew their charge from memory, and the Degree was practiced every month. Brothers Dick Colby, Earl Clayton and Fred Grant were the Degree Captains, and good ones!

Sister Evelyn Grant served as Assembly President in 1956-1957 and Sister June Lythgoe served in 1975-1976. They are both active members of our lodge.

Six of our members have received the Decoration of Chivalry: Mary Potterof, Cora Grant and Blanche McQueary (all now deceased), Amanda Lythgoe, June Lythgoe and Evelyn Grant.

We held money making projects to help on the expense of remodeling the kitchen and restrooms, which was done by the Odd Fellows. They also remodeled the hall and stairways, carpeting those areas and the ante-rooms. What an improvement, and it was greatly appreciated!

On February 2, 1977 we had a dinner honoring Sister Blanche McQueary on her 80th birthday. She was our Queen for the Evening and was paid many tributes for her many years of dedicated service to the lodge.

Margaret Uhrich, a Glenrock girl, was a winner of the trip to the United Nations session several years ago. We are proud to be sponsors of the essay contest that provides such an honor to the winners.

Our lodge is active and participates in many projects of the Order. We raise money for community charities as well as our own projects.

We were proud to be friends and neighbors of Brother Corwin Havill of Casper, who served as Sovereign Grand Master of the World, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and attended his Testimonial Dinner in Casper.

Over the years we have presented many 25 year jewels and a number of 50 year jewels for continuous membership in the Order.

While other outside activities that have become so numerous keep some of us from regular attendance, we still have an active, enthusiastic lodge. We are proud to be REBEKAHS!

Amanda Lythgoe
Secretary

Converse County Rural Fire Control

The Converse County Rural Fire program was organized by the County Agent, O.L. Nicholls, in 1964 in cooperation with the County Commissioners. The intent of the program was to assist ranch people in rural areas in preparing a ready force to control range fires. The program met with much enthusiasm among ranch people. The county was organized on a community basis and was divided into eight zones. Surplus military equipment was available through the State Forester's Office. Most of the expense of the program, however, was handled by the individuals in the communities or zones. Army six by six and four by four trucks were available as well as some Jeeps and trailers.

The first trucks to be obtained were picked up in Pueblo, Colorado and driven to Douglas by George Etchemendy, Gene Hardy and "Doc" Alexander. These were army two and one half ton six by six trucks. All equipment obtained was outfitted by the zones with water tanks, pumps and other fire fighting equipment to handle most range fires.

As the program progressed, radio equipment was also obtained to the point that now leaves the county well organized to control rural fires that may develop in any section of the county. This program was strictly a volunteer effort by rural residents who developed and maintained the quipment. Each zone (eight in all) was supervised by volunteer zone wardens elected by the people in the zone. Equipment was obtained according to the need and financial capability.

Early pioneers in the program included; Earl Reed, George Etchemendy, Vic Nachtman, Jack Nachtman, Carl Hageman, Glenn Naiman, "Doc" Alexander, Harold Carothers, "Skee" Goff, Jack Sullivan, Gene Hardy, Dennis Irwin, Jim Caldwell, Rory Cross, Marty Olsen, Dale Carson, Fred and Richard Grant, Bernard Duncan, Lloyd Nunn, Ed Moore, Mortons Ranch, VR Ranch, Bixby Ranch, Don Cundall, County Agent O.L. Nicholls and County Commissioners Hugh Duncan, Bill Vollman, Sr. and Justin Wernier.

Converse County Rural Firefighters l. to r. Richard Grant and Fred Grant.

The present program is equipped with a two way radio system. Each zone warden has a base radio and there are also radios in many of the trucks. One operates at the Black Mountain Lookout tower. A total of 32 trucks are equipped in nine zones. People administering the program are: George Etchemendy, County Fire Warden; Earl Reed, Deputy County Fire Warden; and Jerry Wills, Chairman of the County Fire Board. Zone Wardens are: Earl Reed, Joe Hageman, Chet Lane, Jerry Wills, Jack Sullivan, Fred Grant, Hershel Wickett, Dale Carson, Warren Manning and County Commissioners John Pexton, Bud Turner and Gordon Taylor, Jr.

In addition to fighting fires in the county, a group of five ranchers, with two trucks, went to Montana in 1984 to assist in fighting severe fires in that area. Men on these fires were Larry Philbrick, George Etchemendy, Dana Fitzhugh, Jerry Wills and Dennis Newell.

The program is invaluable as a fire protection force for the county and presently receives part of its finances for equipment from a budget from the County Commissioners.

Fairview School

The Fairview School located on the George Peake's place accommodated the homesteaders' children of the north and east part of the Dry Creek Community. A few years later it was moved to a new site just south of the Bill Featherston place. Here it served the purpose through the spring of 1929. Dry Creek schools consolidated to a new school located just south of the Dry Creek Community Hall in the fall of 1929. Drinking water came from the hall.

Teachers at the Fairview School were; Mrs. Jim Stevens, Mrs. Herman Brockmeyer, Miss Verbel Dull, Miss Brown, Mrs. Githens, Mrs. Hildebrand and T. J. Allstott. At the Dry Creek Consolidated School from 1929 to 1937 those teaching were: Emmett Carver, Anna Lynch, Scott Carver, Miss Bernice Robinson, John Cleveland, Skirlo Walkinshaw and Muriel Metz. Mr. Glenn Lore and later Babe Reed were school bus drivers from the north and east part of the Dry Creek Community. Everyone walked to school before the consolidation in the fall of 1929. A Model T was put on the top of Mr. Emmett Carver's cabin in the school yard grounds on Halloween 1929.

The Dry Creek Consolidated School burned February 12, 1936. Nobody knew what started the fire; hot coals out of a stove were suspected. Everything burned. During the period of time it took to bring two abandoned small schools, put them end to end and get them ready for classes, we carried on school in the Dry Creek Community Hall. All of our new basketball suits and all the new track equipment burned. Hundreds of arrowheads owned by students burned. Also hundreds of rattlesnake rattles used for class work and owed by students burned.

LaBonte and Wagonhound Schools

The early day schools of District 19, south of Douglas, in the LaBonte and Wagonhound area, were much different than the schools of today. The first school buildings were of log construction, the windows were small and the lighting was very poor. If a spring or creek was not close by, drinking water was carried to school each day by each family, usually in a syrup pail with a tight inset lid. Wood was used for fuel. Books were furnished by the school district.

Distances were great between ranches and homesteads in this sparsely settled area; the winters were long and severe and transportation was slow. Pupils and teacher either walked, rode horseback, or drove a team. The teacher was usually an eighth grade graduate with no normal training or higher education. Wages were $35 a month or less, the term was short, often only three months long, or as money was available. Sometimes the term was split; school being held in spring or early summer and then again in late summer or early fall. This was done to avoid having school in the severe winter weather. Later, when there was oil royalty money for the schools, the term had to be longer in order for the school to qualify for the royalty money. At one time (about 1918) it was six months, then eight months and then nine months. If a school was large, a teacher often had all the grades from the first grade through the eighth grade. Frame buildings replaced old log school houses.

The old Mill School, District No. 8, was located at the old sawmill on Mill Creek, about where the dike is on what is now the Allen Grant ranch. This was from about the turn of the century until 1912. The school house was a log structure, with small windows and it was very dark on rainy days. The double seats and desks were homemade. There was an organ part of the time. Some of the teachers were Mrs. Esmay, Ruth Ames, Myrtle Davis, Margaret Reid (Bolln), and Florence Reid (Stansbury, then Scott). School board members were Martha A. Bruner, Mrs. George Ullman and George Snyder. The Mill School closed up and moved in 1912 and the district became part of District 19. Pupils who attended, as recalled by Ferris Bruner, were Julian Esmay and his sister, two boys by the name of French, Faye Chambers (George), Walter, Clarence, Emma and Juanita Lyons, Harrison and Della Payton and Ferris Bruner. Later came Edna, Irl (Earl), and Maggie Kelsey, Clyde, Merle, Ivan, Ruth and Ruby Francisco, Leonard, Ralph, Roy and Winifred Miller. Richard Blackford, Lena Crawford (Crabb), Lillian King, Malcolm Rutherford, Martha Helsley, a Blowers girl and boy, and perhaps others.

Thomas G. Bruner bought the old school house and moved it down to the present Bruner ranch where the family dwelled in it while they built their house. Then it served as a shop until the heavy snow of 1933 leveled it. The bell from this school was donated to the museum school house on the state fairgrounds.

In the years, approximately of 1901-1905, a log school house stood about one-quarter mile southeast of the Henry Saul place, which was at, approximately, the location of Charlie Saul's bungalow where Dick Pexton now lives. The school was on a hill just above where the ditch and the meadow are now. But there was only sagebrush then; no ditch or meadow. Teachers remembered are: Bessie Mills (Leman), Louise Welsh, and Bertha Meyers; the Kelsey children came from up LaBonte Canyon (Edna and Irl Kelsey), Beulah Hamilton, Vera Saul (Trumper), Vernon Saul, Marjorie, Dick, Jack and Douglas Foxton, James C. Willox, Frank McLaughlin, Roscoe, Malcolm and Archie Rutherford and Ferris Bruner.

Bessie Mills Leman recalled that she had taught Edna, Maude, Bessie and Margaret Willox and Billy Hamilton and probably was at this school, or some building near by.

About 1905 a new frame school house was built by Pete Peterson, near the LaBonte Creek Bridge just below where Dick Pexton lives in the Saul bungalow. The old log school house (above) was moved away. Teachers recalled are Margaret Reid (Bolln), Florence Reid (Stansbury, then Scott), and Miss Carter.

James C. Willox, father of James A. Willox, used to ride horseback to this school from the present Willox ranch on West Fork LaBonte Creek, a distance of six miles or more. The four Rutherford boys rode from the present Charles Pexton place, a distance of perhaps seven miles. The George Foxton children came either in a buggy or on horseback from the present Tim Pexton place and they attended both this school and the log one mentioned above. This frame school burned to the ground.

A cement school house was built by Dad Morton just above where Saul's bungalow was built later. This building was very cold and very unsatisfactory as there was no dead air space and frost collected on the walls. Emma O'Brien (Adair) taught here in 1914, and she recalls that her pupils were Billy and Ruth Morton, Bea, Charlie, George and Josie Poirot and that she boarded at Poirots who lived where Jack Eggleston lived. She and the Poirot children walked this long distance to school but she recalls that they were afraid of Saul's bulls in the pasture and so they went long distances around the bulls and added mile on mile. She said the bulls never bothered them but that they took no chances. On the school board as she recalls were Jim Shaw, Mr. Pollard and Pete Johnson.

A log school house was built by Otto Brose at the site of what is now White School. Laura Johnson (Reid) taught this school the winter of 1917-1918. Phyllis Sullivan taught in 1918-1919 and 1919-1920. The building burned down in the spring of 1920. Pupils recalled are Fay Brose (West), Dorothy and Vern Brose, Arbulah, Arvilla, Havelock and Woodrow Brow, Eva, Mamie, Stanley and Patty Brow (Amspoker). Thornton and Edwin Brow and Bill Morton.

Fred Cannon was hired to build the little White School House which later served as a teacherage. It was a frame building. Some of the teachers who taught there were Elga Johnson (McDonald), Bette Reid (Wills), Marion Mills (Burden), Marjory Gibbs, Maxine Carothers, Ada McKibben, Marilyn Rodeman (Alexander), Kathleen Fitzhugh (Nance), and Adele Mores. Pupils besides some enrolled at log building were: Ann, Julia and Henry Freeman, Elizabeth Isaac (Brow), Ida Mae Isaac (Leeling), Joe Isaac, Janice, Eleanor and Gerald Whitaker, Walter Lee, Shirley and Don Alexander, Fred Edwards, Don, Marie and Carol Johnson, Bruce, Toni and Kitty Corn, Lois and Buck Norton, Ann and Jimmy Willox, who rode across the bleak flat from the Willox Ranch on West Fork LaBonte.

The large White School House (frame) to the south of the teacherage which now houses the four lower grades, was originally built on land which later belonged to Will Nunn, where Lloyd Nunn now lives. Maude George (Nunn) attended school here, and she recalls that some of her teachers were Miss Elza Hines, Martha Gordon, Miss Lettie Owens, Bessie Davis who later married Guy George, Bess McClain, who was a sister of Mrs. Silas Guthrie, Ona Mills, who was a cousin to Mrs. Fred George, mother of Maude Nunn. Maude Nunn remembers an old log school house used before this white one was built and at about the same site. Other pupils at this school besides Maude George (Nunn) were: Bob, Hubert, Fred and Harry George, the children of John Kern who then owned the present James Clausen place, Laura Johnson (Reid), Carrie Johnson (Reid), Elga Johnson (McDonald), and others.

This large White School House on the Nunn place was moved in the early 1930s to a point midway between the Nunn Ranch and the Gordon Fitzhugh Ranch and still later it was moved to the Wagonhound Creek about half-way between Fitzhugh's and what is now the George Wills Ranch. And when it outgrew its usefulness there, it was again moved in 1964 or 1965 up to the White School, which place seems to be its ultimate resting place as a school house.

A new building of frame was erected at White School about 1956 just north of the teacherage, by Lester Rookstool; this was to house the four upper grades after the school bus was run to the upper country to bring the children down there. But this building housed all the grades before the other building was moved to south of the teacherage. Teachers at this White School location not named at the log or little school house teacherage building included Georgia Eggleston, Helen Metz, Stella Jackson, Pauline Swisher, Jo Carothers and Mable Nauman.

In the early days the Lower Wagonhound (log) School House set on the west side of the old county road and on the north side of the irrigation ditch. Among the pupils were the Fitzhugh and Pollard children and others. Then the school house was moved up the creek between Fitzhugh's and the Milt Hammond place, now part of George Wills Ranch. Later Laura Reid taught several terms at the Fitzhugh place where Jim Fitzhugh now lives. Margaret Enquist taught a term there, too.

The Upper Wagonhound School, Carothers and George School, was a log building on the west side of Wagonhound Creek and below the road crossing going toward the Ed Raeber or present John Pollock place. Among the pupils were George, Arthur and Margaret Carothers, the Guy Georges, Bob George and Hubert George children and others. Some of the teachers were Ruth Furman (Whitaker), Maxine Stone (Carothers) and Anna Anderson (Peterson).

In the 1940s a frame school house was built by George Reid about a mile east and south of the Matt Carothers ranch house. Later it was moved over to the Nunn ranch; still later to the north side of Wagonhound Creek to accommodate the McGehee children; and still later it was moved south of Wagonhound Creek and up on a hill east of the county road. In the fall of 1970 this building was moved over to Wagonhound to be used as a teacherage for the John Pollock and George Falkenburg School.

Mrs. Walter Whitaker recalls the Sheep Creek School on Wagonhound. She taught Walter Whitaker, Jr. one year when he became of school age. Margaret Carothers taught him one year and received $20 per month and Mr. Whitaker paid her for teaching. Mrs. Whitaker recalls that Albert Burns built the Sheep Creek School House. Ethel Westwick taught here and drove four miles. Her pupils were Ramona Westwick, Harold Carothers, Beverly and Shirley Stults, Walter Whitaker, Jr. and Janice Whitaker. Part of the pupils were from District 19 and part from District 22 but arrangements were made.

Maude George Nunn was a pioneer teacher on LaBonte. She taught in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Poirot when they lived where Rita Alexander now lives. She finished a term for Polly Eastman (Carmin) and then taught the next term there. The Poirots then moved.

The Braae School was established in the spring of 1918 for the two children of Mrs. Hattie A. Braae, a widow who homesteaded where the remains of the buildings and the old Braae, Wyoming Post Office now stands. School was held in the bedroom of the cabin. Mary Dunn (Bruner) taught the first two terms there and Pansy Braae (Dunn) taught the third term. The school was then discontinued when Mrs. Braae went to take employment at the B. J. Erwin ranch. Pupils at this school were Mildred, Irene, Arnold and Hattie Braae.

When the Braae School came into being, there was a school at the Fred Wright place which is now Charles Pexton's. School was held in the bunkhouse, and it was then Albany County but is now in Converse County. Teachers were Mary Fitzhugh and Lily Metcalf. The Wrights moved away after these two terms.

In the fall of 1925, a school was established in the bunkhouse at Ferris Bruner's with Beulah Walston as teacher; next year the bunkhouse was moved from the yard to a knoll near Mill Creek near the road crossing. Fay Reed taught, then Martha Meigs and Mary Bruner. It was discontinued after four years when Blackbridge School was built. Pupils at this bunkhouse were Charles and Archie Bruner, Charles, Dick and Jean Strock, Vern and Margaret Hayes, Rody Brow and Fred Edwards.

This same fall of 1925, Margaret Southwick taught the Willis Spracklen children who lived south of where Tim Pexton now lives.

Blackbridge School was built in 1929 by Albert Burns. It was a very large rural school. Teachers were Edna Seewald, Anna Schick (Ballard), Wilma McClanahan, Muriel Metz and Margaret Oestreich. It closed in 1937 for lack of pupils. Pupils there had been Charles, Archie and Sibyl Bruner, Ann and Julia Freeman, Hellen, Frances, George and Betty Enbody, Margaret and Jim Saul, Gene, Lorraine and Betty George, Charles, Dick and Jean Strock, Fred Edwards, Billy and Bobbie Owens, Billy, Marie and Phebe Norton, Mike Shonsey, Margaret McHenry, Opal, Marion and Harold Watson, Martha, Imogene, and two other Gregory children.

Blackbridge School opened again a few years later and teachers then were Miriam Meyers, Evelyn Jacobs Munkres, Marion Burden. Pupils were Tom and Shirley Eggleston, perhaps others. The building still stands in a state of decay.

Beulah and Raleigh Bricker who homesteaded on Rutherford Creek below what is now the Charles Pexton ranch buildings, in the late 1920s, erected a very small building at their own expense, and the district furnished the teacher for the Morton children. Later this small building was moved to a location below Braae Post Office, midway between the Bob George family at Braae Post Office and the Willard Ellis family at Hamilton place. Floy Moore Braae and Dorothy Isaac (Clausen) taught there. Pupils were Sammy Ellis, Bertha, Kathy and Billy George. School discontinued when the families moved.

The small log school house just up LaBonte Creek from the Fred Isaac place which is now James Clausen's, was first build down the creek by Fred Isaac and Brownie Phinney for a school for Dorothy and John Isaac and Beth and Virginia Phinney. Teachers there were Miss Basham and Miss Engstrom. School was held in it for two years, then the building was torn down and moved to the upper end of Isaac's land and just below the marker of the Bill

Hooker cabin. Janet Thompson (Froggatt) taught two years here. Pupils were Dorothy and John Isaac, Beth and Virginia Phinney, Fred and John Dilts, and others. Dorothy Clausen recalls that one year Brownie Phinney ran sort of a bus up as far as what is now Colt Track Ranch to pick up other pupils. The road was dirt and unimproved. He had many struggles making the trips. This was the first effort at hauling pupils that we know of! This was probably about 1936. Until twelve years ago school has been held off and on every few years at this location; Wilma Ballard and Esther Clausen taught here. The building is still standing.

Since the Esterbrook area is now a part of Converse County, the Fawcett School was established when Vernon Fawcett became of school age. Russell Fawcett furnished a building for a school house. His wife, Miriam, was the teacher. The second boy, Paul, also attended.

From about 1915-1920, I believe, in general, the teachers hired, had at least a high school education and wages were higher. John Pexton thought it was in the early 1950s when some of the pupils were taken by bus to White School from upper end, later the lower end was taken by bus to White School. Jack and Mabel Eggleston had the bus contracts.

Nachtman School

The first school was at the Dull homestead in a log building about 1918 or 1919.

In 1923 a frame school was built on the Harvey Nachtman homestead; it put the school half way between the Dull and the Good families. The school was named Bethany.

In the late fall of 1939 the school was moved to the Frank Rothluetner place. There, another school building was added to the original school building. In 1951 the school building was again moved back to the Nachtman ranch and renamed the Nachtman School.

Water for the school was hauled by parents or the teacher. The school was heated with coal that was hauled by parents.

In 1960 electricity was brought to the community and so to the school; it was a great day!

1964 brought another improvement. A water well was drilled and restrooms were put in. The teacher lived in one room and taught in the other.

In 1973 a new school was built with a large class room with a kitchen area and a recreation room. A dedication for the new school was held October 21, 1973 with many past pupils and teachers present. There were three generations of the Victor Nachtman family and two generations of the Lawrence Nachtman family present. Also, but not present, two generations of the Rothluetner family had attended the old school.

The old school was sold and moved; it was later destroyed by fire.

One incident that was well remembered in the old school was when skunks moved in under the school. Traps were set but could not catch them as fast as they were moving in.

The skunks would fight under the floor and were climbing up inside the wall where the two buildings were joined and get up to the attic. The teacher said, "They had to go or she would." A hole was cut in the wall and Victor Nachtman's hunting dog was put under the floor to chase the skunks up the wall then the men would reach in and catch the skunks by their tails, take them outside and kill them. A total of 26 skunks were trapped and carried from the school. The building was then fixed so they could not get under the floor. It was a little smelly for a few days but not much worse than when the skunks were living under the school.

In 1983 the school was closed after more than 60 years of continuous classes held there.

North Point School

Thunder Basin may mean many things to different people. To me, it will always mean a sea of grass, vague trails like currents starting bravely only to peter out on a wave of hill and a matchbox school perching on the edge of a deep ravine. "Pop" Markley, one of the great men of the school world, sent me on that wild goose chase. The contracted teacher had returned to Casper and sent District #17 a wire saying that she had decided not to teach.

That night I said, "Now, if I had a sheepwagon, I'd do it."

Fred Jenne answered, "I'll take you up on that; I have a new sheepwagon that I bought for the roundup. You buy me an innerspring mattress and you can use the sheepwagon."

Mick Hardy solved the water problem by promising to bring it in milk cans. The simple matter of existence posed problems; scrub the school house, carry coal, make fires, bring books on every imaginable subject.

I learned to make a fire in the sheepwagon's sheet iron stove although the damper was a mystery for some time and biscuits could be both burned and raw. The round oak school stove seemed simpler, but Laramie Griffiths was slow about bringing coal and the slack delighted the children when it exploded and blew that useless lid from the stove top into the room.

Arlone Carson was second grade pixie genius, Herbert Smith was fourth, Gene Hardy and Vivian Carson, fifth and Dale Carson was eighth grade.

I was determined that we would not miss anything taught in the finest schools; and the world was a science lab. The igloos which we built were masterpieces. The wonderful neighbors entertained me.

Halloween was there all too soon. We had fine decorations and fabulous food. Everyone came and sang and laughed and visited. Of course, Halloween came on the wrong day so we had to celebrate on the weekend.

On All Hallow's Eve, Gene Hardy's dog appeared under my wagon and seemed frightened. I thought no more about it, turned up the gas lantern and settled to relax with a mystery. Suddenly there was an eerie howl; I realized that I had no telephone and the nearest neighbors were a couple of miles away. That awful howl again; I moved the lantern to the door...nothing.

North Point School: L. to r. Gene Hardy, Dale Carson, teacher Pauline Peyton, Arlone Carson, Vivian Carson and Herbert Smith.

"Hmm," I thought, "I'll bet the Spracklen boys thought that it would be a joke to scare the schoolmom."

I settled down again only to be shaken by a series of unearthly wails. With a shock I realized that someone could be injured and die before morning. I had sneered at my brother when he insisted that I take a .38 revolver with me, but I was glad to have it then. I gathered the revolver and lantern and quavered out of the sheepwagon. I circled the area, went to, but not into, the "chic sales special" (there were no wails there). The dog was shaking under the wagon. The next morning there were some large animal tracks near the wagon. I never knew whether I had a cougar or a prankster; if it were a prankster, I'll bet he was more frightened than I was when he saw me stagger out with that .38 wobbling all over the place.

Christmas was memorable; we made decorations and gifts. We prepared songs, a comedy, "Santa's Necktie" with five actors, dances, and finally a creche scene behind some draped sheets that made a stage. Mrs. Carson played the organ and we sang carols. Dick Hornbuckle joined us with a reading because he was the only one in his school. Everyone brought marvelous food; but the miracle was that men and women came from miles away and I knew that there wasn't room, but like the "loaves and fishes," that little school house stretched and everyone was comfortable.

The new year brought a determined winter. For three days no one could get to school. Then people struggled through the drifts and we built igloos.

The east wind howled and pushed snow through the clapboards of the school, but we swept the little drifts out twice a day. One morning I arose to see the rabbits shivering in front of my wagon. I gave them something to eat and said, "You silly things, why don't you go back into your house under the school; it's too cold to be outside."

When I went to build the fire in the school, I knew what was wrong with the rabbits. A skunk had moved in. That day we tried to be quiet, but every time we crossed the floor, we knew that our guest was there. I told the children to tell their fathers to come get the skunk. I didn't know what they would do, but I had great confidence in ranchmen. That night Harold Carson came over; he walked around the school and rubbed his chin. He walked into the building and said, "He's there all right. I guess we'll have to get together and dig him out."

The next day the children came and we held school in the sheepwagon, confident that the digging process would take place that night. I didn't allow myself to think too much of the results of the digging.

The third day came. Five active children in a sheepwagon is not the ideal setting for scholarship. Evening came, but no diggers.

After the children had gone, I eyed by mother's contribution of sulphur candles. With determination I collected a couple of cans and went around the school to find a place where I could slip cans under the building. I lit a sulphur candle and put it in a can and pushed it under the building. I perched in the sheepwagon door thinking that I would shoot the skunk when he came out, but no luck.

In the morning the rabbits had moved back into their house. We never saw that skunk but I still have confidence that ranchmen know how to handle situations.

One morning at sunrise I heard children chattering. I wasn't even dressed. I looked up the road toward Carsons, but nothing. Puzzled, I turned toward the school and the chattering began again. I knew that the children must be in the ravine and, seething, I walked to the edge...nothing. "Wow, I really must have been here too long." The chattering started again. I turned and there stood a bunch of antelope gossiping about me. I had never known that they had voices.

The grass was greening; and a sheepwagon, band of sheep and a herder moved up the hill from me. The young man came over to borrow some books and visit. Later he brought me some meat and magazines. He was tall and well-built. Quite a handsome young man.

The fourth time he came he seemed a little uneasy. I went on with whatever I was doing when suddenly he blurted, "Will you marry me?"

I was stunned, "Oh, no," I said, "I can't."

"Why not?"

I tried to think of a good reason.

Finally he accepted my decision. He said, "Well, I won't be seeing you any more." As he reached the door he turned and matter-of-factly said, "Well, anyway, you'll always know you had a chance."

The Thunder Basin children taught me a great deal. They tried every project with remarkable results. We had picnics on the warm yellow sand across the ravine. We entertained the neighborhood with an art show. It was their own art which went to the state fair and won. The important thing was that we loved each other, and respected ourselves, worked together, and learned the excitement of the world in which we lived.

Sunset School

A school was established at the Sunset Mine in 1915. Some of the children who attended this first school hadn't ever been to school and some had not attended for several years. They were members of families of homesteaders. Their first teacher was Edith Morrison Stark.

School was held in the four room house which had been the office building. Records from the Sunset School during the term beginning May 22, 1917 and ending November 2, 1917 indicate that Miss Lillie Meinzer had been employed as the teacher. She had enrolled eight students, ranging in age from six to eleven years. Her salary was $60.00 per month.

Miss Mienzer states that the school was in satisfactory condition at the end of her first term. There was a statement that the building was in fair repair. No visit was made to the school by the County Superintendent that year and only one of the Trustees paid a call. C. W. Onyon was the Clerk of School District #10 and it was he who visited the Sunset School. The first term taught by Miss Meinzer lasted just over five months.

By 1919 Miss Meinzer vacated her post as teacher and was replaced by Irene Cook. The enrollment had risen to 13. The records indicate that the school was abandoned sometime in the year of 1922, after having started the term with an enrollment of seven. The school was probably moved to a location closer to the Spellman homestead and continued to be in session for a time. The Sunset and the Spellman Schools were a boon to the community. Trustees such as Mr. Onyon must be credited with progressive thinking and foresight and with a great deal of determination to overcome many difficulties.

Walker Creek School

School buildings in the 1920s were like grasshoppers, here today and gone tomorrow. When a school ran out of pupils the school house was moved to the pupils.

The Walker School was located on Loretta Walker Wileman's homestead. Mable Walker Wileman was the teacher. Pupils were the children of Roy Lewis, George Sheets, and Lou Hanlin. When the Lewis and Sheets families moved away in 1925, the building was moved eight miles east between Willow and Lightning Creeks; it was named the Lightning Creek School.

John Poulson was the first teacher. In 1926-1927, Gladys Hanlin taught her first term of school here. The pupils were: Perdita and John Whitmarsh; Oren Septer; Claude, Dayton, and Harry Pounds; and Leland and James Hanlin. Stacia Baker and Gata McCarthy taught in 1927-1928; Lucille Meisner taught in 1928-1929.

In 1929 the schools in the area were all consolidated and the pupils bused to the school house where the present Walker Creek School is.

1920s ADVERTISEMENT FOR THE WILLYS OVERLAND STAR TOURING CAR

Twinkle, twinkle, little Star,
What a wonder little car.
Far above all other makes,
You shine from red seal power to brakes.
Like your namesake in the sky,
You shine on earth to please the eye.
Three speeds forward and one reverse,
A car to fit the poor man's purse.
